OUR GREAT CHANCE
SOUTH'S LAST STAND
THE REAL ISSUES

WHATEVER ELSE HAPPENS in the Scottsboro case, there is one unmistakeable fact. It has given us one of the greatest chances for consolidated action we have had since emancipation.

If we do not accept this opportunity, the world will look upon us as not deserving the status of manhood for which we have been clamoring.

The conviction with death penalty given Haywood Patterson was not a rape verdict. It was the verdict of the South that 12,000,000 colored citizens SHALL NOT RISE TO THE STATUS OF CITIZENSHIP.

It was a verdict of a grim, teeth-clenched and eye-closed South steeped in prejudice. It was the verdict of those who are still fighting the Civil War. There is no question about it. It is Dixie's last stand against any change of the present status of colored men and women.

IF, AS DID THIS WRITER, you had watched every episode in that Decatur drama of race relations, you could not have helped coming to the conclusion that Alabama whites were resorting to every trick and agency they have used since Lincoln signed the Emancipation Proclamation, to make it a mere scrap of paper.

And, mind you, it was not the usual mob which was "crucifying justice on a cross of color." It was the constituted authority of the state's white citizenry. There are men in Alabama, like Judge James E. Horton in the Patterson trial, who would have preferred to see justice done. But like Judge Horton, this insignificantly small contingent was swept along with the rushing tide of bigotry and racial prejudice which make justice to a colored man impossible in that state.

In this rushing tide of intolerance are not only the courts but the churches, the chambers of commerce, the Rotary clubs, the civic bodies and even the so-called humane agencies. No organized force in Alabama, including even the interracial movements, is militantly opposed to what is happening in the Scottsboro case.

But the very completeness with which Alabama believes she has won a victory in again condemning Haywood Patterson to death is her crushing defeat. For once, here is a clear case about which there can be no dispute. The International Labor Defense has smoked the monster out in all his hideousness.

I must confess that sitting there at the press table for two weeks and looking on at the grim court battle, my only misgiving came from the shameful fact that not one colored man there was actually engaged in the struggle. It may be that the shock of that laughing jury verdict Sunday will wake us up.

It may be that the real issues in this life and death struggle through which the guilt or innocene of the nine Scottsboro boys merely floated like a shadow will be brought home to us, and then every man and woman in this country will fling himself or herself into the fight.

These issues mean about the same to the doctor, the lawyer, the teacher, the laborer, the unemployed man or woman as they mean to the Scottsboro boys.

The electric current which an Alabama jailer might turn on would burn to death nine innocent boys. That would be terrible. But the current of racial hatred and color discrimination which is back of all this kills every day unknown numbers of innocent babies. It electrocutes the ambitions and opportunities of thousands of young men and women by denying them their rightful places in life. It kills some of our most valuable citizens like Miss Juliette Derricotte of Fisk.

That is why the Scottsboro fight is our fight. That is why we must not take time to quibble over ways and means. This is war. You cannot talk ethics and diplomacy to the poison gas of such race prejudice as exists in Alabama. Every church, every lodge, every club and every individual in this country should join the ranks.

While the right of trial by jury has been looked upon for a long period as one of the important privileges of citizenship, the notorious Scottsboro case presents an argument to the effect that in certain situations the defendant might have far better assurance of a fair trial and adjudication were his ultimate fate left in the hands of the presiding justice.

To charge nine Negroes with attacking two white girls who were hoboing their way from Tennessee to Alabama on a freight train, and to leave it to an Alabama jury to decide the question of their guilt, would indicate at the start that race prejudice must weigh heavily against the defendants, even if the jurors made a fair and honest attempt to consider the case on its merits. The first trial occurred at Scottsboro, and eight of the defendants were convicted of criminal assault and sentenced to death, in rapid succession, there being a mistrial in the case of the ninth youth.

On March 25, 1932, after a long legal fight to save the condemned men, the Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the death sentences of all except one, Eugene Williams, who, the court held, was a minor. The other cases were taken to the United States Supreme Court, where the sentences were set aside and a new trial was ordered. A change of venue from Scottsboro to Decatur was granted for the re-trials, but again comes a verdict of guilty, carrying with it a death sentence, in the case of one of the Negroes, tried separately. At both trials, National Guardsmen were stationed about the court house to prevent any disturbance and guard against possible mob violence. During the preliminaries to the re-trials, the defense made an effort to have the indictments and venire quashed on the contention that the defendants were deprived of their constitutional rights through "habitual exclusion" of Negroes from Alabama juries. Judge James E. Horton, who presided, overruled the motion.

In his charge to the jury, Judge Horton pointed out that "at one time or another, both Ruby Bates and Victoria Price (the two women who are alleged to have been attacked by the defendants) perjured themselves." "Remember," he continued, "both these women were of the underworld."

Commenting upon the outcome of the case, the New York Times, which sent a member of its staff to furnish complete daily reports on the case, says: "This result comes as a surprise and a shock to those who had followed the evidence given in court. * * *

"The presiding judge bore himself with impartiality, and was evidently anxious to make Alabama justice worthy of the name. His rulings, so far as can be determined at this distance, were correct. His charge to the jury was filled with strong protests against anything like mob law or the spirit of lynching, and of warnings to disregard everything but the evidence in the case. Whether the jury was swayed as much as it should have been by his injunctions to give no weight to the fiery denunciations and appeals to race hatred by the prosecution, it is impossible to say. Although Judge Horton took the strongest ground against anything like intimidation or threats of violence on the part of the people of the vicinage, it was all too plain that the trial was conducted in an atmosphere intensely prejudiced against the accused Negro. The jurymen deliberated a long time over the tangled evidence and the manifest untrustworthiness of the chief witnesses, both for the prosecution and the defense. But the final verdict was 'Guilty,' and it is now difficult to see how an appeal could lie to the Supreme Court again, or to any higher power except the governor. He might see fit, in view of all the circumstances, to commute the death sentence into a term of imprisonment."

Even in trials dealing with matters of less import than life and death, prejudice is prone to play an injurious part; and more than one citizen, after having the experience of serving on a jury, has come to the conclusion that were he to have a cause for adjudication he would prefer that it be passed upon by a justice trained in the law rather than submit it to the vagaries of twelve of his own fellows. "If I were in the right in a case that was going to court," we were once told by an ex-juror, "I would prefer to have it decided by the judge; but if I knew I was in the wrong, I would rather take a chance with a jury."

In the Scottsboro case, it seems apparent that race prejudice swayed the jury, as against the intrinsic value of the evidence.

AND CLEVER TOO!

Regardless of how one may feel towards Samuel Leibowitz, chief of defense counsel in the Scottsboro cases, for his scathing denunciation of the jury which convicted Heywood Patterson, it may be that Mr. Leibowitz is smart, sufficiently smart to accomplish that which otherwise appeared impossible as a result of the shock which he delivered through the New York press.

Following the clash of prejudices, racial, sectional and even political in subsequent trials and more particularly in the Patterson conviction, Mr. Leibowitz hied back to New York for an accounting to the agency by whom he was hired and, perhaps, to give vent to his feelings and receive moral support from fellow radicals. In the statement which he issued to a voracious press was this castigation of the twelve Alabamans good and true who sat in judgment upon his negro client:

If you ever saw those creatures; those bigots whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs, whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy, you would not ask how they could do it.

And for that Judge James E. Horton, who was eminently fair during the Patterson trial and who could not have conceivably done otherwise, ordered a motion for indefinite postponement of the Scottsboro cases when trial of the remaining seven defendants was called at Decatur Monday. "No court regardful of its duty to see that trials must be fair and impartial could under such baneful influences permit the trial of this case to proceed at the present time," declared the jurist. "It therefore becomes the duty of this court at the present time to enter of its own motion a continuance of this case until such time when in its judgment a fair and impartial trial may be had."

If Mr. Leibowitz had argued until he was blue in the face, he probably could not have secured such a motion. As it is, however, resumption of the trial has been indefinitely delayed, new prejudices and developments may be cited in advocacy of a change of venue and additional grounds have been provided for appeal to the United States Supreme court should counsel so desire. If the chief of defense counsel, noticeably absent when court reconvened, successfully furthered his cause, unintentionally or deliberately, he can probably stand up under the epithets which are being hurled in his direction. Mr. Leibowitz is mean; Mr. Leibowitz is vicious; Mr. Leibowitz is a bigot himself. Yes, and Mr. Leibowitz may also be quite clever.

They Should Withdraw

CHATTANOOGANS have received a circular letter, signed by one William L. Patterson, who styles himself National Secretary of the International Labor Defense of New York, soliciting funds supposedly to be used in the defense of the boys of Scottsboro, though probably for propaganda purposes.

"On Sunday, April 9," runs this letter, "an all-white jury filed into the Decatur courtroom. With grins on their faces, they delivered a verdict of legal lynching for Haywood Patterson." The letter winds up with an appeal for funds and the objurgation "help save nine innocent Negro Scottsboro boys."

In connection with this letter, it is only necessary to add the statement which Joseph R. Brodsky, one of the International Labor Defense lawyers at Decatur, made in Judge Horton's courtroom last Monday, in attempting to explain the meaning of his associate, Samuel S. Leibowitz's, statement assailing the jury which had heard the Patterson case.

"Leibowitz's view," Brodsky said, "is that, in Decatur and the South, the white workers are imbued with the idea of white supremacy, and that only in union of the white and Negro workers warring against the ruling class can they gain their ends."

Here, in a nutshell, in the words of their own lawyer, is the complete expose of the hypocrisy of these appeals going forth for funds for the International Labor Defense. If these nine boys are executed, the International Labor Defense, with its tactics of trying to use this case as a pretext for preaching class war, can regard itself as their murderer. When there is added to the race phobia which exists the even worse hatred of these agitators of class struggle, it is no wonder that the Scottsboro boys are having a fearful time.

Justice for these nine Negroes accused of a heinous crime, one of which they may not be guilty, cannot be had so long as this Communist agitation insists upon masking itself as their legal defense. If the International Labor Defense really wants justice done these boys, it should immediately withdraw from the case.

Tribune 4-22-33

The Tribune in common, with all our kind, and the fair-minded of every kind, feel furiously indignant at the outrageous verdict rendered at Decatur, Alabama, Sunday, after two weeks' exposure of a palpable frame-up against nine black boys.

Yet, notwithstanding our feelings of indignation, horror, and outrage, we do not see that any practical good can come of a mass march on Washington to lodge a protest with the President, on this matter over which he has no legal control.

Properly worded protests and petitions, asking that he use his good offices to secure proper legal remedies for the injustice thrust upon these boys and upon us, meets the approval of The Tribune. But it would be both unwise and unjust to approach the matter on the implied grounds that the righting of this particular wrong is a prerogative of the President.

Thousands, yea millions, black and white, may and should indicate their indignation and horror by signing these protests and petitions, but a delegation of a dozen is of size sufficient to present them.

Help the I.L.D.; help the N.A.A.C.P., or any organization or group opposing this outrage. Much may be gained by arousing sympathy but nothing by stirring up antagonism where none now exists.

NEWSPAPERS' OPINIONS

A FRAUD EXPOSED

Whatever opinion those who have followed reports of the Scottsboro trial may have reached as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant, the conduct of the defense deserves attention for its own sake. The case has been made a world-wide sensation by the same organized propagandists as were responsible for the furor over the Sacco-Vanzetti and Mooney cases. Although citizens of conscientious motives were drawn into these activities to give them repute, the most persistent and vociferous participants in all cases were communists and radicals of other varieties. Only a very ingenious observer of these proceedings could miss their intent. Pretending to be a defense of innocent individuals from injustice and oppression and an assertion of civil guaranties, the objective aimed at was the disparagement of American courts and the American social conscience.

This has been strikingly exposed in the Scottsboro trial just ended at Decatur, Ala. The attorney brought from New York by the International Labor Defense could not be as tactless as he has been save intentionally. The very fact that he was chosen in place of counsel known and respected in the region in which the trial was to be held was evidence of lack of good faith, of a sincere concern for the fate of the defendant. In and out of court his words and actions have appeared to an impartial observer studiously provocative of local feeling, and the inference must be that he intended not to win his case but deliberately to lose it, to make sure of a martyr for his cause and an excuse for more propaganda. Immediately after the verdict he gave vent to a tirade against the community amid which the trials are being held, and, returning to New York, he publicly described the jury as "those bigots whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs, whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy." Yet he is going south in a few days for the second series of trials. The employment of such an attorney of the defense promises trouble if it does not in fact insure a miscarriage of justice. It shows no regard for the defendants but rather a deliberate determination to bring about their conviction.

At the beginning of the affair the radical agitators descended upon the community in which the trial was to be held, insulting, blatant, insolently prejudicing the case and the character of the agencies of the law. They have shown no consideration for the defendants. Pretending to defend them from mob sentiment and race prejudice, they have done everything possible to inflame both. No Klux fanatic could do more to create conditions in which even-handed justice is impossible than these pretended friends of the oppressed.

Meanwhile the well meaning public of the north has been exhorted to donate money for the support of this murderous proceeding misnamed defense. The Civil Liberties union published advertisements calling for funds to "help give these boys the best possible break at this second trial." Such appeals are frauds. The Civil Liberties union is a fraud. Its managers have no regard for civil liberties except when they can be pleaded for the protection of radical mischief makers and criminals. They are communists and sympathizers with bolshevism, which has destroyed civil liberties wherever it has gained power. The active head of the Civil Liberties union at a meeting of communists in New York has just declared that political democracy is moribund, and he wants a "united front," precious bolshevik phrase, of communists and liberals to fight Fascism. A union of communists and genuine liberals would be a union of the snake and the bird. The Civil Liberties union is such a union. Liberals who support it are either gullibles or they are not liberals. There are no civil liberties remaining except where political democracy exists, and so long as the Civil Liberties union is run as it has been and is, by enemies of democracy, its title is a flagrant hypocrisy which can no longer deceive any but liberal sentimentalists befogged by mere phrases. Even these ought to be shocked at its methods in the Scottsboro affair.—Chicago Tribune.

COMMUNISTS FOOL NOBODY

Strange tactics are resorted to by attorneys in obtaining favorable legal results but when the practice of law is wedded to spreading propaganda for the Communist party in its effort to destroy the existing American government in the red furnace of racial and class hatreds even stranger tactics can be expected.

In this category falls the attack of one Liebowitz, chief counsel in the sordid Scottsboro, Alabama, criminal assault case in which seven negroes are charged with criminally attacking two white women of doubtful character.

With one of his defendants convicted a second time and sentenced to die, Liebowitz hies himself back North and proceeds to berate the jury in particular and Alabama justice in general in such a manner as would prejudice the fair trials of the other six defendants.

It is as though the Communists desired the death of the negroes they were defending in order that the circumstance of their execution might be used as international propaganda further to inflame race hatreds.

The Alabama judge, Mr. Horton, who postponed indefinitely the trials of the other six defendants as a direct result of Liebowitz' outburst has won the commendation of Northern papers for his sensible action.

Sensible people in all sections of the country discover the sinister hand of extreme radicalism in the defense of the Scottsboro negroes; and they realize that the State of Alabama is capable of administering justice within its own borders without outside interference.

This administration of justice in the Southern States is hampered by the effort of the Communists to place themselves in loco parentis to the negro race, a false parentage unwanted by the negroes and capable of producing results of the most dangerous nature.

The Scottsboro Verdict

Ever mindful though it is of the difficulties and dangers attendant upon the trial of cases by persons at a distance, The Citizen confesses its own distress as it surveys what has been happening in Alabama during the past week in the case of the first of the Scottsboro negroes to go on trial for an alleged criminal attack upon a white woman.

That simple justice could be done in an atmosphere such as has prevailed at Decatur is hard to believe. The propaganda which has been waged for the accused negroes has been of a kind calculated to inflame feeling in Alabama against those who have been responsible for it. On the other hand, some of the speeches which were made before the jury by the prosecuting officers were shocking appeals to prejudice. For example, Solicitor Wright's appeal: "Are you going to let Jew money from New York buy justice in Alabama?"

The question of the guilt or innocence of Heywood Patterson, the Chattanooga negro who was on trial, was submerged in a tide of bitterness. Attorney General Knight told the jury, it is true, that the State of Alabama wanted no verdict "based on racial or religious prejudice, and that the case "must be decided on the evidence alone." But he also told the jury that "the name of the State of Alabama has been lynched" and there can be little question of the fact that this feeling is strong in Alabama, so strong as to account for the deep resentment manifested against the outside lawyers and agents for organizations which are intensely disliked in nearly every Southern community anyway.

It is tragic that these negroes could not have had a trial under conditions which would have provided full assurance that their cases would be determined without regard to any extraneous circumstances. What the public at large sees is that one of the two women involved in the case has testified that she perjured herself at the first trial while the other has been described by the presiding judge as "a woman of easy virtue" with evidence before the court that "she made false statements." The conviction of Patterson on the evidence that has been published is an outcome which must be gravely disturbing to a large part of the citizenship of Alabama, deeply offended though these same persons may have been at the manner in which that State has been put in the spotlight.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE

The notorious and revolting Scottsboro case was merely given a new lease of life on the front pages by the verdict convicting one of the defendant negroes for the second time and again sentencing him to electrocution. The legal circus will now play a return engagement over the circuit of appeals to the state supreme court, the United States supreme court and probably a string of retrials.

The frenzied world-wide attention which the case has attracted is all out of proportion to the importance of the transient negroes and white trash who comprise the cast of characters. Normally—and properly—it would be settled with little excitement by the summary southern method employed in matters of that kind. It involves a social problem indigenous to the region. It cannot be understood, much less managed, by outside opinion and rules of law. Left to its own effective devices the South can control the ever-present menace. Interference, however well-intentioned, is almost never helpful and must be firmly resisted. We are lost if we ever let such woozy outfits as the international labor defense take a hand and get away with it.

Had nature been allowed to take its course the case would have been terminated long ago by a justice operating either formally or informally as occasion required. It might have been accompanied by a flare-up of publicity unfavorable to abrupt methods of deterring crimes of the nature involved but at worst what might have happened would be preferable to what has happened. The execution of a human being is a horrid vengeance but there is a thing even more repugnant and those who have to deal with it have learned by fearful experience that temporizing in its punishment is certain to bring tragic consequences.

This is not to condone lynch law. It is merely to point out that lynchings have their genesis in just such provocatives as the Scottsboro spectacle. Two juries have found a defendant guilty of the most atrocious of crimes. But instead of being on his way to the electric chair he sits enthroned as a martyr by a hysterical assortment of crack-brained radicals, fuzzy-minded reformers, habitual publicity seekers and venal lawyers with access to "defense funds."

Talk about your mobs! There's one for you. And the well-behaved negro has more to fear from it than he has from any grim posse of southern white men. Realists of both races understand this fully and join in viewing with alarm any tampering with a system which works all right when it is not subjected to meddlesome interference by misguided or mischievous zealots.

On Thursday the prosecution of the group of negroes indicted for criminally assaulting two white women who were riding side-door Pullmans practically blew up with the admission of one Ruby Bates that her previous testimony was a "hoax." The other woman in the case had testified in this trial as she did in the first one, in a narrative in all points to convince a jury as well as inflame public opinion.

On the original trial, the stories of the two women clicking perfectly, the negroes had been convicted and sentenced to death. Alabama was to have a wholesale execution that would be a record breaker. Appeal to the Alabama Supreme Court resulted in affirmation of the verdict and the sentences. Various organizations having interested themselves in the case, appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. A hearing was granted, and the result was the unusual one of the high court intervening to override judicial decision in a criminal matter by a State.

No comment is necessary as to the character of Miss Ruby and her companion, both of whom had been shown to be just as moral as Mehitabel, the Alley Cat. But their character aside, the story they told pictured an atrocity which in the South is visited with death even though the victim be a prostitute.

The motive for this perjury? Apparently it rested on the idea of revenge for a group of white hoboes who had been overcome in a fight with negroes of the same genre. Two of the defeated contingent were the friends and companions at hobo camps of the two prosecuting witnesses. While Ruby evidently lies as easily as she breathes, her court confession has been supported by medical testimony.

It is difficult to understand how two women—even such as Ruby Bates and Mrs. Price—could have gone the length of attempting to perjure away the lives of a number of innocent men. But the phenomenon is a common experience in the pathology of women—sometimes good as well as bad. Ruby was snatched away to New York by a social worker, "got religion," and confessed to the ever dramatic Rev. Raymond Fosdick, D. D. Lacking the agitation about the case, including Communist outcry, the negroes would have been killed by Alabama for nothing worse than a free-for-all fight with white men not so far removed from their own social status.

The sorry business illustrates the fundamental power of the Supreme Court to do justice, if only litigants have the counsel and the means to catch its ear.

It also serves to give a solemn warning to the South, all too apt to execute judicially, as well as by lynch law, when some psychopathic woman has a day dream and sticks to it on the witness stand.

SHOULD NOT CENSURE

The New York Herald-Tribune under the heading, "A Blow To Justice," says:

"It is useless for any one, either in or out of Alabama, to pretend that the verdict of guilty rendered against the first of the nine Negroes to stand retrial in the Scottsboro cases will not be received with a profound sense of shock by justice-loving Americans.

"The case admittedly presented an extraordinarily difficult problem to the small Northern Alabama community into whose hands it was confided. It had become involved, over a period of two years, with nearly every kind of racial and political prejudice; its history had developed in such a way as to entangle it accidentally in all sorts of extraneous considerations which might interfere with a fair verdict, and the evidence itself was not the sort through which it would be easy to find the straight path of justice.

"The presiding judge did find that pathway, nevertheless. Though evidently feeling himself under strong local pressure to do otherwise, Judge HORTON made every effort to see that the accused was given a fair trial; he emphatically repressed any hint of mob action and guaranteed the protection of the prisoner and his counsel with the lives, if necessary, of the court officers. His charge to the jury was eminently fair in dealing with the evidence, and in its appeal to put aside every consideration save the merits of the case it reflected honor upon the standards of the Alabama bench.

"Its effect, unfortunately, has now been destroyed by the verdict. On the basis of the evidence as reported it is simply impossible to believe that the guilt of the accused was established 'beyond reasonable doubt.' Outside observers cannot tell the State of Alabama or the people of Alabama what they ought to do. One may, however, revert to the Attorney General's declaration that the new trial would demonstrate to the world the impartiality of Alabama justice; and to those Alabamans who are interested in outside opinion it seems legitimate to point out that the actual result has been the precise opposite. The fairness with which the trial itself was conducted only throws into higher relief the astonishing finding—as it will be universally regarded outside of Alabama—of the jury. Whatever the real merits of the case may have been, the fact is that National opinion everywhere will accept this outcome as proof of the impossibility of securing a really just verdict in Alabama in a case of this kind.

"We shall still hope that this conclusion is unwarranted. There are countless high-minded men and women in the State of Alabama sincerely desirous—as was Judge HORTON—of seeing justice done, and sensitive of the regard in which their State is held by National opinion. The right of appeal offers one source of hope, especially in view of the courageous dissent of the Chief Justice of the State upon the appeal from the verdict in the last trial. The Governor's power of commutation and pardon offers a second method of correcting the verdict. Moreover, the present trial concerned only one of the nine defendants. It does not seem too much to ask of Alabama opinion that it insist of its own accord that the venue for the remaining trials be changed from the Northern counties where the public psychology has been so desperately embittered. We believe that it is possible for Alabama to conduct the remaining trials in an atmosphere which will be free from the threats of lynching, the intensity of local issues and local fear and anger which marred the present case, and to arrive, with no outside help, at a verdict which the Nation at large will receive as just and honorable to the State."

This newspaper, not possessed of all facts in the case, its distance from the scene of the trial, and lack of knowledge of the people of Alabama, does the State and the members of the jury which tried PATTERSON an injustice.

Right or wrong, the verdict returned was the findings of the men who heard the evidence from beginning to end. If their findings are in error, they are not to blame. There were many conflicting bits of testimony and the jurors should not be censured for their findings and neither should the people of Alabama be measured by the verdict.

THE HAND OF RUSSIA

That Decatur, Alabama, jury refused to believe the repudiation of the testimony of Miss Ruby Bates, and sentenced one of the nine negroes accused of attacking her to death in the electric chair. Six others await trial. Two have already been remanded to the juvenile courts.

We were of the opinion that the whole case should have been kicked out of court as the figment of the imagination of two women of the oldest profession, but then we were not at the trial and all we knew was the filth we read in the papers.

Execution of seven negroes in Alabama would not leave the world in general either better or worse off and it appears that the women who claimed they were attacked had little virtue to lose. It is with neither the negroes nor the women that we are interested.

What is of importance is the interest which the International Labor Defense has taken in the matter, an interest which is pointed at making the "Scottsboro Case" rival in interest the Sacco-Vanzetti cases, or the Gastonia shootings.

This organization makes a specialty of pouncing upon and injecting itself into any case which offers the opportunity of being exploited in such a manner as to arouse racial hatreds and stir up the passions of class against class.

It is patiently and almost patently laying the groundwork of the revolution which it hopes Russia will some day be able to bring about in America. It seeks to gain the sympathy of the riff-raff of both races and to inculcate into their minds a deep-seated hatred for those who through superior ambition and superior energy have amassed more of the world's goods.

The negroes and the women are just pawns or puppets in the world scheme of Red Russia to reduce all people to a common denominator.

"The lynchers of the South, the landlords and mill owners, whose system of oppression and terror against the negro people and the poor whites has been most sharply challenged in the fight to save the lives of the Scottsboro boys are determined to murder them.

"These rulers of the South have common interest with the rulers of the North. The United States Supreme Court is the common tool of both."

Probably Mr. Patterson would like no better publicity than to be thrown into jail for contempt of court for making such a statement. Perhaps the best cure for him would be to put him on a boat and ship him back to Russia where he could enjoy himself in a land of free speech and perfect justice.

Heywood Patterson, one of nine negroes for whom the Supreme Court ordered a new trial, is sentenced to death after the jury had deliberated nearly 24 hours. He and the eight other negroes are accused of a crime against two white women, a crime punished by death in Alabama.

One of the women who formerly accused the men swore at Patterson's recent trial that he and the other negroes were innocent, had never molested her or the second woman. The Rev. Dr. Fosdick, of New York, she said, persuaded her to tell the truth. The second woman swore that the nine, Patterson included, were guilty, as she had sworn at the first trial.

Six of the other negroes will be tried, one at a time, with one woman presumably swearing to their guilt, the other swearing to their innocence. The remaining two defendants are minors. The strange thing, which makes the case unusual, is that the Southern judge, in his jury charge, describes both women as "women of the underworld" They were traveling in a freight car with hoboes at the time the crime is alleged to have been committed.

Decatur Jury Seals Doom Of Heywood Patterson For Scottsboro Attack

Demonstration Lacking As Decision Is Announced; Second Trial Underway

By T. M. DAVENPORT
Associated Press Staff Writer

DECATUR, ALA., Dec. 1.—(AP)—In a court room so quiet the sound of men breathing could be heard, the third verdict of death late today was returned by a jury against Heywood Patterson, 21-year-old Chattanooga negro Scottsboro defendant who was charged with attacking a white woman.

The silence was electric as Walter Green, clerk of the court, read the verdict "we the jury find the defendant guilty as charged, and fix his punishment at death."

The negro who twice before has heard identical words read into his case, appeared unmoved.

He was tried on an indictment charging an attack on Mrs. Victoria Price, aboard a Southern freight train on March 25, 1931.

There was not the slightest sign of a demonstration and the spectators who filled every available seat waited until the jury, which was discharged by Judge W. W. Callahan immediately, had filed from the courtroom.

The noise of shifting feet, coughs, and low talk that made a medley of sound, stopped instantly as the knock on the room adjoining the court, where the jury had been deliberating, sounded in the court room.

Judge W. W. Callahan was preparing to swear in a jury, just struck for the trial of Clarence Norris, second of the defendants to be called to trial here on charges of attacking Mrs. Price, a Huntsville mill worker, when the knock sounded at 5 p.m. and it was 10 minutes later before the jury, grave of face, and slow of step, filed in.

Negro Hears Verdict

Patterson had been brought from the ail, surrounded by six deputies sheriffs, and sat watching intently as the new jury was sworn in.

Norris, seated beside him, also showed interest in the procedure. Both negroes were removed from the courtroom after the verdict was read, before the crowd was permitted to move, and as their footfalls died away in the hall, the spectators trooped out.

Samuel S. Leibowitz, of New York, chief of counsel retained by the International Labor Defense in behalf of the negroes, asked when Judge Callahan would pass sentence and announced he would file a motion for a new trial which, if denied, will be a step toward the United States Supreme Court.

It was to the highest tribunal in the nation that the fight against the first death sentences imposed on Patterson and his co-defendants was carried after the Alabama Supreme Court had affirmed the decision of the Jackson County Circuit Court.

It was after the United States Supreme Court had held that the negroes did not have the benefit of adequate counsel that a change of venue from Jackson County to Morgan was granted.

The testimony in the Norris trial largely will be the same as that in the Patterson trial, as both sides have called the same witnesses.

Girl's Testimony

The defense however has interrogatories from Ruby Bates, companion of Mrs. Price on a hobo trip on which the attacks were alleged to have occurred, who last Spring made a sensational appearance in Patterson's second trial, to repudiate her former testimony.

She denied that she was molested in the slightest by the defendant.

The jury sworn tonight for the trial of Norris, like the one that convicted Patterson, consists largely of farmers and was completed only after several special venires were called.

The personnel of the jury is: Phil Humphrey, of Decatur, a salesman; George Dinsmore, of Eva, farmer; W. C. Martin, of Joppa, farmer; Albert M. Peck, of Summerville, farmer; W. S. Carpenter, of Decatur, a carpenter; Andrew E. Stimson, of Eva, farmer; George C. Kelly, of Eva, farmer; John W. Tomlinson, Jr., of Falkville, merchant; John . Moody, of Decatur, oil man; Walter H. Lodd, of Decatur, railroad man; L. H. McDaniel, of Joppa, a farmer; Burl Vesta, of Falkville, merchant.

Neither Leibowitz nor Atty. Gen. Knight, who directed the prosecution had any comment on the verdict.

The jury which was out 25 hours and 10 minutes, was given the case at 3 p.m. yesterday and after three hours of deliberation was locked up for the night.

Five Other Defendants

In addition to Norris, in whose case testimony will get under way tomorrow, five other defendants are scheduled for trial at this term of court while the remaining two have been adjudged juveniles and are now in custody of the Juvenile Court of Jackson County.

Leibowitz, basing his motion on the number of "fixed opinions," among veniremen called up for qualification late this afternoon, again sought a change of venue. Leibowitz claimed the defendant could not get a "fair trial" and that the number of disqualifications for "fixed opinions" sustained his contention.

Judge Callahan, presiding, however, ruled that the honesty of prospective jurymen in stating they had fixed opinions, indicated that the defendant could obtain a fair trial and overruled the motion.

The motion was made just after the 29th venireman had been qualified, and two more names were drawn from the jury box in an effort to obtain the 30 men necessary for a panel before a jury can be struck.

More than 125 veniremen had been called and a large percentage had been excused for fixed opinions.

Norris, like Patterson, faces a charge of attacking Mrs. Price aboard a Southern Railway freight train as it wound through the mountains in Jackson County. They also are under indictments charging attacks on Ruby Bates, a Huntsville mill worker and companion of Mrs. Price on a hobo trip to Chattanooga and return.

Attack Denied

The Bates girl, after testifying in 1931 that she was attacked, returned here last Spring and repudiated her former testimony, declaring that she had not been mistreated.

In examining veniremen today Leibowitz questioned them at length on their knowledge of the case, reading of the accounts in newspapers, and talks with their neighbors, and as to their willingness to accept circumstantial evidence. He also asked if they held racial prejudice that would influence a verdict.

Judge Callahan put to each group a question as to whether the race of the defendant would preclude fair and impartial weighing of the evidence in event they were finally accepted to serve.

The State in the Patterson trial called Mrs. Price and Orvel Gilley, of Albertville, Ala., a "wandering entertainer" who was aboard the train as the principal material witnesses. Both said Patterson attacked the woman. Additional witnesses were called who testified as to seeing a fight between white and negro youths as the train passed their farms or where they happened to be working.

Leibowitz placed the only medical testimony in the record, calling Dr. R. R. Bridges, of Scottsboro, who was subpoenaed by the State to the stand. The physician testified Mrs. Price showed no marks of violence and no blood on her face, but had small scratches on one wrist and on one forearm and some small bruises on her back.

Patterson On Stand

Patterson took the stand and while admitting participating in the fight, denied he had attacked Mrs. Price, or that he was even aware that there were any women on the train.

Willie Roberson, Olen Montgomery, Andy Wright and Ozie Powell, also took the stand, and denied seeing any women aboard the train.

Several witnesses to corroborate the story of the negroes and to impeach Mrs. Price's testimony, were called by the defense.

Exchanges of witticisms between Judge Callahan and Leibowitz brightened the monotonous qualification proceedings for the spectators who filled practically every seat throughout the day, waiting for the jury to report.

Not Yet Able to Make Deposition for the Scottsboro Boys

NEW YORK.—Ruby Bates, Scottsboro defense witness, was resting easily in New York Hospital yesterday, after undergoing a major operation Friday, the International Labor Defense announced, but she is not yet out of danger.

It is doubtful whether she will be in a condition for several days, to make a deposition answering the questions drawn up by Attorney-General Thomas E. Knight of Alabama, and Joseph R. Brodsky, I. L. D. lawyer, in regard to her testimony at the trial of Heywood Patterson last spring, when she recanted her previous forced testimony of "rape" and became the chief defense witness, it was said. Julius Appelbaum, of 32 Broadway, has been commissioned by the Decatur court to take this deposition.

FIELD DAY FOR THE I. L. D.

Doubtless your nerves grated over the grandstand play staged by Samuel Leibowitz, chief counsel for the Scottsboro "boys," in the form of a 37-dollar telegram to President Roosevelt at Warm Springs which concluded as follows:

> Probability of massacre of defendants and attorneys extremely grave. We urge your intervention.

Leibowitz, of course, quite fully realized that the President had no right whatever to order Federal troops to a court in a sovereign State; he knew, moreover, that the President wouldn't do it, even if he had the authority. Leibowitz was after more notoriety of the stinking sort.

Judge W. W. Callahan, who will preside over the trial of the poor "boys" does not believe that National Guardsmen are necessary to prevent a "massacre," so he refuses to call out the Guard. However, possibly because of a sense of humor, he assigned a couple of deputies to follow Leibowitz and his buddies around in case some of what Leibowitz himself described as "bigots with tobacco juice running down their chins" feel the urge to massacre.

Despite every effort of decent Alabamians to give the Negroes a fair trial, it appears that the I. L. D. again will attempt to convert the case into a circus. Well, every circus must be paid for, and the bill for the one impending probably will be rendered the poor wretches on trial for their lives.

And the Leibowitzes? What do these degenerates of the legal profession care? After all, they are heroes to the half-wits of Harlem.

11-29-33

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 28 (AP) — Heywood Patterson today denied he attacked Mrs. Victoria Price after he again had been identified as one of seven Negroes who assaulted her and Ruby Bates on a northern Alabama freight train in 1931.

Patterson was the third witness called by the defense and under questioning by Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of counsel, said he "didn't see a woman on the train and didn't have anything to do with any woman."

The Negro was called after the state had rested with the testimony of Orvel Gilley, who identified him as one of the seven Gilley said had attacked the two Huntsville, Ala., mill workers in his presence following a fight in which other white youths were hurled from the train.

Previously Mrs. Price had identified Patterson as the first to attack her.

Patterson is the first of the Negroes to be retried in Morgan circuit court under a change of venue from Jackson county where all of them were convicted and sentenced to death on April 9, 1931. The United States supreme court set the verdicts aside and ordered new trials.

Gilley Describes Fight

Patterson was tried here last spring and was again convicted but the death sentence was set aside by Judge James E. Horton who presided.

In an easy manner Gilley on direct examination told of boarding the train with Mrs. Price, Ruby Bates, both irls clad in overalls, and Lester Carter and of having moved to the gondola car where the attacks were alleged to have taken place when the train stopped at Stevenson, Ala.

Gilley said as the train pulled out a group of Negroes piled into the car and ordered him and the other white youths out. A fight ensued he said, and several of the white boys were thrown from the train.

After that, he said, the Negroes attacked both women and desisted when he interceded with one of them who was armed with a pistol to make the others stop "before they killed that woman."

His own life had been threatened if he attempted to interfere, Gilley said.

Cross Examination Is Prolonged

Direct examination of Gilley by Solicitor H. E. Bailey of Boaz, who prosecuted in the original trials lasted but 15 minutes but cross examination by Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of counsel for the Negroes retained by the International Labor Defense, lasted for two hours and 40 minutes.

Under Leibowitz's examination Gilley, who appeared on the witness stand clad in a worn and unpressed blue suit, identified himself as a "wandering entertainer," who recited poetry on the streets, in hotel lobbies and other places and "took up collections."

The youth is tall, ruddy faced, with tousled black hair and his replies to questions frequently caused ripples of laughter through the courtroom in which every seat was taken.

During the cross examination Leibowitz sought several times to get into the record events in a "hobo jungle" in Chattanooga, Tenn., in the Patterson trial last spring. Carter, identified as "the Knoxville Kid" testified Gilley himself and the two women spent the night in the "jungle" before starting the trip on which the attacks are alleged to have occurred.

Mathematics Applied By Leibowitz In Efforts To Contradict Testimony

DECATUR, ALA., Dec. 2.—(AP)—Surprise witnesses and new turns in the evidence of previous witnesses this afternoon, broke the monotonous recital of testimony in the trial of Clarence Norris, second of the seven defendants in the "Scottsboro case" to face a jury here on charges of attacking two white women.

The State called two men who did not testify in the trial of Heywood Patterson, who for the third time, was convicted and sentenced to death yesterday, and the defense battling to keep Norris from a second conviction, applied mathematics to testimony of several witnesses to show contradictions in the evidence.

Norris was brought to trial on an indictment charging an attack on Mrs. Victoria Price, Huntsville mill worker, and her companion, Ruby Bates, aboard a Southern Railway freight train in Jackson County on March 25, 1931.

He was convicted on a similar charge at Scottsboro in April 1931, but the United States Supreme Court set aside the verdict in his case, as well as those of his co-defendants, and the cases were brought here under change of venue.

The afternoon session started much as the forenoon with a recital of substantially the same testimony by witnesses that was offered in the forenoon, until W. H. Branum, called by the State, took the stand.

Branum on Stand

On direct examination Branum identified himself as a member of the Paint Rock posse that was organized to arrest the negroes on charges of throwing five youths off the train near Stevenson, Ala.

"Did you see any women get off the train?" he was asked by Atty. Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., on direct examination.

"Yes, sir," replied Branum, "I saw between two cars a woman sink to the ground."

He was asked about the number of negroes and then was asked if he could identify Norris, seated behind his counsel, as one of the negroes.

"He looks to be," said Branum, "but I could not be positive."

Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of counsel, retained for the negroes by the International Labor Defense, was meticulous as to Branum's position beside the train in his cross-examination.

Using a counsel table to demonstrate, he placed the station at Paint Rock, the water tank and the coal chute, where the locomotive stopped, and asked Branum to designate his position.

Branum said he was uncertain of the distance, but he was beyond the water tank from the station when he saw the woman sink to the ground.

Previous witnesses had placed the gondola from which Mrs. Price said she got off the train about 70 feet back of the locomotive which had stopped at the coal chute.

Merchant Called

Immediately after Branum left the stand, the State called Arthur J. Woodall, Stevenson merchant, and deputy sheriff at the time the negroes were arrested, to bring back into evidence the knife ruled out in the forenoon.

Woodall identified the knife as one he and C. F. Simmons, chief deputy sheriff of Jackson County, who followed him to the stand, had taken from Norris. Woodall identified Norris in the court room.

"Did you ask where he got it?" Knight asked.

"I said he took it from one of the white girls," Woodall replied.

Leibowitz's cross-examination consisted merely of reading from the record of the Patterson trial last Spring.

Leibowitz read questions and answers in which twice Woodall had testified he could not identify the negro from which he had taken the knife.

Simmons was positive in his identification of Norris as the negro from whom the knife was taken.

Montgomery Ala.

"Where did he say he got the knife?" Knight asked.

"He said it was his," Simmons replied.

An effort to identify an apparent confession was ruled out by Judge Callahan and Leibowitz's cross-examination consisted of only one question, "This is the first time you have testified in these trials, is it not?"

"Yes," replied Simmons.

Testimony Repeated

Lee Adams and Sam Mitchell, the latter a negro farm hand, were called by the State and related their previous testimony that within two miles of Stevenson they had seen the fight between the negroes and the white boys.

Arthur Rossau gave the testimony of the previous trials that he had been a member of the posse arresting the negroes, and that he had seen Mrs. Price and Ruby Bates, beneath a shade tree near the tracks.

Twc defense witnesses, R. S. Turner, conductor, and Percy Ricks, negro fireman, were called out of order, to permit them to return to work.

Through questioning of Ricks, Leibowitz established the gondola car in which Mrs. Price said she was attacked, as being about 700 feet behind the locomotive and beyond the station at Paint Rock in the direction of Stevenson.

"Did you see any women get off that train?" Leibowitz asked.

"Yes, sir, I saw two get off and run toward the locomotive," Ricks replied. He said they got off a gondolar car, but not the same one Mrs. Price had indicated in the forenoon.

"Did you see any negroes taken from that train?" was another question.

"Yes, sir, I saw some of the posse take two out of a box car near the tank car," Ricks replied.

Snuff Box Found

On direct examination Turner said he found a snuff box in the third or fourth of the string of eight gondola cars, the last of which Mrs. Price testified she rode.

Turner said he saw two women, one holding the head of the other in her lap, beneath the shade tree near the station.

In the forenoon in more than two hours on the stand, Mrs. Price for the third time in a Decatur court room told the sordid story of the attack and identified Norris as one of her attackers. She said she, with Ruby Bates, who has repudiated her story, boarded an oil tank car at Chattanooga, and moved forward to the gondola at Stevenson.

As the train left Stevenson, she said the negroes piled into the car and in a fight threw five white boys off. Orvel Gilley, of Albertville, the next State witness, she said, climbed back and witnessed the attacks that followed.

Leibowitz centered his one hour and twenty minutes of cross-examination in trying to break down her story and laid a predicate to recall Dr. R. R. Bridges for whom an attachment was issued today when he failed to appear as a witness.

The physician was subpoenaed by the State in the Patterson trial, but was put on the stand by the defense. Leibowitz asked repeated questions concerning scratches, bruises, lacerations and other hurts on Mrs. Price.

Her answers frequently were "kinda" and "a little," when asked if her face was scratched, or she was bruised.

The case probably will reach a jury late Monday.

PATTERSON JURY HELD OVERNIGHT

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 30. (AP)—Twelve Morgan county citizens, who after three hours of deliberation had not reached a verdict in the trial of Heywood Patterson, one of seven Negro defendants in the Scottsboro case, were ordered locked up for the night at 6 p. m. (C. S. T.) by Judge W. W. Callahan, presiding.

It was the third time the Negro had kept watch while 12 men deliberated on evidence for and against him on a charge of which he denied vigorously from the witness stand.

And while that jury deliberated in Patterson's case, a new jury was being qualified in the court room, to sit in judgment on Clarence Norris, who also is charged with participating in an alleged mass attack on Mrs. Price and her companion, Ruby Bates, aboard a Southern railway freight train in Jackson county, March 25, 1931.

Judge's Charge Is Prolonged

In a lengthy charge, which took nearly an hour and a half, Judge W. W. Callahan, who presided, went into the law governing the case, defining the crime and covering the weighing of evidence.

"You must be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of this defendant," said Judge Callahan, "or should return a verdict of acquittal. If, however, you are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt, your verdict should be one of guilty."

The jurist instructed the jury that in event of a verdict of guilty, the jury could fix the punishment at death, or from 10 years imprisonment to life.

After he had completed his charge at 3:01 p. m., Judge Callahan held the jury for a few minutes to add to his charge, as Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of defense counsel, retained by the International Labor Defense, called his attention to omission of the form of a verdict for acquittal. The jury retired at [illegible] p. m.

"Gentlemen," said the judge in picking up his charge again, "I have cautioned you throughout my charge, to be sure beyond a reasonable doubt . . . I have told you if there isn't sufficient evidence to convict, then it is your duty to acquit."

The two principal points for it to decide, the jury was told, was whether a crime had been committde and then whether the defendant committed it.

ROOSEVELT'S SECRETARY HEDGES ON SCOTTSBORO DELEGATION'S DEMANDS

Daily Worker
5-4-33

Howe Tries to Bluff Committee; Plans for the Scottsboro March Moving Forward

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 3.—President Roosevelt will "consider" the demand of the National Scottsboro Action Committee that he receive a delegation of the Scottsboro marchers on Monday, May 8, while he rests over Sunday on the presidential yacht—but he is not likely to consider the fundamental rights of 12,000,000 Negroes of sufficient importance to see the representatives of the marchers.

That was the answer given yesterday by Roosevelt's secretary and advisor, Louis Howe, to a request for an appointment for the delegation, Monday at 2 p. m.

New York

Aim to Present Demands

The delegation to see Roosevelt plan to present him on behalf of the Scottsboro Marchers to be assembled in Washington that day, with a demand for the release of the Scottsboro boys and the "Bill of Civil Rights." The purpose of the Bill is to put teeth into the enforcement of the 13th, 14th and 15th amendment to the U. S. Constitution, which are supposed to guarantee the democratic rights of the Negro people.

Yesterday's delegation consisted of Samuel C. Patterson, chairman of the National Scottsboro Action Committee; William N. Jones, editor of the Baltimore Afro-American; Frank Spector, assistant national secretary of the International Labor Defense; Bernard Ades and Dr. Albert Blumberg of the Baltimore Action Committee, Richard B. Moore, of the League of Struggle for Negro Rights, and Elinor Mish and Louis Colman of the Boston and New York National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners.

Does Not "Approve" of March

Howe said he did not "approve" of the march, and declared that it "smacks of bullying." The reason Roosevelt cannot see any delegates May 8, Howe said, is that "he is seeing only those he sends for," such as foreign delegates and representatives of foreign governments and those members of our government whom he "wishes to consult about pending legislation."

"As for the Scottsboro case, that is still in the courts," Howe said, fashioning an elaborate alibi for the Democratic Party lynch rulers of Alabama. "And you know our constitution—it does not allow the President to interfere with such a thing. If the final verdict is adverse when the courts are through, that will be an entirely different matter. At this stage of the game, to infer that at the end you are not going to get justice is unfair, and it doesn't look right. The State of Alabama would resent it and would be perfectly justified in resenting it."

Tries to Evade Issue

Roosevelt's lieutenant began to count off on his fingers the branches of government, the Legislative, the Administrative and the Judicial. "You see," he told the Committee, "the President cannot interfere with either the Legislative or the Judicial."

At this point a member of the Scottsboro Delegation spoke up and called Howe's attention to the fact that since Roosevelt's inauguration he has taken dictatorial authority regardless of any department of the government. No objection was raised to this, the delegate pointed out, because the measures put forward were on behalf of the bankers and other financial interests.

Roosevelt's secretary passed this by, however, and blandly continued: "I will take your petition (referring to the statement of the committee) and put it before the President. He will read it, as he reads all these things. What will probably happen will be that he will take this with him on Sunday when he goes out on the waters to attend all the multitudinous things that he cannot take care of during the week."

Promises Answer Monday

When pressed, however, Howe said he would give an answer to the request of the committee for an appoinment with President Roosevelt on Monday Morning.

Regarding the Bill of Civil Rights, Roosevelt's secretary sought to evade this issue by "advising" the Scottsboro Committee to "present it to someone in Congress and get it introduced." That, he said, "is the proper way to do it."

Pressed again and it being pointed out to Howe that the President frequently asks congress to enact measures, Howe agreed to present the bill to Mr. Roosevelt.

"This is a pretty hopeless sort of a time to bring this bill up," Howe said solemnly. "Congress is chiefly engaged in seeing how soon they can get home before the weather gets hot. This is not a regular session. In a regular session they might take this up. You get my point? Now I can only say I'm sorry. The rule the President has laid down on the Bonus March is that everyone has the right to petition so long as it is orderly."

Ruby Bates, who denied that either she or Victoria Price were attacked by the Scottsboro boys, when she appeared as a star witness in the trial of Haywood Patterson, will be one of the principal speakers at a send-off mass meeting for the Scottsboro Marchers to be held tomorrow night at the St. Nicholas Arena, 66th St. and Columbus Ave. (Photo courtesy, N. CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
APR 27 1933

THE TRIALS AT DECATUR, ALABAMA.

Judge James E. Horton at Decatur, Ala., has ordered the indefinite postponement of the trial of the seven Negroes in the internationally notorious case before him. One of the defendants, tried a second time, is again under sentence of death. The judge postponed the other trials for the protection of the defendants from the consequences of comment charged to their attorney, the New York lawyer, Leibowitz.

A characterization of the jury attributed to the defense lawyer upon his return to New York was circulated in Alabama and Judge Horton said that it could make little difference whether the attorney actually said it or not. The effect would be to increase the prejudice against the accused and prevent the conduct of a fair trial.

In nearly every circumstance this case has given alarm for the processes of law, and the defense itself has been guilty of indiscretions and of offenses prejudicial to the accused. The community sentiment is about as far from the judicial temperament as a popular mood could be anywhere. Judge Horton's conduct has apparently been irreproachable, but the feeling throughout the community has been one of such instinctive prejudice that a balancing of evidence was almost impossible. Into a situation so charged with everything to make a fair trial highly improbable, the defense, conducted mainly from New York, has thrown other excitements and prejudices, social, racial and political. The victims of these malign combinations have been the accused.

Justice could have hoped that members of the southern bar, as dispassionate and high minded as Judge Horton himself seems to be, would have undertaken the defense and have used their knowledge of local predispositions, passions, and instincts to have preserved the defendants from the consequences of excited hatreds. It is well known that an alien cannot enter a community and in defending an accused person indict the entire society which has brought him to trial. The defense lawyers attempted to do this and the consequences may be fatal to the accused. The defense for purposes of its own put the southern white on trial, and the southern white voted himself not guilty by voting a death penalty for the Negro. Mr. Leibowitz, with the consequences of ~~this before~~ before him, seems to have redoubled his energy in indicting the community again. Whatever chance the remaining defendants had was immediately swept away, in the opinion of the presiding judge, who gave them the only protection he could by postponing the other trials. At the best these men, accused of such a crime, had a small chance. That chance could have been nurtured for what it was worth by southern lawyers solicitous for the reputation of southern justice. It could not be promoted by hysteria in other parts of the country seeking to make a celebrated case of community barbarism and social and political terrorism. Such indictments, however much justice they might have, should be reserved for an abstract discussion and should not have involved in them the jeopardy of persons with their lives at stake.

In justification the defense relies upon the record made to show the exclusion of colored jurymen in Alabama courts, trusting that the conclusions must appear imperative to the United States Supreme court.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE

Handling of the Scottsboro ~~Negro rape case~~ has so far been an abject failure. Racial hatred, emotional horse-play, and a complete miscarriage of justice have made the simple principle of fair play of no importance at all.

As long as there remains a shred of doubt that the Negroes so charged actually assaulted two white girls of questionable repute then the death penalty placed against these men flaunts itself as a cruel display of bigotry in the face of American justice.

American justice says that a man is innocent under the law until he has been proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. As long as there is serious doubt in the Scottsboro case, it will be added to the long list of cases in which the will to persecute governed minds of men disordered and confused by the hatred that was bred in them.

For a resident of Wisconsin to judge the guilt or innocence of the Scottsboro Negroes would be impossible. It is also unnecessary. What the fair-minded individual can ascertain, however, is the justice or injustice of the methods employed in convicting the Negroes.

The United States supreme court reprimanded the entire state of Alabama for the conduct of the famous rape case. Unprejudiced persons must take the same view. The Negroes were rushed to their doom without proper counsel. They were intimidated by the militia. The jurors were never likely to view the charges impartially and without bias. The fate of the Negroes was decided before the right to judge them had been reached.

Outrageous pleas were made by counsel on both sides. Defense counsel deliberately antagonized the jury by calling the citizens of Alabama "lantern jawed morons and lynchers." The prosecution asked that the Negro boys be sent to the chair to teach New York and its Jews to keep out of Alabama affairs.

The merits of the case were hardly touched. Until they have been presented fairly and without prejudice, the Scottsboro proceedings will remain a black blotch on the escutcheon of American justice. — Manitowoc Herald-Times.

A BITTER DENUNCIATION

The latest debacle in the Scottsboro case serves to illustrate the resentment that is almost invariably aroused at what is regarded as outside interference in the matter of handling state or local justice. Judge J. E. Horton, presiding at the second trials of the negroes accused of attacking two white women on a freight train, summarily stopped proceedings at Decatur with the declaration that a fair trial at this time would be impossible.

This action following the publication in the Decatur Daily of a statement from Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, Jr., in which the prosecutor took issue with a purported statement of defense attorney Samuel S. Leibowitz as printed in a New York paper. Leibowitz was quoted as saying, in reply to a question as to how the jury found guilty Heywood Patterson, the first of the negroes facing re-trial, "If you ever saw those creatures; those bigots whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs, whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy, you would not ask how they could do it."

We admit our great surprise that this negro, Heywood Patterson, was convicted and sentenced to death at the second trial when one of the women whom the negroes were accused of attacking admitted on the stand that she was lying at the first trial. Furthermore she swore at this second trial that the negroes did not assault her and, in so far as she knew, did not attack her companion either. This woman was, of course, the worst type of perjurer any way we may look at the matter, and under circumstances like this, and in the face of evidence like this, we confess our surprise that a defendant should be sentenced to death.

Perhaps, had the defense employed local council, the result of the trial might have been different. Perhaps this Mr. Leibowitz forgets the possibility that he might have himself—his own tactics and his own court generalship—to blame, when he is berating the jury which decided this case against his client. Perhaps, for various and sundry reasons, this Mr. Leibowitz was the wrong man to employ in this case.

At any rate, if Leibowitz has been quoted correctly, we would say that his harangue directed at the jury in the case is extraordinary and hardly in accordance with what we would term the best of legal etiquette. We might add that justice isn't confined exclusively to that narrow strip of Atlantic seaboard which claims the Hudson river as its western limit. Man is not infallible; we all err. Yet, taking things by and large, we would say that there is just as much justice in the South as anywhere else in the United States, and that our courts below the Mason and Dixon line are just as fair as those above the line.

We pray for justice in the matter of these negroes; yet we believe the sovereign state of Alabama is just as capable of meting out justice, and just as anxious to mete out justice, as any other state in the Union. We are not surprised that Alabama resents the insinuations of veiled accusations of outside organizations, like the Civic Liberties Union.

LEIBOWITZ YELLOW AND NARROW.

Samuel S. Leibowitz, communistic jew lawyer went to Decatur, Alabama in the famous Scottsboro rape case with the intention of making a Clarence Darrow out of himself. He showed less sense than Balaam's ass of Biblical fame and went back to New Yawk hollering instead of heehawing. Leibiwitsky gave out the follow statement concerning the people of Alabama: "If you ever saw those creatures, those bigots, whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like a frog's chin, whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy, you would not ask how they could do it (convict a negro rapist.) When I got back home I felt that I needed a moral, mental and physical bath."

Comment on the above outburst is not necessary. All we have to say is this: He should be compelled to try the other six cases. And as he has so viciously insulted the white people, while trying these cases he should be compelled to live with and among the negros.

And to the negroes we wish to say: that as fast as you become communist you had better get the hell out of here and go to New Yawk and call on your brother Leibowitz.

Since Leibowitz has shown himself in his true light, we think more of Hitler who objected to having two thousand Jew lawyers in Berlin and ruled that one thousand would be enough.

Preservation of Racial Purity

For the second time one of the group of negroes who criminally attacked two young women on a freight train near Scottsboro, Ala., has been convicted and sentenced to death. The second trial was made necessary, by the action of the U. S. Supreme Court in overruling the first conviction [illegible] case for a new hearing. So, the prisoner has been afforded not only the constitutional right to a new trial [illegible] of a change of venue from the scene of the crime and from the occasio[illegible]local prejudice. Under these conditions the second conviction should, but will not, stop all radical agitation that made use of the previous convictions to launch a general attack upon our existing form of government.

In the new trial of the first of the prisoners even the chastity of the two women victims was made an issue, as if this amounted to anything against their right to protection from physical violence. Since we have gotten beyond the day of the stern Mosaic or other primitive code of laws under which the woman who sinned was subject to being stoned to death, the attempt to set up the victim's lack of chastity as justification for the forcible and violent attack upon them is neither pertinent nor just. Happily the new jury under a change of venue from the scene of the crime has repudiated this resort to legal atavism.

In order to conform with the academic requirements of wholly impartial and impersonal justice that no question of race or color should enter into the second hearing the court went even further than it should have been necessary to go. No factor in the dispensation of justice can be more important or more powerful than that of simple honesty. And simple honesty demands the assertion that the preservation of racial purity is a much more vital need than the preservation of racial equality. In the Scottsboro cases the two most important issues have been and still are the right of every individual to protection against unlawful violence and the preservation of the natural instinct for racial purity. This instinct is unaffected by delinquencies among individuals of the race. The fundamental demand is that the principle of racial inviolability be preserved regardless of any and all circumstances.

If you say that this is a prejudice, then you must admit that it is an equal prejudice to oppose sexual relationships between blood kin. The principle of racial purity underlies both cases. As a matter of fact it can be asserted with equal truth that every regulation limiting or curbing the natural instincts of human beings is a prejudice on the part of those denominating and enforcing such regulations. No human mind, not even that of any member of the United States Supreme Court, is free of preconceived notions and of beliefs reasoned out from elemental conceptions.

Instead of trying to avoid the issue or controvert the fact of the invincible belief in the vital need for racial purity the necessity for such should have been accepted. It is above and beyond and entirely distinct from the issue of racial equality in all other things. The negroes are denied no right not granted to them in equal measure through the assertion of racial purity. It is always better to be honest, and honesty should be more effective than plain evasion in the establishment of broad justice. So far as guaranteed rights are concerned the convicted man in the Scottsboro case has been granted greater latitude than 99 out of 100 convicted criminals.

The decree of the new court should be enforced without molestation or unnecessary delay.

7000 in Parade; 20,000 Cheering Workers Line Streets Protesting Verdict

By ROBERT MINOR

CHICAGO, April 15 (By Air Mail)—The principal streets of Chicago's South Side during the whole of this (Saturday) afternoon rang with the shouts and cheers of 7,000 demonstrato[illegible] the release of the innocent Negro boys framed up and condemned to [illegible]o, Ala., and calling [illegible] Crow discrimination in Chicago. The demonstrat[illegible]by the recent second conviction of Haywood Patterson, 19-year-old Negro boy, by an Alabama lynch court and by a campaign now being carried on for Negro rights in Chicago.

Negro and White.

About half of the marchers were white workers and half were Negroes. More than 20,000 friendly spectators cheered the parade and many hundreds joined its columns from the sidewalk in the course of the march.

In the forenoon the downtown streets were jammed by a parade of unpaid teachers.

After proceeding from 33rd to 50th St. in a circuitous route through the jim-crowed, double-rent section inhabited by Negroes, the Scottsboro demonstration halted in front of the naked and rusting steel framework that was to have been the Wendel Phillips School, the construction of which has been abandoned by the city government as a "needless" expense as the school had been in[illegible] for Ne[illegible]

Speakers representing many organizations here addressed the meeting [illegible] lease of the Scottsboro boys, for support of the Free Mooney Congress which will open in Chicago April 30 and demanding that all workers' organizations, and also the National Association for Advancement of Colored People, the Universal Negro Improvement Association, and the religious organizations give their organized support of the Scottsboro boys and Mooney by participating in the coming huge May Day Parade, which is to wind up at the Chicago Stadium mass meeting in conjunction with the session of the Free Mooney Congress on May 1.

Many organizations participated in today's demonstration, although not in a sufficiently organized manner

By unanimous vote of the demonstration, a motion was passed that the successful carrying through in Chicago of the campaign to save the Scottsboro boys depended upon the immediate strengthening of the International Labor Defense in this city by 300 new members. The motion having carried, the crowd of workers on the street thereupon proceeded to fulfill it by themselves enlisting the 300; about 350 volunteering.

Negro children on the sidelines chanted as the parade passed, "No work, no rent, no work, no rent. . ." The demonstration passed through rows of wooden houses, the doors, floors and even side-walls of which have been torn off to be used as fuel by the unemployed during the winter.

A feature of the parade which attracted greatest attention was a pair of baby carriages side by side, one pushed by a Negro mother, with her baby, the other by a white working-class mother with hers.

A Negro boy and a white girl carried together a banner demanding the united struggle of Negro and white masses to save the innocent youths condemned to die in Alabama. Chairman Lightfood and Secretary Newhoff of the International Labor Defense made stirring addresses, followed by a representative of the League of Struggle for Negro Rights.

Speakers representing the Communist Party, Robert Minor and Bill Gebert, pointed out that never until the Communist Party was organized in Chicago had such demonstrations of Negro and white workers been possible, and urged the building of the Communist Party without which there could no successful struggle against mass starvation.

Throughout the long demonstration, Young Pioneers, both boys and girls, Negro and white, darted about the streets on roller skates selling the "Pioneer."

Scottsboro Negro Verdict Is Target Of Red Meeting

Again adopting the "cause" of the Scottsboro case for their own, 10,000 Communists last night jammed their happy hunting ground of Union Square in a typical Red demonstration to free seven Negroes who know no more of Communism than a new-born babe.

Conspicuously missing, although the International Labor Defense had listed him as a speaker, was Samuel S. Liebowitz, the New York criminal lawyer and chief of defense counsel at the trial of Haywood Patterson, first of the Negro youths to be condemned again to death for an alleged attack on two white girls.

NOT "ADOPTED."

Liebowitz made it clear his gratuitous defense of the Scottsboro Negroes was not linked with the Communist "adoption."

"I won't defend the Scottsboro negroes from a soap box anywhere, he declared emphatically at his office.

But there was no dearth of Red speakers or demonstrators at the meeting. Communists predominated, while negroes were but a sprinkling in the vast mass that jammed the Square. While the Reds sang their "Internationale" and carried placards denouncing the "lynch verdict" down in Alabama, speakers whipped the crowd to a frenzy.

NEGRO MOTHER THERE.

Mrs. Jennie Patterson, mother of the condemned negro, was led to the platform by Richard B. Moore, negro attorney and former Communist candidate fo rthe Assembly. More than 100 police, under Capt. George Heitzman were scattered through the crowd.

A second protest meeting under the same auspices was held later in Harlem at the St. Mark's M. E. Church, 137th St. and Lenox Ave.

Disappears Again

Ruby Bates, who appeared out of nowhere to testify at the retrial of Haywood Patterson, Scottsboro Negro convicted of attack, has vanished anew. Summons for Miss Bates to testify in the case of Charlie Weems, was returned marked "not found."

ALABAMA ON TRIAL

Negro-haters in Alabama believe they have disposed of the case of Haywood Patterson, one of the Negroes accused of attacking one of the white girls in the Scottsboro case; but in reality it has been Alabama on trial. Again the U. S. Supreme Court will be summoned to decide the nature of the trial and whether the methods of the state set aside the 14th amendment. The Supreme Court will be asked to affirm the claim of the defense that the 14th amendment does not exist in Alabama; for out of the entire venire of talesmen for the jury not one name of a Negro was to be found. The practice in Alabama, it is admitted, is never to allow the name of a Negro to be on a jury list, regardless of how many Negroes above the average may be resident there.

The result is that an Alabama jury, where a Negro is charged with a serious crime, is a thing of prejudice. It might be a better jury in a city like Birmingham; but the state in the Scottsboro case, though conceding to a change of venue, was eager not to have the change made to any city of size.

The statements of the state's attorney in this case went beyond all reasonableness, these alone assuring that the last of the case of the bewildered Patterson has not been heard. This trial, with death to the defendant in the background, was conducted on a lower plane than an ordinary police court trial in the North. The higher courts will probably see to it that whatever the final result, a greater element of fairness is administered en route.

We are a white race and a Negro race here together—we are here to live together—our interests are together. The world at this time and in many lands is showing intolerance and showing hate. It seems sometimes that love has almost deserted the human bosom. It seems that hate has taken its place. The Scottsboro Verdict

THE conviction of Haywood Patterson, first of the negro defendants in the second trials of the Scottsboro cases, will be appealed. It should be.

Among other things prejudicial to a fair trial, the defense attorney was able to show that the jury law apparently was administered to exclude negroes from the panel for this case. On more than one occasion during the trial, the state attorneys conducted themselves in such a way as to prevent orderly and judicious consideration of evidence by the jury.

In repudiating her testimony at the earlier trial, Ruby Bates last Thursday swore that the other girl in the case, Victoria Price, had framed the negro youths. Lester Carter, a white friend of the two girls, confirmed the testimony of Ruby Bates.

To execute boys on the discredited evidence of a woman of Victoria Price's character, and following a trial in which racial discrimination seemed to operate in the jury panel, would be unthinkable. Just as the chief justice of Alabama dissented from the first Scottsboro conviction, and just as the United States supreme court threw out that conviction as a violation of the 14th amendment of the constitution preventing states from depriving "any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law," so the Decatur verdict yesterday appears certain to be set aside by a higher court.

"THE QUALITY OF MERCY"

The battle over the negroes charged with attacking two young white women in Alabama will continue unabated, and probably will draw still more attention, now that the jury sitting at Decatur on the case of Haywood Patterson has brought in a verdict of guilty and stipulated a sentence of death in the electric chair.

The jury disregarded entirely the testimony of Ruby Bates, one of the two young women, who declared in court the accusations against the colored boys were lies, and that she and Victoria Price had "framed" the defendants to shield their own misconduct with white men.

Counsel for the defense has announced intention to carry the case again to the Supreme Court of the United States on the same ground as before: that Patterson did not have a fair trial. The traditional right of any accused person to trial before a jury of his peers does not seem to hold for negroes, because the only peers (or equals) a Southern negro has are other negroes, and there is no chance to get a negro into a Southern jury.

The Supreme court will have to decide some interesting points if called upon again to pass upon this case. It will have to say whether colored defendants are entitled to have some of their own race among the jurymen, and whether prosecutors can make flaming appeals to prejudice against Jews and Jewish lawyers, New Yorkers in general and Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick in particular, in appealing to a jury for conviction and a death sentence.

Not one of the principals in this famous case is of any personal consequence. The colored defendants were stealing rides on a freight train when arrested, and their two accusers were described to the jury by the judge as young women of easy virtue, whose word could hardly be taken seriously on any important matter.

The cause of the colored boys has been espoused by the International Labor Defense, an organization of Communists, who are said to be using the case to enroll negroes in the Communist party.

Despite these unattractive aspects, the case should enlist the interest of others than radicals and negro sympathizers. Those who care for the quality of justice in this country should wish even a colored tramp to have a rigidly fair and impartial trial when accused, and should resist any disposition to abolish the rule that conviction may come only when a defendant is proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

We are horrified when Bolshevists railroad their victims to death, and we are uncomfortable when Hitlerites persecute those they do not like. We ought to be just as scrupulous in judging the course of justice in California or Alabama. or even in Massachusetts.

One of the surest tests of a high civilization is dispassionate and unprejudiced administration of justice, which is unmoved by consideration of whether the defendant may be a radical, an agitator, or a black man. The electric chair was not intended to destroy men for their color or their political views.

A Cloud on Scottsboro Justice.

It is particularly unfortunate that the retrial of the first of the seven Negroes originally sentenced to death on charges of criminal assault at Scottsboro, Ala., two years ago, should have been marked by such an appeal to racial and sectional prejudice, as was embodied in the summing up of the case for the prosecution by the solicitor of Morgan County, Alabama. Pointing to the table at which sat Samuel S. Leibowitz and Joseph Brodsky of the defense counsel, Solicitor Wade Wright called upon the jury to show them that Alabama justice cannot be bought and sold with "Jew money from New York."

The trial judge, who seems to have conducted the hearing with eminent fairness, ruled that the solicitor's plea was "simply improper and unjustified" and directed the jury to disregard it, although he refused to declare a mistrial. The attorney general of Alabama disassociated himself from the appeal and asked for a verdict "on the merits of this case." But Mr. Brodsky announced in open court that three men had threatened his life after the solicitor's speech and in a joint statement with Mr. Leibowitz declared that fiery crosses had been burned on the nearby hills and that "only the presence of the national guard prevented a mob from entering Decatur," where the trial was being held.

In view of the fact that the United States supreme court ordered these new trials on the ground that justice was denied the defendants in the original proceedings at Scottsboro and that charges of prejudice have been often in connection with the case ides, persons interested in abstrac tice must regret that the jury at Decatu ould have had to bring in a verdict of guilty and a entence of death under such circumstances. nstead of settling the Scottsboro case to the atisfaction of all reasonable persons, the first of this series of new trials seems likely merely to turn it into another Billings and Mooney case, the subject of prolonged discussion and much bitterness.

How the Scottsboro Frame-Up Was Discovered

4-20-33 New York N. Y. Daily Worker

By HELEN MARCY

If you look through the files of the Southern Worker, official organ of the Communist Party in the South you will find that the "Lynch Law" column was never at a loss for subject matter. Week after week, in an unending procession, appear lynchings, attempted lynchings and other outrages against the Negro masses in the South.

It was my job to edit the "Lynch Law" column. Every day I would clip from newspapers of the largest cities in the South, and hidden among insignificant items, I would find: "Negro Tenant Shot By Landlord," "Negro Lynched in——", "Negro Will Be Electrocuted Wed.; Stole $3," "Negroes Driven From Jobs On Road; One Shot." Innumerable cases of lynching that neither the N.A.A.C.P. not Tuskegee Institute were able to find, or willing to report—were exposed in the columns of the Southern Worker.

But one day the "Times" of Chattanooga, Tenn., where the Southern Worker was published, printed glaring headlines of nine Negro rapists who had desecrated the beautiful idyll of white womanhood in the South. The capitalist press frothed at the mouth, and spouted columns of vituperation against the "bestial crime" calling for mob action in no uncertain terms.

We read that the nine "fiends" were to be arraigned the next day in Scottsboro, only 60 miles away. As a representative of the Communist Party and the Southern Worker I was sent to Scottsboro to report the case and the status of the defense, since the papers had stated that the boys would be defended by a Mr. Roddy, a lawyer for the Negro Ministers Alliance of Chattanooga.

Indicative of the lynch spirit aroused by the press of Birmingham and Chattanooga was the fact that quite a number of persons from surrounding towns and counties came into Scottsboro on that day, expecting the "grand spectacle" of nine charred bodies.

I wandered about the little town of 3,500, with its half empty stores strung around the courthouse, muddy, dreary—yet an unmistakeable tenseness about the groups of lanky, weatherbeaten, snuff chewing poor whites who lined the pavements.

The owner of a lunch counter told me that these farmers had come in from the neighboring country the night before. All night they had hung around in just this manner—waiting, ominously waiting.

Flanked by a cordon of National Guardsmen, with bayonets fixed, I saw nine young boys, very nervous and scared, marched from the two story, red brick jail to the courthouse.

Mr. Roddy

Like the stage of an amateur playhouse, there was a raised platform in the courtroom on which sat the judge—around him the boys, and on the outer edge of the horseshoe, facing the audience, the guardsmen held on to their guns.

Seats were at a premium. Guards were stationed along the stairs leading to the courtroom and those who succeeded in getting through were searched for arms.

It didn't take long. Mr. Roddy, half drunk (his visits to an asylum for treatments for delerium tremens are well known in Chattanooga,—would not commit himself as being the lawyer for the boys. The judge appointed a number of lawyers from Scottsboro as the defenders of the boys, even though these men had already been assigned to the prosecution.

We learned later that Roddy had tried to influence the boys to plead guilty, but they refused to do so. In clear voices they all answered, "Not Guilty!"

"Lynch Them!"

The court is cleared. As the boys are led again to the rickety jail, shouts of "lynch 'em", "hang 'em", resound through the air.

The crowd pushes on to the jail. Many have been drinking. One, charged with corn whiskey, says to me, "I say, let 'em 'lectrocute 'em bastards. Ma brother-in-law is on the jury list. He'll make 'em burn, sure 'nuff. If not—we'll hang 'em." He appealed to my white womanhood to agree with him.

In front of the jail are the guardsmen. The miserable poor white at my side seems to be somewhat of an organizer—and thats all a mob needs—organization. He runs about trying to get the thing started. Them boys (the guardsmen) won't shoot at us—if only they would put their bayonets away." If he were not a poor white, but a business man with influence in the community, the nine Negro boys would have been doomed.

A mother with a babe in arms gloats over the fact that several men she knows have guns ready for use. Daughters of well-to-do landlords, who buy their clothes at the fashionable "Vogue" shop in Chattanooga, stop in their roadsters and laugh coquettishly to their beaus, pointing to the mob waiting for its prey.

Poverty of White Workers.

Farmers as a rule are poorly clothed. But these poor whites had lived through years of depressed cotton prices. For two years they staggered their meals with relief from the Red Cross. They looked hungry. I saw one cap on which I counted 30 patches. Others were in tatters—in the full sense of the word. And these bits of humanity — poverty stricken and long suffering—enflamed by a blind fury inspired by the master class for generations—waited outside the jail, hoping to get a chance to murder those who were their brothers.

Compare this with the hundred Negroes who zealously attended every day's proceedings of the trial of Haywood Patterson in Decatur last week. They were there for one purpose—to defend the boys. A new courage has been born in the Negro masses of the South, caused by the two years struggle conducted by the International Labor Defense and the Communist Party.

The word is given out. The bus has arrived to take the prisoners to Gadsen jail. The crowd pushes forward to rush the jail door, but gleaming bayonets are in the way.

The Negro boys come out, and hurriedly jump into the bus. The guards lay down their guns and climb into the cramped bus. The driver, a Scottsboro man, pretends that the machine is jammed. The blood hungry mob comes nearer. The Gadsen sheriff, now responsible for the safety of the prisoners, forces the driver to turn on the ignition. The crowd has reached the bus, but it starts off, only a few seconds ahead. They surge after, running down the muddy road in a frenzy but the bus slowly outdistances them. They return, climbing the hill in small muttering groups. Two years later, at a trial in Decatur, Alabama, of these same nine boys, they will try again.

First Wise to "Daily".

That night the Daily Worker got the first telegram about the Scottsboro case—a forerunner of the splendid struggle it has waged in its pages ever since.

And so ended the first page in the history of the now famous Scottsboro case. The International Labor Defense visited the mothers of the boy prisoners the very next day to get their permission to undertake a world-wide campaign to save their sons.

But not to be forgotten is the Southern Worker—which carried the news of the Scottsboro case into every Negro shack—on the South Carolina cotton plantations, in the fiery heat of the steel rolling mills in Birmingham, in the Alabama coal mines, the Mississippi swamps, the Florida pine forests.

Tens of thousands of copies, read falteringly by a half-illiterate people, often in whispers, aroused the slumbering militancy of the Negro masses of the South. That's why a Camp Hill! That's why a Dadeville! The Southern Worker was a forum and an organizer.

Now after ceasing publication because of financial difficulties, the Southern Worker will appear again. Eagerly the newly awakened Southern toilers await the first issue.

Workers of the North should give their unstinted moral and especially financial support to the leader of a new, militant generation of fighters in the South.

THE SCOTTSBORO ATROCITY

The more northern of the southern states and the border states have come a long way from the Kluxer days of Reconstruction, and the Negro in North Carolina and Tennessee and Virginia is at least tolerated. But in the deep south, where radical prejudice and class hatred are seemingly as bred in the bone as shiftlessness and that languor peculiar to Dixie, the flaming mob passions and the more passive but perennial resentment toward the black brother's existence on this earth continue to make the lot of the colored man a bitter one.

Lynchings are almost as popular as ever down there in crackerland and among the bayous and on the cotton fields, but even the southland had its first legal mob lynching to see until a freakish fate gambled the lives of nine Negroes against the illiterate and admittedly false word of two white prostitutes—and the women won. The youths were sentenced in a body to hang for the alleged assault of the two women, who had been riding on a box car as hoboes with the defendants.

The Supreme Court ordered a retrial and then in the tiny village of Decatur, Alabama, was enacted as sickening a drama of bigotry, race prejudice and unbridled intolerance as ve stained the many dark pages of class conflict in 'the fair southland.' The outcome of the trial had it been held in any civilized place would never for a moment have been in doubt: instant acquittal of all the defendants and an indictment of the two women for perjury. In Alabama the outcome also was never in doubt from the time twelve white good men and true filed into the jury box to hear the tale of Negroes assaulting white women. Inevitably death for the Negroes.

The jury heard one of the women tell of the attacks. Its mind was made up. Then it heard the story confounded by the other woman, who admitted the entire story was a fabrication and stated further that the defendants were guilty of nothing more than fighting with some white tramps. The jury's face was impassive. Then it heard the denunciations of the prosecutor who, born and bred in Dixie and knowing well his typical middle and lower class southerner, added the fuel of religious prejudices to class hatred by shouting against the 'Jew money from New York that had bought the witness.' The tale was ended as far as the twelve good men and true were concerned. Their minds were made up. The defendant was found guilty. The second defendant has now been hauled before the bar of justice (Dixie version).

"THAT BLACK THING"—Attorney General Knight

Daily Worker

DECATUR, Ala.—Haywood Patterson's mother is in the colored witness room. The door is open, for the first of the famous Scottsboro cases is drawing to a close. Only the summations of the prosecution and the defense are left and then twelve white men will tell her whether her son is to live or die.

The afternoon sun beats upon her blue dress and tear-stained face through a screened window. She peers hopefully, wonderingly at the immobile faces of the jurors. These are the men who will give her son back to her—alive, or a blackened, charred body.

New York
N.Y.

The perspiration shows on her forehead. The white handkerchief in her hands is rumpled nervously.

The judge's voice, soft and measured, instructs the attorneys to sum up. Solicitor Bailey of Jackson County, who had first prosecuted the Scottsboro boys and sent them into the shadow of the electric chair, rises to his full, dignified height. The mother listens as in a trance. She does not grasp what he is saying and leans forward, as though her hearing is at fault.

She looks hungrily into the faces of the twelve white men but they tell her nothing. They are cold solemn faces with not a flicker of emotion upon any of them.

"The State demands that for the safety of white womanhood in the South you send him to the electric chair!"

She bites her lips and tears at the pathetic, soiled little handkerchief in her hands. Her bosom rises and falls heavily and she leans against the window weakly.

When the Jackson County prosecutor finishes she looks at him wonderingly. There is no hatred in her eyes; only the look of one terribly hurt, and whose does not know why or one dazed by this vindictive bitterness on the part of the white man who for two years has tried to burn her son in the electric chair.

Solicitor Wright of Morgan County rises to his full bulk, towering, tremendous, a strapping, hulking man of the South with a roaring voice that thunders through the courtroom.

"I don't know much about this case," he begins.

The mother's eyes follow him. Here at least is a white man who does not know much about this case, a man not from the county where in-

But the man who does not know much about this case bellows of other and almost as deep prejudices common throughout the South.

"These northern lawyers...these Jews from New York defending niggers.... these niggers who commit the infamous and horrible crime of rape..."

"I don't know much about this case——"

But he does know a great deal of Southern prejudices against the black man. He does not talk of the case at all. He talks of "niggers" who want to show their independence and sit on juries. He talks of black men who want to rise from their bondage. He talks of Jews and Jew money from New York and the buying of Alabama justice....

His voice bellows furiously. The saliva drips from his mouth onto his chin and he wipes it with the palm of a hand. The mother stares at him in horror, her hands clasping and unclasping. She realizes that this man is making an appeal that will be hard for the white jurors to forget and because of that her boy's life may be taken—not on evidence of guilt, not on facts, but because his skin is black.

Leibowitz rises. He is the big northern lawyer she has heard about who was going to help the International Labor Defense save her boy. His voice is soft, restrained. She leans forward, anxious not to miss a word. He is appealing to "men of reason," pleading that they forget her son's skin is black and give him a fair trial. Her hands are clasped together. The knuckles of her hands show the intensity of her emotion. The handkerchief is buried between her palms.

Leibowitz's arms are upraised. His long, four-hour summation is ending. He is making a last plea to the jury to forget race and color and religious prejudices aroused by the prosecution.

"For Jew and for Gentile. For white man and for black man——"

The words fall upon hushed spectators. Even some of the hardened whites who have been lusting for the blood of this boy on trial for his life are wiping their tears.

The tears are running down her face. She is crying despairingly.

This white lawyer would soon finish. And then there would be nothing more to say. The jurors would go into the very room where she now stood and decide whether she was to have her son alive—or dead.

A tense silence hangs over the courtroom when Leibowitz finishes. The mother slumps into a chair. The jury's faces are immobile. If their hearts have been touched they do not show it.

Attorney General Knight rises to conclude for the State. He harps on the clothes of Ruby Bates and Lester Carter. Clothes. That is all he talks of in his sharp, bitter voice.

He points a finger at Patterson.

"I am not a murderer! I would let him loose in two minutes if I were not convinced that he is guilty. That is why I ask that you look at this black thing——"

The Attorney General is shrewd. He does not want these white jurors to forget that Patterson is after all a "nigger."

The mother rises at this contemptuous phrase that carries with it all the prejudices of the South against the black man.

"Black thing." The words echo and re-echo through the courtroom.

"Stand up!" Knight shouts.

The "black thing" stands up, looking helplessly and despairingly at the prosecutor who is venting his hatred upon him as the symbol of a race protesting its oppression.

The mother's tears are no longer running now. Her face is suffused with anger. Her fists clench. This white man demanding her son's life is using every means possible to prejudice these jurors against him.

There is little said about the boy's guilt or innocence. There is little said about evidence. There is little said except appeals to sectional, state, racial and religious prejudices deeply engrained in the hearts of those sitting in judgment on this boy's life.

"Black thing!"

Over everything the prosecution has said, these two words stand out with all their implications.

The little white handkerchief is crumpled in fury. Forever and ever she will understand what the black man is to the white rulers of the South:

"Black thing!"

SCOTTSBORO LESSONS

The Scottsboro case should be a warning alike to both the North ~~and~~ to the South.

The trial has shown the South that until it has won a reputation for dealing justice to its citizens without regard to their race, its courts will not have the confidence of other sections of the nation. The North has had an opportunity to learn that meddling such as has been indulged in during the Scottsboro case hearings is likely to lead to injustice instead of the justice such meddling is proclaimed to foster.

Heywood Patterson, the first of the nine Negroes indicted in the alleged assault upon two white girls of doubtful morality to have a new trial, was found guilty by a jury Sunday, the verdict carrying the death penalty.

Patterson's second trial, like the first one, has been held under most distressing conditions. It has seemed at times that the issue at stake was the right of outsiders to go into Alabama to defend the Negro before the court rather than the guilt or innocence or the prisoner. In spite of the apparent efforts of Judge James E. Horton of the Morgan County Circuit Court to give the defendants a fair trial, the many threats which were made kept the community in a constant state of racial excitement, a state which tends to relegate justice to a secondary place.

The fact that one of the girls, who at the first trial testified she had been assaulted, testified that her first story was false, was not, apparently, considered sufficient by the jurors to doubt whether there had been an attack at all.

Regardless of the fate of the accused Negroes, the Scottsboro case has turned the clock back on interracial relations in the South. The remedy, however, lies with the South. When the several states have proved that a Negro can count on obtaining justice in their courts there will be no excuse for outside interfernece.—Nashville Tennessean

WORTH pasting permanently in every Southerner's felt and every Northerner's derby is Judge James E. Horton's charge to the jury in the Scottsboro case retrial last Saturday. It was rebuke enough to Solicitor Wade Wright's unpardonably crude appeal to racial and sectional feeling and to ~~the~~ International Labor Defense's equally unpardonable appeal to class feeling. It spoke for a justice honorably and perfectly blind to all such influences and for a South which can be loved without either fearing or hating any other section. It introduced a refreshing note of nobility into one of the most completely ignoble pictures Alabama has ever had to look at.

Walter Lippmann paid this column the compliment last Tuesday of wiring from New York for its opinion of the Scottsboro case and asking "what, if anything, I could helpfully say?" It seems to us that the most helpful thing Mr. Lippmann could say is that enlightened Alabamians—and there are thousands of them—have their fingers crossed, that they want with all their hearts to be fair, that they believe the death penalty a social necessity in the South for the crime of which the Negroes are accused, but that they are by no means certain of guilt in this instance and that even if there is guilt the circumstances seem to call for executive modification of sentence. And that they have no more patience with Solicitor Wright than they have with the International Labor Defense. And that they do not believe in lynching—by hand or by telegram.

April 13, 1933

The fact that Samuel S. Leibornitz, attorney for the defense, has entered the race question in the trial of the seven negroes who attacked two white women in Jackson county, allegedly, will not make it any milder.

If the fact that no negroes served on the juries which billed an convicted these defendants were upheld it would also be reasonable to nullify other cases where all juriors were white.

All jurors are sworn to decide the guilt or innocense of the individual on trial according to law and evidence, regardless of race, color or sex, and if these sworn obligations are not fulfilled the juror responsible for the failure is subject to a purjure charge, regardless of race or color. Therefore, the race agitation brought into the Patterson trial will only be considered a point of argument between the attorneys and not a question of justice or injustice by the law abiding people of either race. There are thousands of white men and women in Alabama who have never been called on for jury duty and the fact that the race question has been entered into the trials of these negroes to our opinion will only serve to prolong the court proceedure, and not wave the rights of justice.

Second Trial, Ordered by Supreme Court of United States, Starts—Defense Counsel to Contend That Ruby Bates' Note Shows Innocence of Accused.

By Staff Correspondent

SCOTTSBORO, Ala., Mar. 9—Scottsboro's little brick courthouse, where a death sentence was pronounced while a band played jazz, less than two years ago—a death sentence that brought protests from all over the world—saw the beginning of a new phase in the famous "Scottsboro Case" Monday.

Nine boys and young men began a new fight for their lives when the case came up for a new trial, ordered by the United States Supreme Court. Eight of the youths had been sentenced to death after their conviction on the charge of attacking two white girls aboard a freight train.

Upon a letter, scrawled with pencil on rough paper, and a change of venue, the youths and their attorneys pin their hopes for acquittal and freedom.

Counsel Retained For Youths

In striking contrast with the first trial, when the youths were defended by lawyers appointed by the court, this time they have a battery of counsel employed by the International Labor Defense of New York headed by George W. Chamlee of Chattanooga, Tenn.

On the opposite side of the table, representing the State, are Thomas E. Knight Jr., Attorney General of Alabama, and T. E. Lawson, Assistant Attorney General.

The letter already is disputed evidence. The defense contends it was written by Ruby Bates, one of the complaining witnesses, and that it repudiates her testimony at the first trial. The state contends it was obtained while the girl, who is claimed by defense attorneys as a "proven prostitute," was unaware of its contents after drinking.

"—They Did Not Touch Me"

Defense attorneys contend the letter substantiates their statements that the lads were victims of a "frame-up." The letter sets forth that the girl was not a victim of an attack, but "those policemen made me tell a lie. Those Negroes did not touch me."

The case already has been reviewed by the United States Supreme Court, where the death sentences were set aside and new trials ordered. In the meantime from cities throughout the world, have come protests and pleas that the lads, who now range in age from 16 to 23 years, be released.

Mrs. Ada Wright, mother of two of the defendents, under sponsorship of organizations which had interested themselves in the case, toured Europe enlisting aid in their fight for their freedom. Many European notables, including Professor Albert Einstein, sent protests against the death sentences to Governor B. M. Miller of Alabama.

History Of the Case

The nine youths were taken from a train at Paint Rock, Ala., the afternoon of March 25, 1931. Lodged in jail here, the nine youths were guarded by Sheriff L. M. Wann and citizens he had picked, while scores of men gathered about the Court House S[illegible].

When the crowds were dispersed the prisoners were removed to Gadsden. A Jackson County grand jury returned true bills charging the youths with attacking the two girls, an offense punishable by death in Alabama.

Charlie Weems, 21, of Atlanta, and Clarence Norris, 19, of Chattanooga, were the first to be tried. Their trial began April 6, while farmers from miles around swelled the population of the town to 10,000. National Guards maintained a semblance of order. While the jury deliberated in the first case, Heywood Patterson, 17, of Chattanooga, was brought to trial. A verdict of guilty was brought in for Weems and Norris, while a jazz band played and the populace cheered.

Then Eugene Williams, 15, and Andy Wright, 17, both of Chattanooga; Ozie Powell, 16, of Atlanta; Olen Montgomery, 17, of Monroe, Ga., and Willie Robertson, 17, of Columbus, Ga., were placed on trial.

Eight Sentenced To Die

All were found guilty and on April 9 [illegible] Judge A. E. Hawkins sentenced them to death, making the first time in the history of Alabama that a judge had sentenced eight men at one time for a single offense. The ninth boy, Roy Wright, 14, was not convicted.

The International Labor Defense intervened and employed counsel, who declared they would take the case to the highest court in the land.

On March 25, 1932, one year from the day the youths were arrested, the Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the death sentence of all except Eugene Williams, reversing his conviction on contentions of defense counsel that he was a juvenile.

The other cases were taken to the United States Supreme Court where the death sentences were set aside and a new trial was ordered.

SCOTTSBORO TRIAL MOVED 50 MILES

Negroes Will Face Second Prosecution at Decatur on Change of Venue.

MOTION TO QUASH LOST

Ruling on the Issue of Absence of Negro Jurors Is Left for the Trial Court.

From a Staff Correspondent.
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SCOTTSBORO, Ala., March 7.—The new trial which the United States Supreme Court ordered for the eight Negroes sentenced to die after conviction of attacking two white girls nearly two years ago will not be held in Jackson County, still embittered, in which they were first convicted.

In a courtroom crowded with mountaineers, Judge A. E. Hawkins granted a defense motion this afternoon for a change of venue and set the place of trial in Decatur, the seat of Morgan County, some fifty miles west of Scottsboro.

Judge Hawkins, who presided over the first trials, declined, however, to rule on a defense motion to quash the indictments on the ground that Negroes were excluded from the grand jury which indicted the defendants and the petit jury which found them guilty and decreed their electrocution.

He left that issue, which leading members of the bar of Jackson County said never had been raised since the reconstruction period, to be decided by the judge before whom the new trial will be held. Judge Horton of Athens, Ala., is expected to preside at the new trial. He stated that a jury panel probably could not be convened before March 17, but expressed the opinion that arrangements would be made for bringing the prisoners from Kilby prison at Montgomery to Decatur for arraignment and pleading in a few days.

Ruling Not Opposed.

The State, represented by its dapper young Attorney General, Thomas E. Knight Jr., a son of the Supreme Court Justice who wrote the opinion of the highest court in Alabama affirming the conviction and sentence of the accused Negroes, but was reversed by the Supreme Federal Tribunal, did not oppose the motion for a change of venue.

"I am not opposing this motion," he said, "because I want the people of all these United States to know that these defendants will get a fair trial. They had one when they were tried here and convicted and they will get a fair trial, regardless of what county of Alabama is chosen for their trial now.

"The people of Jackson County are to be commended for their restraint in this case. They have not sought to influence any one half so much as these outside organizations which have come in here and tried to influence the rest of the country to believe that an injustice has been done here."

The "outside organizations" to which Mr. Knight referred are the radical and other groups in New York and other cities that have fought for a new trial for the defendants, especially the international labor defense which was represented by three attorneys at today's hearing. These were G. W. Chamlee, a former Attorney General of Hamilton County, in which Chattanooga is situated and two New Yorkers, Irving Schwab and Miss Carol King.

They had hoped that Judge Hawkins would select Birmingham, for the new trial in the belief that race prejudice would be less strong in an urban community and when he announced his decision to move it to Decatur, in the interest of economy, there was a slight grumble of disappointment from their table. Mr. Chamlee said that "the same need for military protection will exist there as existed here."

Promises Military Protection.

Mr. Knight interrupted him heatedly, exclaiming: "There'll be protection for them. If it's necessary to call out every company of militia in the State of Alabama to give them a fair trial, we'll do it."

The proceedings were held on the second floor of the county court house which forms the centre of the little square of buildings making up the business section of a town of some 3,500 persons.

As the hearing proceeded, the jurors, twelve bewhiskered mountaineers in the overalls and boots, uniform of the countryside, lounged in their chairs on a platform facing the bench and glared at the visitors from New York. Behind them sat twelve rows of lantern-jawed men of similar mien and costume. There wasn't a Negro in the court house or near it while the case was being considered.

The case had its origin nearly two years ago on the night of March 25, 1931, when Ruby Bates and Victoria Price, two unemployed millworkers of Huntsville, who had gone to Chattanooga in a vain search for jobs, boarded a freight car to steal a ride home. Several white men were then in the box-car.

Before they had gone half-way home, according to the story the girls told, twelve negroes swarmed into the car, picked a fight with the white men and threw all of them off at Stevenson, save one named Orville Gillis. The girls alleged that the Negroes then attacked them. Although Gillis is said to have been a witness to the crime, the State did not call him as a witness at the first trial.

The white men who had been thrown off the train telegraphed the news ahead, and at Paint Rock, a little town the other side of Scottsboro, an armed posse of deputy sheriffs and citizens stopped the train and took off the Negroes. The deputy sheriffs did not tell the others in the posse of the alleged attack on the girls, letting them believe that the arrests were made for a fight with the white men on the train. If the truth had been known at the time, say the citizens of Scottsboro, there never would have been a trial.

Convicted on First Trial.

Three of the Negroes involved in the alleged crime were said to have escaped. Nine others, ranging in age from 13 to 25, were indicted on charges which in Alabama may bring punishment of from ten years in prison to death, depending upon what are termed "circumstances." While several companies of militiamen stood guard about the court house, which was surrounded by a threatening crowd in a lynching mood, the Negroes were tried and found guilty.

Roy Wright, who at that time was only 13, was conceded to be a juvenile, and the jury which tried him stood eleven to one for conviction and death. He is in prison now in Birmingham, awaiting a new trial. Eugene Williams, who said he was 14, was tried with the others because the authorities thought he was lying about his age. The Supreme Court of Alabama, however, ruled that he must be tried as a juvenile.

The others to be tried anew are Clarence Norris, Charles Williams, Olie Montgomery, Andy Wright, Willie Robertson, Ozie Powell and Haywood Patterson.

Mingled with the racial bitterness over the trial is resentment that Jackson County and Scottsboro should bear the odium and the expense of it. All the Negroes came from points outside Alabama and the two girls were residents of Madison County, which lies between Jackson and Morgan Counties, where the second trial is to be held.

Shotguns in Crowd.

Feeling is still very strong and there are many in Scottsboro who declare regretfully that the old way of the rope was better than the newer way of the law. Yesterday when the motion to quash the indictment was offered and there were rumors that the prisoners might be brought from the penitentiary to the court house a large crowd gathered in the square outside.

Many of them had shotguns and their presence caused some anxiety to timorous visitors from New York. Old-timers reassured them, however, explaining that it was an old Scottsboro custom on the first Monday of every month to barter for farm implements and produce. It just happened that there were a lot of mountaineers who wanted to swap guns for things they needed more.

It was another coincidence, it was said, that led to reports being broadcast throughout the country that the people of Scottsboro made a roman holiday out of the conviction of the Negroes less than two weeks after their arrest. The militiamen were on duty protecting the prisoners from mob violence and had a band along with them.

When the trial was over the military went through the ceremony of guard mount and at the same time it happened a procession of automobiles led by a steam calliope was passing through town in connection with an advertising stunt. These were just coincidences, nothing more, say the townsfolk.

Just how it came about that the summation of Milo Moody, the lawyer of 70, who was the only member of the Jackson County bar to accept Judge Hawkins's assignment to defend the prisoners, was left out of the record of the trial has not been explained. The defense contends that he made none, but many who were present at the trial insist that he did. Attorney General Knight said he could not find it in the transcript.

Whatever one may think of these coincidences, it is well in Scottsboro not to speculate too much. A man who said he was a reporter from Atlanta but who was suspected of being "a Red from New York," was run out of town yesterday because he asked too many questions of Negroes.

In preparing his affidavits in support of his motion for a new trial, Mr. Chamlee said he was unable to obtain one from any white man in Scottsboro. The only white man who signed one was Wiley Sisk, a former resident of Scottsboro, who now lives across the State line in Chattanooga. He declared he was present in Scottsboro at the time of the trial, that a threatening mob surrounded the Court House and that threats of lynching were made openly.

Another affidavit was filed by the Rev. G. W. Buckner, a Negro preacher, who said that ever since the trial Negroes in Jackson County had been quaking in their boots in fear of mob violence. Mr. Chamlee also affixed the printed copy of an editorial which appeared in The Jackson County Sentinel on April 23, 1931, soon after the question of Negro membership in the trial jury was first raised. It follows:

"The plot thickens."

"We have no editorial this week on the 'Negro trial matter.' We just couldn't do one without getting mad as hell. And why? We refer you to the statement by the 'New York defenders,' appearing in The Chattanooga Times and The Sentinel today. Its arrogance is most astounding. It smacks of trouble. It is the most dangerous movement launched in the South in many years—it brands Jackson County citizenry as little short of being cold-blooded murderers.

"After we forget 'the rope' to pick up 'the code' for the safety and benefit of the Negroes, we are told that we must have Negro jurors on any jury trying the blacks if they are to get 'their rights.' A Negro juror in Jackson County would be a curiosity—and some curiosities are embalmed, you know."

Cannot Recall Negro on Jury.

The oldest citizens of Scottsboro said today they could not recall a time when a Negro had sat upon a jury. There was nothing odd about that, they explained, for there are only about twenty-five Negro voters in the county's population of 36,000. The Commissioners of Election appointed by the Governor have plenary power to decide on who is eligible to vote. White men are presumed to be competent, but Negroes have to prove it by doing something easy like reciting the Constitution of the United States from beginning to end, if they are so bold as to apply. The twenty-five or so who do vote are eligible because of the "grandfather law" which guarantees the suffrage to any descendant of a soldier of the Confederate or Union Armies.

From a legal point of view, attorneys maintain that since a white man has no right to object to a Negro on his trial jury, a Negro cannot legally complain about the presence of whites. The ratio of whites to Negroes in Jackson County is about three to one, but in counties further south the Negroes outnumber the whites nearly ten to one.

Not only were there no Negroes on the first trial juries but the white men who sat in judgment were nearly all from what is known as the Sand Mountain section where the natives boast of signs reading:

"Nigger—don't let the sun go down on your head."

No doubt exists in Scottsboro that the result of the second trial will be the same as the first, regardless of the change in locale. However, a new complication has arisen. Sheriff T. W. McBryde received a report today from a deputy at Huntsville, who said that Ruby Bates had disappeared from her home there. She was reported to have sent a letter home saying that she was tired of the unwelcome publicity and did not want any more to do with it. The State's attorneys, however, were confident that they could find her.

Search for Missing Witness.

HUNTSVILLE, Ala., March 7 (AP). Mystery enveloping the disappearance of Ruby Bates, a principal witness for the State in the Scottsboro case, deepened today as the police met a blank wall in their efforts to pick up her trail.

Mrs. Mary Bates, her mother, told investigators that her daughter left home on Monday night, Feb. 27, and that she had not been heard from since.

"I was afraid she had been kidnapped, and I wouldn't go to the police through fear," Mrs. Bates said.

Mrs. Victoria Price, the other alleged victim of the accused Negroes had not heard from the missing girl.

"I am afraid of trouble, and I never leave my house at night, and in the day time, only when I have some one with me," she told the police.

NDICTMENT ACTION ASKED

State's Attorney Urged to Agree on Date for Argument—Move for New Venue Change Given Up.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., March 14.—A legal tilt in the battle to free nine Negroes, once condemned to death for an alleged attack on two white girls, is expected tomorrow when Samuel Leibowitz of New York, chief of defense counsel, demands the right to interview privately the eight defendants confined in the death house of Kilby prison.

Thus far the privilege of consultation with their clients beyond the earshot of officials or prison guards has been denied to other lawyers associated with him in the defense of the Negroes, who have been in prison for the past two years.

Up until the present, prison officials have given no indication of relaxing that rule and it was expected that Mr. Leibowitz would meet with the same rebuff as George W. Chamlee, Irving Schwab and Joseph Brodsky, the other lawyers in the case.

Mr. Leibowitz declared today, however, that he would not take "no" for an answer without appealing to the courts for a writ of habaes corpus, demanding the immediate presence of the eight men who, he holds, are illegally incarcerated in death cells, since the United States Supreme Court set aside their death sentences and ordered the courts of Alabama to grant them a new trial.

Warden Walls of Kilby prison, in refusing earlier requests of defense attorneys to see their clients, privately asserted that he is merely holding them for safekeeping for county officials, whose prisoners they are.

Interview Unconvicted Youth.

Not without an order from the court in which they will be tried, he has said, will he relax the rules of his prison, which prohibit private conferences with death house inmates.

Thomas E. Knight Jr., Attorney General, considers that the whole thing is an academic question anyway, on the ground that conversations between lawyer and client are privileged and could not be used in court, even though an effort were made to present the testimony of an eavesdropper.

Accompanied by Mr. Chamlee and Mr. Brodsky, Mr. Leibowitz came here from Chattanooga today and spent the afternoon in consultation with Roy Wright, the 15-year-old Negro, who alone among the nine accused by Ruby Bates and Victoria Price was not convicted of the crime, which in this State carries a penalty of death in the electric chair.

Wright was tried as a juvenile and the jury which heard the evidence against him was unable to agree upon his guilt, dividing eleven to one for conviction. Since he never was placed under sentence, he was not transferred to Kilby prison.

The defense lawyers say they never have experienced any difficulty in seeing him alone, and today, with Mr. Leibowitz along, was no exception, although last week he gave an interview in which he charged militiamen and deputy sheriffs of jabbing him with bayonets and beating him with sticks.

To Visit Prison Today.

The defense attorneys planned to go to the State capital at Montgomery tonight and make their attempt to see the eight men in Kilby prison the first thing in the morning.

While they are there they intend also to try to reach an agreement with the Attorney General on an early date for hearing on their motion to quash the indictments.

This motion is based on the contention that Negroes are systematically excluded from jury service in Alabama in defiance of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

It will be heard before Judge Horton in Circuit Court in Decatur, where the trial is to be held.

As both sides are prepared to call witnesses, the trial of the Negroes themselves may be preceded by a trial of Alabama's jury system, unless Judge Horton decides to rule upon the motion without going beyond the affidavits which have been submitted.

The affidavits presented by the defense are for the most part from Negroes who assert that members of their race never have been placed upon the jury rolls, although it is alleged that there are many—Negro lawyers, teachers, land owners and doctors in the State—whose "sound judgment" and general character is high enough to entitle them to a place in the jury box under the terms of a statute, which, the State concedes, does not specifically exclude Negroes because of their color.

Venue Plea Reported Abandoned.

Although the defense attorneys had announced their intention of renewing their fight to have the trial, originally held in Scottsboro, transferred to Birmingham, Mr. Leibowitz indicated this afternoon that the plan had been abandoned.

While no explanation was forthcoming, it was understood that the reason for the change of front was that the lawyers had reached the conclusion that it would be fruitless to ask a reconsideration from Judge A. E. Hawkins, who selected Decatur in granting their plea for a change of venue.

In order to support their plea for a rehearing, it was said, the defense would have to present evidence that Decatur was a hotbed of bias and prejudice and that it would be impossible for the defendants to receive a fair trial there.

This, it was felt, would serve only to inflame sentiment against the defense in the community where, in all probability, they would have to go to trial anyway.

HEAVY GUARD FOR TRIP

New York, N.Y.

Negroes Will Be Protected on Way to Birmingham but No Great Force Will Be at Trial.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., March 16.—Although Thomas E. Knight Jr., Attorney General of Albama has consented to the transfer of eight Negroes in the Scottsboro case from the death house of Kilby Prison to the Jefferson County Jail at Birmingham, the actual moving of the prisoners probably will not take place before next week.

Before it can be accomplished, the consent order into which the Attorney General entered with G. W. Chamlee, one of the defense attorneys, must be signed not only by Sheriff McBryde of Jackson County, where the Negroes are said to have attacked two white girls, but also by two circuit court judges.

They are Judge A. E. Hawkins, before whom the Negroes were convicted and sentenced to death two years ago, and Judge James A. Horton, who is to preside at the new trial at Decatur, the seat of Morgan County.

Defense lawyers asked the transfer of the prisoners from Kilby Prison to Birmingham so that they can consult privately with their clients, without relaxing death-house rules.

In the petition which Sheriff McBryde will be asked to sign it is requested that, if the prisoners must be moved, they be sent to the Birmingham jail "for safekeeping on account of the present insecurity of the jail of Jackson County," where under normal circumstances they would be confined.

Order Speaks of Insecurity.

The order which has been prepared for the signatures of Judges Hawkins and Horton reads as follows:

"To the Sheriff of Jackson County; to the warden of Kilby prison and to the Sheriff of Morgan County, Ala.:

"Application having been made to us by the Sheriff of Jackson County, Ala., for the transfer of the prisoners, Haywood Patterson, Olin Montgomery, Clarence Norrie, Chalrie Weems, Andy Wright, Eugene Williams, Willie Robertson and Ozie Powell, to another jail on account of the insecurity of the jail in Jackson County, and proof having been made of such fact to us, we hereby order and direct that you or each of you forthwith transfer said prisoners to the jail of Jefferson County, Ala., and the Sheriff of Jefferson County, Ala., is hereby directed to take said prisoners into his custody and safekeep them until further orders."

The form of the order was prepared jointly by Attorney General Knight and Samuel Leibowitz, chief of defense counsel, and the stipulation was signed by Mr. Knight and G. W. Chamlee, attorney of record for the prisoners.

"Counsel for the prisoners named in this order and the Attorney General join in the request for the transfer of these prisoners to the Jefferson County jail and agree to this order on the part of the court it being understood that these prisoners are to remain in the custody of the Sheriff of Jefferson County Ala., until the cases are called for trial in the Circuit Court of Morgan County."

Officials at Distant Points.

The delay in obtaining the judge's signatures to the order was occasioned by the inability of Mr. Chamlee to ascertain definitely where they were sitting. It will be impossible to obtain the signatures of the Jackson County Sheriff and the two judges before Sunday or Monday because all are at widely separated places.

Mr. Knight's consent to the transfer of the prisoners to Birmingham does not mean of course that they will be tried there, much as the defense wishes they might.

Some time before March 27, when the trial is scheduled to start, they will be moved to the Morgan County jail and kept there until they are acquitted or sent back to Kilby prison.

Preparations for the transfer are being made with great care. Extremely anxious that no mob violence blemish Alabama's reputation for orderly administration of her laws, Mr. Knight and prison officials were planning to make the transfer under the cover of secrecy and a heavy guard if and when the proposed order is signed and served upon them.

No Large Force for Trial.

Although the prisoners probably will be moved in a prison van or motor bus over 100 miles of almost uninhabited territory between Kilby prison at Montgomery and the jail in Birmingham, no untoward incidents are expected. Birmingham is about 150 miles away from Scottsboro and is separated rrom that community by rough roads and mountains.

ecatur is only about fifty miles from Scottsboro and less than thirty miles from Huntsville where the Negroes accusers live, but it is not the present intention of Governor Miller of Alabama nor his Attorney General to mobolize any large body of militiamen for the trial.

Mr. Knight said he thought the situation could be handled by about ten picked men, thus avoiding a military display which, the defense attorneys feel, might be prejudicial to their clients.

MONTGOMERY, ALA

SURPRISE AT SCOTTSBORO

It is a matter of surprise that the attorney general's department did not go to Scottsboro better prepared to meet the issues to be raised at the new hearing of the negro attack cases.

According to the dispatches the state's representatives went to Scottsboro fully expecting the defense to move immediately for a change of venue, and the attorney general had previously announced that if such motion were made it would not be resisted. Instead of this the defense first moved to quash the indictments on the ground that negroes were excluded from the grand jury which returned the bills. The dispatches relate that this took the state representatives completely by surprise and that time had to be asked of the court to prepare their answer to the motion.

Laymen in Alabama have not been especially concerned about where these trials are held, for they have felt that Alabama courts anywhere would give the negroes a fair trial. But even laymen have been greatly concerned in recent months over some of the race angles in the case and its handling which must pass muster before the supreme court of the United States. It may have been a surprise to the attorney general's office that this point was raised immediately, but it was no surprise to the average citizen. That is the angle of this case to which is going to require legal talent and generalship of the highest order.

CHATTANOOGA, March 13.—Samuel S. Leibowitz, New York criminal lawyer, arrived here today and took charge of the defense of the nine Negroes held in prison for two years on charges of attacking two while girls in the now famous Scottsboro case.

Mr. Leibowitz and Joseph Brodsky, who is associated with him as counsel, conferred at length with George W. Chamlee, former prosecutor of Chattanooga, who is helping them prepare their case. The lawyers mapped a three-point plan of action to be pressed before the opening of the new trial, ordered by the United States Supreme Court in setting aside death sentences originally imposed.

They will try tomorrow to induce Judge A. E. Hawkins to reconsider his decision at Scottsboro last Monday, when on a motion for a change of venue he named Decatur instead of Birmingham as the place for the second trial.

Regardless of the outcome of their efforts, Mr. Leibowitz and his associates will proceed to Montgomery to seek an understanding with Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr. on a date for argument on a motion to quash indictments. This plea is based on the ground that Negroes were barred from the grand jury which returned the bills.

While they are in Montgomery the lawyers intend to demand the right of private audience with the eight prisoners who are confined in Kilby prison there. It is expected that this privilege will be denied, and in that case Mr. Leibowitz said he would appeal to the courts to transfer the prisoners to the place where they will be tried or sue out a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the eight defendants are illegally incarcerated in the death-house.

Seeks to Avoid Militia Call.

The defense lawyers are hopeful that they will be able to convince Judge Hawkins that Birmingham is a more suitable place for the trial of a case which has begun to assume the proportions of a Sacco-Vanzetti trial of the South than is Decatur, a rural community in a county contiguous to Madison County, home of Ruby Bates and Mrs. Victoria Price, victims of the alleged attack.

The jail and prison are under the same roof in Birmingham, and Mr. Leibowitz pointed out that it would not be necessary to call out the militia to provide the adequate protection which Governor Miller of Alabama has promised the defendants, if the trial were held there. He believes that the very presence of the militia about the court room would be prejudicial to the defendants.

The first legal tilt in the coming battle will probably come over the issue of the right of counsel to confer privately with the eight defendants in the death-house at Kilby prison. Warden George B. Walls has said that he will not permit unsupervised consultation without a court order, and Attorney General Knight has declared there is no need for it, because the laws of privilege governing the relations of lawyer and client are broad enough to prevent the introduction of testimony by an eavesdropper, even though his capacity be an official one.

Mr. Leibowitz made it clear that these conditions were unsatisfactory to him and that he would resort to legal action if State officials persisted in their refusal to permit lawyers for the defense to have private audience with their defendants. Their incarceration in the death-house after new trials were ordered was without warrant in law, he said.

Divorced From Red Activities.

One of the first things the New York attorney, who has won eighty-four of the eighty-five capital cases in which he has represented defendants, sought to do was to divorce himself from the Communist activities which have helped crystalize sentiment in the South against the accused Negroes since the International Labor Defense interested itself in their case.

Governor Miller has been bombarded, under Communist direction, with telegraphed and written protests and threats in what has been interpreted here as an organized movement to coerce the courts of Alabama.

Communist organizers are also said to have capitalized on the help they have extended to the accused Negroes to further the organization work they are carrying on among the share-croppers of the black belt.

Not only did Mr. Leibowitz deny any Communist connections, but he made public letters which passed between him and William L. Patterson, the Negro secretary of the International Labor Defense, before he consented to accept the assignment to defend the accused Negroes.

"Lest there be any misapprehension among the people of the great State of Alabama regarding my entry into this case, I wish to make my own position clear at the very outset," said Mr. Leibowitz in a statement issued after his arrival.

"I have consented to defend these Negroes because the highest court of our country has decreed that they shall have new trials on the ground that they were not adequately defended at their first trial in Scottsboro.

"Nine human lives are at stake, but almost equally important is the preservation of our tradition and ideal of equal justice for all regardless of race, color or creed.

"It is true of every local community that when an outsider comes into it he runs the risk of antagonizing its people. I want the people of this country, and especially the South, to know that I am not presuming to come here to try to tell them how to administer their laws or run their affairs.

"The International Labor Defense has interested me in the case. I have become identified with it regardless of the fact that I have no connection with the Communist party or any other radical organization.

"I am not a 'Red' by the widest stretch of the imagination. As a matter of fact, it is only recently that I was a candidate for Democratic leader of an Assembly district in my home town of Brooklyn. I am a stanch supporter of Franklin D. Roosevelt and served my country to the best of my ability in the World War.

No Pay From Labor Defense.

"I am not in sympathy with the political activities of the Communists or any other radical organization. The fact is that I am receiving neither pay for my work in the case, nor have I permitted the International Labor Defense to pay 1 cent of the necessary expenses I have incurred in the defense of these boys.

"I am coming here simply as a lawyer to try a law case, fully mindful of the sincere desire of the good people of the great South to give every living thing on God's green earth a square deal.

"If these men really committed this atrocious crime charged against them, they should suffer the penalty provided by law, which is death. On the other hand, if these girls are making false accusations, then I know that there is not a red-blooded, upstanding American citizen below the Mason-Dixon Line who will not pray with heart and soul for their acquittal. I cannot subscribe to what in some quarters is the prevailing notion, that the Southerner will not give these Negro youths an absolutely fair chance for their lives."

In the letter from the International Labor Defense in which Mr. Liebowitz's assistance was sought, there was the following statement:

"We do not ask you as a condition of your acceptance as trial counsel to give up any of your social, economic or political views."

In reply Mr. Leibowitz wrote under date of Jan. 9, 1933:

"While, as you are quite aware, your organization and I are not in agreement in our political and economic views, your letter arouses my sympathetic interest, because it touches no controversial theory of economy or government, but the basic rights of man.

"Let me say at the outset that if I serve this cause, as you suggest I should, I will not serve it for money; nor will I permit you to repay the expense I may incur.

"The limits of the Scottsboro case, if I measure them correctly, rest somewhere outside the fate of the seven defendants. Within its compass reside our national conscience, our Caucasian sense of even-handed justice, and our dignity and reputation before the world.

"Not Doomed by Color of Skins."

"To help keep sacred these ancient shrines of our civilization and our national life is a duty which any man should render freely, and ask no payment except that which his fealty to his country and his pride in its ideals will provide.

"You have given me to understand that the defense was not properly presented before the first trial court, and in that assertion you have the support of the appellate tribunal's reversal of the conviction.

"At the moment, when I stand on the threshold of the case, I think it improper to discuss any of its ramifications. But it is gratifying to enter it with a warrant from the courts of Alabama to exert whatever talent I may possess in the defendants' behalf.

"I do not believe it has ever been the desire of the people of the South to deal unfairly with the Negro. Customs differ; social usages and points of view are dictated by tradition. But persons of substance in the Southern States have recognized for many generations a moral obligation toward the simple and generous folk whom slavery brought them first as chattels.

"Some of my friends have advised me to take no part in this case. They fear that the defendants have been prejudged. That irrespective of the action of the Appellate Court they are doomed because their skins are black. I cannot partake of that opinion.

"North and south, east and west, we Americans have a common tradition of justice. And if it is justice that these black men be adjudged innocent—if it is justice, I repeat—I cannot believe that the people of Alabama will be false to their great heritage of honor and to those brave and chivalrous generations of the past in whose blood the history of their State is written.

"If the views I have expressed match yours, then I will accept the task of conducting the defense."

SCOTTSBORO TRIO TELL OF TRAIN RIDE

WELL TREATED IN PRISON

But Eight at Kilby Penitentiary Are Kept in Death Cells to Avoid Riot, Warden Asserts.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 12.—George B. Walls, Warden of Kilby prison, where eight of the nine Negroes accused of attacking two white girls on a freight train near Scottsboro two years ago are confind, explained today that they were held in the death house to protect them from other prisoners.

Lawyers defending the Negroes have complained that they ~~are not~~ permitted to discuss the case with their clients except in the presence of the warden or prison guards, and they hold that confinement of the prisoners in the death cells is no longer justified because the Supreme Court has set aside death sentences imposed at Scottsboro and ordered new trials.

Warden Walls, admitting that prison rules forbade private interviews with prisoners in the death house, declared that to transfer the Negroes to the prison proper would be unsafe. When the inmates of Kilby prison are not working in the cotton mill or in the fields, they have full liberty within the prison walls until 9 P. M., when they are locked in their cells.

While the white prisoners and the Negroes occupy separate cell blocks, since Alabama laws prevent mingling of races even under prison roofs, the warden asserted that a riot would certainly follow transfer of the "Scottsboro boys" from the death house to the prison itself. The mess hall, in which all the prisoners except the inmates of the death house eat, is divided only by a partition eight feet high.

Allowed to See Prisoners.

The warden readily consented to escort a reporter through the prison, of which he is extremely proud, and into the death house itself to talk with the Negroes in the Scottsboro case. The death house cells are as roomy as the other cells, and each has a window and modern plumbing.

The only difference in the treatment of death-house inmates and others is that the former are kept locked in their cells all the time, except twice a week when they are taken singly to the shower room for baths. Since the Scottsboro Negroes are being held for safe-keeping for Jackson County, they cannot be put to work in the prison shops.

The death house is really one end of a wing of the main prison building, separated from the rest by steel doors. It contains a dozen cells, each of which is occupied by a Negro. A metal door and a short passageway lead to the execution chamber with its yellow-varnished electric chair in the centre.

In the presence of the warden each of the prisoners was asked if he had been mistreated since his arrival at Kilby prison in April, 1931. Most of them solemnly assured the visitor that they were "treated all right." A few, who have been cautioned not to discuss the case with strangers, simply said:

"See my lawyer."

Andy Wright, Claude Patterson and Charles Williams declared they knew nothing about the crime of which they were accused and that they had seen no white girls on the train, nor had they engaged in a fight with white boys. They had been on an oil-tank car, they said. What had happened as the freight train traveled from Chattanooga to Paint Rock they had learned only when they were taken off by an armed posse there and accused of attacking the girls.

Leibowitz to Arrive Today.

Their story conformed with that told by Roy Wright, the 15-year-old Negro boy held in jail at Birmingham, who has denied any part in the crime and has described the mistreatment he says was administered to him and his companions by militiamen and deputy sheriffs while he was awaiting trial at Scottsboro.

Samuel Leibowitz of New York, who will head the battery of legal talent engaged by the International Labor Defense to try to save the accused youths from the electric chair, is due in Chattanooga tomorrow to confer with George W. Chamlee, the Tennessee lawyer, who last Tuesday won a change of venue.

Judge A. E. Hawkins, who granted the motion of the defense, transferred the trial to Decatur instead of Birmingham, thus going counter to the wishes of the defense. Upon Mr. Leibowitz's arrival, there will probably be a decision on whether to ask Judge Hawkins to reconsider the motion for a change of venue to permit defense counsel to introduce evidence of prejudice against the Negroes in Decatur.

A motion to quash the indictments on the ground that jury commissioners of Jackson County systematically excluded Negroes from the grand jury which indicted the Negroes will be argued before the judge who will preside at the trial.

It is this phase of the case which is causing the greatest concern to the people of Alabama who regard it as a challenge to the whole jury system of the State. Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr. has said that he will fight the attack on his State's jury system in the United States Supreme Court if necessary.

Scottsboro Trials Set For March 27

Cases of the seven negroes convicted of criminally assaulting [illegible] young white girls near Scottsboro in March, 1931, and who are to be retried through a change of venue [illegible] County, will be [illegible] Circuit Court at Decatur on Monday, March 27.

The date was announced following a conference at the Capitol yesterday with Atty. Gen. Knight [illegible] Samuel S. Leibowitz, of New York, and George W. Chamlee, of Chattanooga, Tenn., prominent figures in the array of defense counsel for the negroes.

The visitors who were here to discuss the time for calling the cases, suggested to the Attorney General that March 27 would be agreeable to them. Mr. Knight made no objection to the suggestion and Judge James E. Horton, of the Morgan Circuit Court, being communicated with by telephone, formally designated that date.

When the cases are called, Judge Horton will set the trials to begin within a few days, this additional space of time being required on account of the necessity of drawing the venire for selection of jurors in the presence of the defendants. At that time also, Judge Horton will rule on the motion of defense attorneys to quash the indictments, based on the contention that negroes are not included in the jury roll of Morgan County, nor the jury roll of Jackson County where the defendants were originally tried.

A Moderate Liberal from the South.

"GENERAL" GEORGE W. CHAMLEE, of Chattanooga, Tenn., a loyal Southern Baptist, a supporter of Governor Horton's Democratic machine, raised his voice on behalf of nine Negro boys at Scottsboro, Ala., this [illegible], although he didn't get everything he wanted, he at least obtained a change of venue to hold the trial in another county.

The title comes from his twenty years' service as solicitor general of Hamilton County, district attorney here, a position in which he prosecuted some 500 murder cases, other crimes in proportion. The Negroes have come to adore him as their shield and protector, but he retains the trust of the better element of white Southerners too, since, as he explains it, he is fighting to get those boys as fair a trial in the South as any State could give them.

He's no radical. He was brought to New York last fall and given a banquet by the Scottsboro Boys' causers here. He hadn't heard so much radical talk in all his life before. When he was asked to speak he said he was "Powerful glad to be here," and then told a story:—

"THERE were two sons down in Tennessee who inherited a flock of sheep from their father. One was kind of dull, and he had raised up a young ram lamb called Alec that he was very fond of. The other brother was smart, and he said, 'I'll divide the sheep into two flocks, and you can take your choice between them.' So he put all the fat fine sheep in one flock and the scrawny ones in the other, and Alec in with them. That was to catch his brother.

"'The dull brother went out to take his pick. He went right up and put his arms around Alec and he said, 'Alec, I love you and I'd certainly like to have you, but you're in the wrong flock.'"

Tall, lanky, gray-haired, about 60, fearless when threatened in unpopular causes, he is the moderate Southern liberal. He feels out of place among the radicals. He is what he himself would describe in another as a good "co'te house lawyer."

Once in Chattanooga he was defending two Northern strike leaders. The prosecutor assailed the Reds and foreigners who "came in and shot the Red, White and Blue full of holes."

"Stop! Stop!" objected General Chamlee. "Your daddy and my daddy lie buried side by side out here in the Confederate graveyard, honored for doing just that. You can insult the memory of your daddy if you want to, but you can't insult mine."

"Not guilty" reported the jury.

The Scottsboro Case Again

WITH THE opening of the second Scottsboro trial the old fires of violence and intimidation have broken out afresh. They seem, indeed, to burn even more hotly than they did during the first trial, when mobs of armed men surrounded the courthouse and, after the verdict was announced, jubilantly paraded the streets behind a brass band blaring, "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight." During the hearings which recently took place in Scottsboro, when the defense was granted a change of venue to Decatur, the atmosphere in the town resembled to an alarming extent that which pervaded it during the first trial. Armed men crowded the courthouse or loitered in the streets. Farmers in their Sunday best came in from the country to see the sport and everything suggested that the mob was ready to execute justice in its own fashion.

New Republic

The change of venue to Decatur was in no way a victory for the defense, which is now endeavoring to have Judge E. A. Hawkins rescind his order and have the trial held in Birmingham. There the chances of mob violence are less. Decatur, a town of 20,000 inhabitants, is but fifty miles from Scottsboro and there is little reason to believe that the contagion of violence from the latter town has not spread to it. Moreover, the jail in Decatur is a flimsy structure, the doors could be battered down easily and in case the boys are acquitted there, an eventuality which grows more and more remote as feeling rises, attempts would certainly be made upon their lives. "The boys will burn," a representative citizen announced to one of the International Labor Defense lawyers handling the case. "They'll either burn in the chair—or they'll burn otherwise."

3-22-33

New York N.Y.

During the last few months there have been two developments which show on what dubious testimony the boys were convicted. The first of these was the repudiation of her testimony by Ruby Bates—one of the two girls who brought charges of rape—in a letter which we reprinted two weeks ago. Since the publication of this letter and the opening of the new trial Ruby Bates has disappeared. It is highly improbable, however, that the prosecution is sitting up nights waiting for her—so discredited a witness would hardly be of much value in the new trial, even though her testimony nearly sent the nine Negro boys to their death two years ago.

The other interesting development was an interview with Roy Wright, published on March 10 in The New York Times, which, incidentally is displaying a remarkable degree of journalistic integrity in its handling of the case. Roy Wright, it will be remembered, was the youngest of the Negro lads—he was only thirteen at the time of his arrest—and his testimony was used to convict two of his friends. In the interview with the Times reporter, the first which the prison authorities have permitted in the last two years, Roy Wright alleges that he was whipped into turning state's evidence. This is his story as reported by The New York Times:

> I was sitting in a chair in front of the judge and one of those girls was testifying. One of the deputy sheriffs leaned over to me and asked me if I was going to turn state's evidence, and I said no, because I didn't know anything about this case.
> Then the trial stopped awhile and the deputy sheriff beckoned to me to come out into another room—the room back of the place where the judge was sitting—and I went. They whipped me and it seemed like they was going to kill me. All the time they kept saying, "Now will you tell?" and finally it seemed like I couldn't stand no more and I said yes.
> Then I went back into the courtroom and they put me up on the chair in front of the judge and began asking a lot of questions, and I said I had seen Charlie Weems and Clarence Norris in the gondola car with the white girls.

There is danger that the Sacco-Vanzetti case will be reënacted in Alabama—that "those damned niggers" will burn as a lesson to their race, just as "those anarchist bastards" were killed to preserve the good name of the Massachusetts courts. If anything, the animus against the Scottsboro boys is more violent. It is all the more imperative that their case should receive the widest support, and that the I.L.D. should be given every possible aid in its fight to save the boys from the onrush of class fear and race hatred.

Leibowitz Wins Transfer to Birmingham, Where Private Interviews Are Not Prohibited.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 15.—Seven of the nine Negroes accused of attacking two white girls on a freight train near Scottsboro two years ago will go on trial for their lives a second time at Decatur, Ala., the seat of Morgan County.

Judge Horton, before whom the Negroes will be tried, agreed today to give the case precedence over all others on his calendar. This was the most important result of a conference here between Thomas E. Knight Jr., the young Attorney General who will prosecute the Negroes, and Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of defense counsel.

Prior to the conference with the Attorney General, Mr. Leibowitz, George W. Chamlee and Joseph Brodsky, the defense attorneys, failed in an effort to obtain the right to interview without surveillance by prison officials the eight prisoners confined in death cells at Kilby prison.

Leaving the prison, Mr. Leibowitz went straight to Mr. Knight and announced his intention of making immediate application for a writ of habeas corpus calling for the immediate production of all the prisoners except Roy Wright, a 15-year-old prisoner in jail at Birmingham.

Mr. Knight asked for a few minutes' delay while he discussed matters with members of the Supreme Court, which was then in session. Returning to his office, he informed Mr. Leibowitz that he would not oppose an application by the defense for transfer of the eight Kilby prisoners to Birmingham, where prison rules do not forbid private interviews with inmates.

Youth's Charges Are Cited.

Papers were then drawn up to be signed by the Sheriff of Jackson County, where the crime was committed; Judge A. E. Hawkins, before whom the first trial was held, and Judge Horton, who will preside over the new trial. The latter was ordered by the United States Supreme Court when it set aside the death sentences originally imposed on the ground that the negroes did not have adequate representation by counsel.

Mr. Leibowitz sought to win Mr. Knight's consent to a reopening of the argument on the already granted motion for a change of venue, in order that he might submit proof that Birmingham was a more suitable place for the new trial than Decatur, because of the necessity of calling the militia for protection of the prisoners at the latter place.

The Attorney General refused to assist in that matter in any way, taking the position that it had been settled finally by Judge Hawkins when he named Decatur.

Mr. Leibowitz then called the Attorney General's attention to the Wright boy's statement that he was stabbed by a member of the State militia while the troops were protecting him and his fellow defendants from a lynching mob at Scottsboro.

Mr. Leibowitz said he was anxious to avoid the necessity of depending on the militia for the protection of his clients during their trial and urged the Attorney General to summon the troops who were on duty at Scottsboro for a line-up to permit Wright to identify the man who assaulted him.

Mr. Wright said he did not regard the unsupported word of a Negro prisoner as sufficiently important to warrant such an order, but he told Mr. Leibowitz that he would prosecute the offender if the Negro made a formal complaint against a specific individual and the New York lawyer could locate the alleged offender.

Defense to Assail Jury System.

Although Judge Horton agreed to set the trial down for March 27, the selection of a jury to try the accused Negroes will not begin until the 30th. Before the Negroes are tried, Mr. Leibowitz plans to place the jury system of Alabama on trial by calling witnesses to support a motion now pending to quash the indictments on the ground that Negroes are systematically excluded from jury duty.

It is this phase of the case, touching on one of the fundamentals of the Negro question of the South, which has come to be the paramount issue involved, overshadowing in interest here the fate of the accused men themselves.

Both sides are searching the law books and records for precedents and decisions to bolster up their respective positions.

With the trial date set and a way found to overcome the barriers to private consultation with the eight death-house prisoners, Mr. Leibowitz started at once to Atlanta to catch an airplane tomorrow morning for New York, where he is to appear as defense counsel in a murder trial scheduled to start on Monday. He expects to return to Alabama a week from Friday.

Mr. Brodsky will accompany him and in their absence Mr. Chamlee will be in charge of preparation of the defense case.

Mr. Chamlee is expected to go to Scottsboro tomorrow to try to obtain Judge Hawkins's consent to the order for transferring the prisoners and arrange for the issuance of subpoenas for several witnesses whose presence at the trial is desired by the defense attorneys.

HATRED UNDER THE MAGNOLIA BLOSSOMS!

Montgomery Ala.

The hired pens of the International Labor Defense League, it seems to us, have taken to writing their little hyms of hate in faded violet ink.

Not that the paid hack writers are altogether lacking in imagination and sulphuric splutters. Nothing of the kind! They still show gifts for grinding out fiction and always they can repeat "Legal Lynching," "Legal Murder," and "Boss Control," not to mention the other half-dozen words of the American Communist Party vocabulary.

But the dirty-collared, long-haired young men who sit in New York offices of the International Labor Defense League and write "news" dispatches of what is happening in Scottsboro, Ala., have not been earning their daily bread. Or at least, they are failing to make good on a job which any mediocre hate-propagandist should succeed.

Unembarrassed by questions of truth, and unhampered by any prejudices in favor of facts, which they might feel if they actually were on the scene, it seems to us that these gentlemen at least should make the poison more painful than they have of late.

Now since these paid scrubs of journalism are trying to make a case and are not embarrassed by numerous flights of fancy and are not concerned with justice in either direction, there is no complaint to make against the phrase, "nine innocent Negro boys," and "Attorney General Knight's legal lynch plans," which flower in nearly every piece of literature coming from the League's Hate-Hokum factory.

They make no pretense that they are not painting the prisoners lily-white in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" fashion. And they make no pretense that they are not trying to picture the State of Alabama and its law enforcement agencies, its courts and its people as red-eyed monsters with blood-stained, spurred boots, horsewhips and noosed ropes, up to God knows what, plans for making existence more unbearable for pig-stuck Workers.

But former experiences with these literary gentlemen had taught us to expect more from them.

Take the following paragraphs which were culled from one of the latest "dispatches" manufactured in the I. L. D. workshop, mailed to newspapers, churches and not a few of the Do-Or-Die "liberal" organizations.

It seems that the defenders of the Scottsboro rapists object to Decatur as a trial site. They write:

> Decatur, I. L. D. officials pointed out, is a town of 20,000 population, only about 50 miles from Scottsboro, and about the same distance as that from Huntsville, the center from which the organization of "vigilance committee" to make sure of the lynching of the boys, has spread.
> It is also the center for gangs of criminals who infest the railway lines of Alabama, and make a special practice of terrorizing and beating Negroes. Described by Northern Alabamians as a "big Saturday town," it is another Scottsboro on a larger scale. By the expression, it was explained, is meant that it is a town whose normal population is swelled on Saturdays, holidays, and court days, by a huge influx of white farmers, who come in armed and ready for a lynching or any other form of excitement that might present itself.
> The population being about nine times that of Scottsboro, and of much the same composition, Decatur on court day would present much the same aspect as Scottsboro did on the April, 1931, day when a band played "There'll Be A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," as the lynch-verdicts were handed down against the Negro boys.

Decatur, the quiet but kindly little North Alabama town, doubtless is surprised to learn of its lawlessness. The citizens of Decatur do not care to stage the Scottsboro trial in their city. And if the trial is held there, they will endure it as an expensive duty just as Scottsboro did. (And Scottsboro, a victim of geographical circumstances, is downright sick of the mess.)

But we should like to help the weary hate-hacks.

Why not go the whole hog and spread some real hatred toward Alabama and Alabamians?

We submit to them that:

There is an unwritten law in this State that every male white Boss in Alabama must practice bird hunting first on the down-trodden white and Negro workers, before reaching the age of twelve years.

The police departments of all Alabama towns have been ordered to remove corpses of Workers from the streets every 24 hours, except on "court days."

And on "court days" as all good I. L. D. public relations advisers know, the entire Boss population appears in spangled uniform to serenade jurors who have promised before-hand to send a batch of innocent Workers to the electric chair.

But by far the greatest gala occasion in Alabama is the mid-Winter festival at which the wealthy Boss class, (of which nine-tenths of Alabamians are members) gather in the court rooms of their respective counties to enjoy the wholesale scalping of the children of the Worker classes.

But why go further? We extend a personal invitation to the New York typewriter-snipers as sportsman to sportsman to visit Alabama and take part in the Anti-Worker Field Day, marking the beginning of the annual open season on the proletarians.

No guns are necessary in this sport as the State Government furnishes specially-trained native Alabama jaguars and laughing hyenas (abundant in this State) with which to track down innocent Workers.

We Alabamians thoroughly enjoy our native sports!

SCOTTSBORO BOYS' REMOVAL HELD UP

Trial in Decatur to Begin March 27

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., March 17.—Following the victory of the attorneys of the International Labor Defense in compelling Alabama's attorney-general, Knight, to consent to transfer the Scottsboro boys from the death house in Kilby prison to the Jefferson county jail in Birmingham Ala., legal obstacles have been placed in the way which will postpone this action.

Two circuit judges as well as Sheriff McBryde of Jackson county, where the original frame-up of the innocent Negro youths first originated, must sign the "consent" order before they can be removed to the Birmingham jail.

Will Be Taken from Death Cell.

Not only will the removal take the Scottsboro boys out of the death cells in Kilby prison, but will enable defense attorneys to discuss their case with them privately, without interference by prison officials and guards—a situation which has existed during the entire time the boys have been imprisoned.

The trial is scheduled to begin on March 27. Some time before that date the Negro boys will be removed to the Morgan county jail from which they will be taken to Decatur where the fight to free the boys will be made by the International Labor Defense. Decatur, which is only 50 miles from Scottsboro, is the place to which the trial scene was moved, after the defense attorneys sought unsuccessfully to win a change of venue to Birmingham, one of the large industrial centers of the South.

Protest Drive On.

Meanwhile, from its national office in New York, the I.L.D. urged an intensification of the protest campaign against the legal lynching of the Scottsboro boys. Recently Gov. Miller of Alabama admitted that he had received "no less than 150,000 protest wires and resolutions" demanding freedom for the framed-up youths.

Temper and Venue.

In the Scottsboro case a change of venue has shifted the new trial ordered by the United States Supreme Court fifty miles from Jackson County, Ala., to Morgan County, in the same State. It is not to be supposed that fundamentally there is much difference in public sentiment between the two places in a case involving charges of criminal assault on white women by Negro men. But the difference of fifty miles hardly measures the change for the better that has come over public feeling everywhere in Alabama since the intervention of the Supreme Court.

New York

It was all very well to protest against interference by outsiders and in particular by "radicals" from New York. Chief Justice HUGHES and his associates are neither outsiders nor radicals. Their caveat against imposing wholesale death sentences in a doubtful case could not but bring even the people of Scottsboro to a soberer state of mind. The change of venue was probably welcomed in Scottsboro. It averted a formal recantation.

A program of addresses of five radicals and liberals on the exploitation and injustices meted Negroes in the South, sponsored by the National Scottsboro Committee, will be offered tonight at 8:30 at Radamsky's Studio, 66 Fifth avenue.

The Amsterdam News erred last week in stating that the program would be last Wednesday night. The speakers scheduled are Malcolm Cowley, editor of the New Republic; John L. Spivak, auhtor of "Georgia Nigger"; William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense; Joseph R. Brodsky and Allan Taub, chief counsel and associate in the Scottsboro defense. The Labor Defense has started a campaign to raise $10,000 to conduct the legal fight for the youths held in Alabama.

NEGRO LAD TELLS SCOTTSBORO STORY

Roy Wright, in First Interview Allowed, Protests Innocence and That of 3 With Him.

ONLY SAW GIRLS LATER

New York, N.Y.

Forced by Beatings During Trial to Testify Falsely Against Eight Fellow-Defendants, He Says.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., March 9.—Roy Wright, 15-year-old Negro, who with eight others of his race is awaiting trial for his life for an alleged attack on two white girls, denied his guilt today and made grave charges against militiamen and deputy sheriffs in the first interview any of the prisoners has given since their arrest nearly two years ago.

The interview took place in the Bertillon room of Birmingham's $5,000,000 modernistic jail. Only Wright's counsel, Irving Schwab, sent here by the International Labor Defense to try to save the accused Negroes from the electric chair, and a reporter were present with the youth.

Wright's fellow-defendants, three of whom at least he said were as innocent of wrongdoing as himself, are in death cells at Kilby Prison in Montgomery, although the United States Supreme Court on Nov. 7 set aside their conviction and ordered new trials for all. They are not permitted to talk to any one beyond earshot of their guards.

Of the nine accused men, Wright was the only one who was not found guilty of participating in the alleged attack on Rudy Bates and Victoria Price on a freight train bound from Chattanooga to Memphis on the afternoon of March 25, 1931. Because of his apparent youth, he was tried in Juvenile Court, and the jury which heard the evidence against him was unable to agree on a verdict.

Wright Tells His Story.

A slender figure, four inches taller now than he was when he entered jail, the young Negro charged that deputy sheriffs whipped him in the court house at Scottsboro, where the first trials were held, until he agreed to testify falsely for the State against his fellow-defendants.

Upon his right cheek between his ear and his nose, there is a scar like a vaccination mark. It is a reminder, Wright says, of the day when he and his companions were taken from the freight train at Paint Rock by an armed posse and carried to the Jackson County jail, where the militia was called to save them all from lynching.

One of his protectors, Wright said, jabbed a bayonet through his cheek just before he was locked in a cell.

The hours and days that followed between his arrest and the trials which were held in less than a fortnight, were full of terror and horror to him, according to Wright, whose memory of the events seems somewhat confused.

He knows that he had a trial, he says, because he has ben told that the Supreme Court ruled that he must be tried again. He remembers that two lawyers asked him questions, but he is not quite sure which was the State Solicitor and which was Milo Moody, the lawyer assigned by Judge A. E. Hawkins to defend all the prisoners. He remembers that Stephen Roddy, a lawyer who appeared as a friend of the court, urged him to plead guilty "and get a life sentence instead of the chair."

Recalls First Day of Trials.

Most vivid in his mind, however, is the memory of what happened on the first day of the trials, which were all finished in three days, just before he was called to the witness stand in the case of Haywood Patterson, one of his friends from Chattanooga. Not all the Negroes were tried together, but all were brought from the jail to the court house at each session of the court.

This is the way Wright described what happened:

"I was sitting in a chair in front of the judge and one of those girls was testifying. One of the deputy sheriffs leaned over to me and asked me if I was going to turn State's evidence, and I said no, because I didn't know anything about this case.

"Then the trial stopped awhile and the deputy sheriff beckoned to me to come out into another room—the room back of the place where the judge was sitting—and I went. They whipped me and it seemed like they was going to kill me. All the time they kept saying, 'Now will you tell?' and finally it seemed like I couldn't stand no more and I said yes.

"Then I went back into the courtroom and they put me up on the chair in front of the judge and began asking a lot of questions, and I said I had seen Charlie Weems and Clarence Norris in the gondola car with the white girls."

Wright insisted today that this testimony which he gave was entirely false and declared he made the statement only because he knew that if he didn't he would be subjected to another beating.

Account of Ride on Freight.

As he related the events of the day when the attack on the girls is alleged to have taken place he and three other Negro youths from Chattanooga, Tenn., hopped a freight in the yards there, intending to go to Memphis in search of work. The others, who Wright says were with him "on an oil tank car between two box cars," were his brother, Andy Wright, Patterson and Eugene Williams.

"I didn't see no white girls and no white boys either," said the young Negro, hitching up the blue overalls which are the uniform of colored inmates of the prison.

Wright remembered that the freight slowed down almost to a stop at Stevenson, a way station between Chattanooga and Scottsboro, but he declared he neither saw nor heard anything of a fight between Negroes and the seven white hoboes, who were thrown off the train there before the alleged attack took place. It was there, too, that the girls were supposed to have crawled from a box car into a gondola car, in which they testified they were attacked.

"The firstest I knowed anything was wrong, or knowed who else was on that train," said Wright, "was when that crowd of white men stopped the train at Paint Rock and took us off. They took us up the railroad bank to a white rock and stood us against it with their guns aimed at our heads.

"One of the white men said to me, 'Come on now, nigger, tell us who pushed those white boys off the train, 'cause we don't want to punish anybody but the guilty ones. If you tell us which ones did it we'll let you others go.' And I told them I didn't know anything about it and hadn't seen nothing.

Ordered to "Get Going."

"Then one of them said to me 'you know, nigger, we don't let no darkies hang around here, and if we catch you anywhere near here after dark we'll shoot you. Now get going.'

"Andy (that's my brother), Haywood, Eugene and me—we started away. Nobody said nothing until we had walked some little way and then they called us back and loaded us on a truck, tied our hands and feet with rope and carried us to the jail in Scottsboro."

According to Wright, he first set eyes on the two white girls when he saw them among the crowd along the railroad tracks. Nothing was said there about the alleged attack he asserted.

The crowd around the jail at Scottsboro was small when the Negroes arrived there about 2:30 P. M. By 4 o'clock, however, the militia had been called out to keep the mob from rushing the jail.

Twice during the late afternoon and evening, Wright said, the girls were brought into the section of the jail where the Negroes were held. Twice, according to Wright, they said they could not identify any one.

They were brought in a third time, he said, and the Price woman, who has been married three times, said she could identify them all. The Bates girl, who disappeared nine days ago from her home in Huntsville, still refused to identify any one, according to the young prisoner.

The seven white men who were routed from the train after the fight with Negroes, some of whom also are said to have jumped off the train before it got to Paint Rock, were rounded up before the first trial and held in jail until the sentences were imposed. They were never called upon to identify.

Wright, who will be 16 years old next Oct. 27, went to school only "about three or four years," and can "read and write a little bit." His eyes "went bad," he said, and he had to leave school to take a job sweeping out a store. He has a tortoise-shell-rimmed pince nez, which won't stay on his flat nose, but of which he is very proud. It was given him by a fellow-prisoner.

The young Negro, whose mother, Mamie Williams, lives in a two-room shanty in the Negro section of Chattanooga, declared he never had been in trouble with the police except on one occasion, when he spent the night in a cell for "keeping late hours."

He and the three Chattanooga Negroes arrested with him in the present case, he said, had been to a motion-picture show and were returning home, about 11:30 P. M., when a policeman picked them up for disregarding the curfew.

Beaten After Conviction, He Says.

The beatings to which he said he and his companions were subjected after their arrest two years ago continued, he alleged, even after they were convicted. At Gadsden jail, where they were transferred after death sentences had been passed upon them, he said, Patterson seized a gun from a deputy sheriff and warned him not to come one step nearer.

"Haywood," said Wright, "ain't afraid of nothing or anybody. He just took the gun away from that deputy sheriff and said, 'We've been sentenced to death already for nothing and we ain't going to take any more beatings. Go ahead, now, and shoot if you want to, but I'll shoot too.'

"It wouldn't have been no good, though," said Wright, "because the gun Haywood got was only a .32 and they had all those machine guns and things. I don't believe it would have gone off, even."

Young Wright is anxiously awaiting his new trial. He was not especially pleased, however, when he was told it probably would be held at Decatur, in Morgan County.

"I don't like that much better than Scottsboro," he said. "It's right next to where those girls live."

Preparations for the new trial are proceeding. G. W. Chamlee, the Tennessee lawyer who argued successfully for a change of venue from Scottsboro, was preparing several new motions at his office in Chattanooga.

Thomas Knight Jr., the Attorney General, who will take personal charge of the prosecution, was waiting for his assistant, Thomas Lawson, to finish collating the voluminous record of the case before taking any steps toward bringing the Negroes to trial for the second time.

Nine Negro Youths to Start New Fight for Their Lives in Alabama Court.

HOPES PINNED ON LETTER

New York, N.Y.

WORLD WATCHES CASE

Supreme Court of United States Ordered New Trial for the Young Men.

SCOTTSBORO, Ala., March 4 (AP).—Scottsboro's little brick court house, where a death sentence was pronounced less than two years ago that brought protests from all over the world, is to see the beginning of a new phase in the famous "Scottsboro case" Monday.

Nine youthful Negroes will begin a new fight for their lives when the case comes up for a new trial, ordered by the United States Supreme Court. Eight of them had been sentenced to death after their conviction on the charge of attacking two white girls aboard a freight train.

Upon a letter, scrawled with pencil on rough paper, and a change of venue, the Negroes and their attorneys pin their hopes for acquittal and freedom.

Counsel Retained for Youths.

In striking contrast with the first trial, when the youths were defended by lawyers appointed by the court, this time they will have a battery of counsel employed by the International Labor Defense of New York, headed by George W. Chamlee of Chattanooga, Tenn.

On the opposite side of the table, representing the State, will be Thomas E. Knight Jr., Attorney General of Alabama, and T. E. Lawson, Assistant Attorney General.

The letter already is disputed evidence. The defense contends it was written by Ruby Bates, one of the complaining witnesses, and that it repudiates her testimony at the first trial. The State contends it was obtained while the girl was unaware of its contents, after drinking.

Defense attorneys contend the letter substantiates their statements that the Negroes were victims of a "frame-up." The letter sets forth that the girl was not a victim of an attack, but "those policemen made me tell a lie. * * * Those Negroes did not touch me."

The case already has been reviewed by the United States Supreme Court, where the death sentences were set aside and new trials ordered. In the meantime, from cities throughout the world have come protests and pleas that the Negroes, who now range in age from 16 to 23 years, be released.

Ada Wright, mother of two of the defendants, under sponsorship of organizations which had interested themselves in the case, toured Europe enlisting aid in the fight for their freedom. Many European notables, including Professor Albert Einstein, sent protests against the death sentences to Governor B. M. Miller of Alabama.

The nine Negroes were taken from the train at Paint Rock, Ala., the afternoon of March 25, 1931. Lodged in jail here, the Negroes were guarded by Sheriff M. L. Wann and citizens he had picked, while scores of men gathered about the Court House Square. When the crowds had dispersed, the prisoners were removed to Gadsden. A Jackson County grand jury returned true bills charging the Negroes with attacking the two girls, an offense punishable by death in Alabama.

Charlie Weems, 21, of Atlanta and Clarence Norris, 19, of Chattanooga were the first to be tried. Their trial began April 6. National Guards maintained order, and while the jury deliberated in the first case Heywood Patterson, 17, of Chattanooga was brought to trial. A verdict of guilty was brought in for Weems and Norris.

Then Eugene Williams, 15, and Andy Wright, 17, both of Chattanooga; Ozie Powell, 16, of Atlanta; Olen Montgomery, 17, of Monroe, Ga., and Willie Robertson, 17, of Columbus, Ga., were placed on trial.

Eight Sentenced to Die.

All were found guilty, and on April 9 Judge A. E. Hawkins sentenced them to death, making the first time in the history of Alabama that a judge had sentenced eight men at one time for a single offense. The ninth boy, Roy Wright, 14, was not convicted.

The International Labor Defense intervened and employed counsel, who declared they would take the case to the highest court in the land.

On March 25, 1932, one year from the day the Negroes were arrested, the Alabama Supreme Court affirmed the death sentence of all except Eugene Williams, reversing his conviction on contentions of defense counsel that he was a juvenile.

The other cases were taken to the United States Supreme Court, where the death sentences were set aside and a new trial was ordered.

Scottsboro Mothers Wait for Boys to Come Home

By GRACE LUMPKIN

Daily Worker
New York, N.Y.
3-6-33

When the International Labor Defense sent representatives to Alabama, and hired lawyers to defend the nine Scottsboro boys, the mother of one of the boys wrote—"We thought we were alone in the world without friends, and suddenly we found people ready to defend our boys."

When the United States Supreme Court ordered a new trial for the Scottsboro boys another mother said,—"We are glad and happy over the new trial. You tell us the workers are glad, too. It is fine to know that others are rejoiced."

I would like to make a map of the South, the sort of animated map that is sometimes used in the movies. On the map, throughout the South, in Memphis, Tennessee, in Chattanooga, in Atlanta, I would like to draw, single and isolated, the sort of shacks in which the mothers of the Scottsboro boys—working women—are forced by the rich owners of this country to live in misery and poverty. From these shacks and cabins, I would draw straight lines running toward and centering in Kilby prison in Alabama where the sons of those mothers lie in death cells waiting for another trial which will decide whether they are to be free, or are to be murdered in the electric chair. For it would be murder, since it has been proved that these boys are innocent.

If you have children, you probably know the anxiety of waiting for a small son or daughter who has not come home from school or from an errand on which you sent him. Has he been run over by a car or a truck, you ask yourself. It is getting dark. Why doesn't he come? You are tense with anxiety. If you have felt this distress, you will know, partly, what the mothers of these boys have gone through since their children left home nearly two years ago to find jobs.

You will know how they waited for word, and the misery which came to them when they heard that the boys, instead of finding jobs, found the death cells of a prison. These mothers are still waiting. And while they wait, isolated in their cabins, they are helped only by the fact that other mothers, other workers, are standing by them.

ON the map of the South with the cabins and the lines running toward Kilby prison, I would like to add other lines. These would come from places all over the world, and all over the United States, showing that workers in these places are rejoicing because of the new trial that has been set for the boys, rejoicing with those mothers, waiting in their cabins.

Mrs. Netrefa, a working woman, heard about the Scottsboro boys and their mothers. She came to the office of the International Labor Defense.

"I read and read the appeal," she said, "until I was crying and praying till I come here. I had a little boy once and he died. I know how I would feel if he was in that jail. I make four dollars washing clothes, but I gladly give three dollars to help the fight, so the poor boys get free and go home to their mothers."

NOT only our sympathy goes to these mothers, but, like Mrs. Netrefa, our money, our hard earned, scarce pennies and nickels should go to them through the International Labor Defense.

We have rejoiced over the new trial. Now it is necessary to work, so that in March, when that trial is carried on in Alabama there will be enough money to fight it through. So there can be a full and complete celebration of a full and complete victory.

IF I were making that animated map of the South, I would draw another line, straight from Kilby prison in Alabama, to Atlanta, Georgia, where Angelo Herndon, another young Negro worker is in jail, sentenced to a living death on the chain gang.

Angelo Herndon wished to help unemployed white and Negro workers get the relief that the city of Atlanta had promised them. These workers were without food, and the city of Atlanta was keeping back $6,000 which would give them food. Angelo Herndon led a crowd of white and Negro workers to the City Hall to demand that the city use that money to keep them alive.

The "City Fathers" of Atlanta were forced to give the food, but they revenged themselves by having Angelo Herndon arrested. They dug up an old law under which they could convict him.

Since these "Fathers" are interested in digging into the past, they might also remember that the Declaration of Independence says that every citizen has the right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." It is evident that they do not think workers are "citizens," and that they feel that anyone who leads workers toward life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, should be punished with a life that is really death, a life of hard work, of blows from a chain gang guard, of heavy chains and sweat box punishment.

In thinking of the Scottsboro boys, we must not forget this other boy who was brave enough to risk his life in order to lead these workers toward life.

It is a curious fact that the prosecutor who had Angelo Herndon arrested, who is trying with all his power to send him to the chain gang, is a preacher. This preacher sings at church that hymn which says, "Rejoice ye pure in heart, rejoice, give thanks and sing." He believes that the "pure in heart" will go to heaven. He believes that workers who will accept starvation, who do not fight for the right to live, are "pure in heart." And if they do not fight, he promises them heaven when they die. He, really, leads them to death. Angelo Herndon wished to lead the workers to happiness on this earth, to life. For this the death preaching prosecutor is trying to give a death sentence to this young Negro.

We want, with our words, our fist upraised together, with all the money we can give, to save Angelo Herndon from the living death this preacher and the rich people he represents have prepared for him. We want to give Angelo Herndon life. Then we can rejoice. It will be workers rejoicing in Life when we have freed the Scottsboro boys.

WE may never see them. We may never see their mothers. But we will feel that line drawing us to them, and not only to them, but to all workers who are thinking of life for the working class instead of death. We will look about us and say, when we have freed them—"This is not only my joy. It is the joy of the whole working class. Others are rejoiced."

But in order that we may say this, there is, between now and the trials of all these young Negro workers, much to be done—pennies and nickels to get together. A steady stream of them must go down from the office of the International Labor Defense in New York to the offices in Atlanta and Alabama. Let us help with all our power to swell that stream.

By WILLIAM L. PATTERSON

(National Secretary, International Labor Defense)

Daily Worker [illegible]

The International Labor Defense is an organization of defense based upon the principles of class struggle. It believes that "every class struggle is a political struggle," and its experience has been that every defense struggle at once takes on a political character.

Against the worker or poor farmer defendant at every point stand the united forces of the State. Whether the arrest be for picketing, as in the mining strikes in Kentucky, Pennsylvania, West Virginia and Ohio; in the farmers' milk strike in Rochester, New York, or the food strikes of the farmers in the Middle West; whether it be for participation in strike demonstrations like the New England textile strikes, the steel strikes, etc.; whether it be for engaging in a struggle against evictions, the shutting off of water, gas and electricity for non-payment; whether the arrest grows out of a demonstration of international solidarity against the deportation of alien workers or to develop unity and solidarity between Negro and white workers against lynch law justice, jim-crowism, or on the broader front of defense struggle, it makes little difference.

If the worker, black or white, native or foreign-born, or those sympathizing with him, has sought to protect working class interests or lives, he finds, in the administration of the law, the hand of the State against him. The class struggle begun on the streets or in the shop is carried into the court room. The forces of working class defense rally the forces of capitalist "justice" and "democracy."

Capitalist "Justice"

Capitalist justice in theory is expressed in the beautiful democratic phrases contained in the constitutions of the capitalist governments, in the high-sounding phrases by which the Judge and the Prosecutor proclaim even-handed justice. The real class essence of capitalist justice is exposed when an Angelo Herndon is given 18 years at hard labor on a chain gang—his "crime" was that he demanded bread and work for unemployed and starving "forgotten" black and white toilers; when Mooney and Billings, whose "crimes" were that they demanded for the working class the right to apply its right to organize, its right of free speech, are given life imprisonment by a capitalist court; when Sacco and Vanzetti are ruthlessly murdered to terrorize an awakening working class; when nine innocent youths of an oppressed nation are railroaded to the electric chair to smash with terror any striving of their people for national liberation. A clear analysis of these events helps to destroy the illusions of the impartiality of capitalist justice and capitalist fair play.

The "Militant," organ in the United States of Mr. Trotzky, who enjoys such prestige in the press of the capitalist world, hurls a bouquet of slander and invective at the International Labor Defense because of its utilization of the services of Mr. Samuel S. Leibowitz, prominent attorney, in the Scottsboro case. These "defenders" of principle tell us that this is proof that the International Labor Defense has fallen upon evil days. "It begins to look as though the International Labor Defense were teetering on the brink of a piece of rotten and dangerous opportunism," we are informed.

To these saviors of the International Labor Defense, who seek also to "save" the only political party of the working class by betraying its fundamental principles, we answer, dear "friends," we are afraid that the wish is father to the thought.

But our contempt for these friends does not relieve us of the duty of dispelling the confusion they seek to create in the minds of their followers. Their demagogy must be exposed as relentlessly as we expose the democratic illusion about the impartiality of justice which appears in the pages of the degenerate capitalist press which so readily hires the services of their leader, Mr. Trotsky.

Lawyers and Mass Action

We are told by the "Militant" that the International Labor Defense, when it retains lawyers, swears them to silence "on all points where they disagree with it." But the "Militant" editors lie deliberately. The International Labor Defense imposes no such obligation, nor is it so simple as to regard this as possible.

International Labor Defense lawyers are engaged to serve it on the basis of their ability as "court-room technicians." The services of Mr. Walter Pollak, for example, were retained to argue the Scottsboro appeal in the Supreme Court because he was regarded as an expert in his particular field of law. The question of whether he agreed or disagreed with the basic policy of the International Labor Defense was not an issue. Certainly there was no talk of his agreeing "to interfere neither in word or deed with the International Labor Defense's conduct of the political struggle."

Mr. Pollak could not interfere with the mobilization of mass pressure by the International Labor Defense one way or another. Nor can any other attorney.

The opinions of Mr. Leibowitz on questions of politics and economics are not considered by the International Labor Defense. His attitude in the court room is, however. Were he to hesitate "to speak and compel the court to adhere to the rules of court procedure formulated by the government itself, but which were systematically violated by the agents of the court" when workers and their sympathisers were on trial, his connections with the International Labor Defense would be severed.

Leibowitz's Task.

Mr. Leibowitz is carrying out the line of the International Labor Defense in the court room in this particular case. This was the condition imposed upon him. He was not asked to nor could he engage in the political defense of the accused, but his legal defense of the accused is political. It is not a condition that he agree with the entire viewpoints of the International Labor Defense. But he has openly declared in the court room, "If it were not for the International Labor Defense these nine boys would now be dead."

Mr. Leibowitz is asked to fight the Scottsboro frame-up from the legal point of view, to take advantage of every contradiction in the bosses' law, and Mr. Leibowitz is satisfactorily carrying out this task. Our own task is to draw the correct political conclusions from the attempts of Mr. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., representative of the State, to deny to Negroes that constitutional rights and to

Our dubious friends of the "Militant" demand a united front with members of the bar. So, gentlemen, this is your conception of the "Leninist tactic of the united front" on the field of working class defense struggles. We contemptuously reject your viewpoint. It was not in this sense, take note, that Lenin ever said that the lawyer was "the instrument, the tool of the class which employs him." You say: "Only if the relationship is on such basis (united front with the lawyer.—W. L. P.) can the International Labor Defense relate a good legal fight to the fundamental and essential political fight." (Emphasis mine—W. L. P.). The International Labor Defense does not "relate" the one to the other. With the International Labor Defense these struggles remain inseparably related.

Gentlemen, it is not the lawyer who represents the working class in the capitalist courts. We are the representatives of the working class, as is also the defendant. The lawyer is not a revolutionist, nor does the sale or contribution of his services to a revolutionary organization make him one. It is, of course, not unnatural that you should think in terms of the purchased "revolutionist." The sale of so much of Mr. Trotsky's "revolutionary" writing to the capitalist press undoubtedly has been a factor in leading you to this "mistake."

It is the worker defendant who uses the court as his forum. It is he who introduces the social and economic questions so vital to an exposure of the court as the weapon of class rule. It is not the lawyer who politicalizes the defense struggles led by the International Labor Defense, but his legal defense which is politicalized by the International Labor Defense. Mr. Leibowitz, under the direction of the International Labor Defense, is fighting for the constitutional rights of Negroes and of white workers as well.. Thus he is helping to politicalize the Scottsboro case.

Where Verdicts Are Rendered.

The courtrooms of the working class are the streets. It is in the streets that they must pass their verdict of innocence on a class war victim. When they in sufficient numbers have done this, that verdict will be reflected by a judge and jury in capitalist courts. That Mr. Pollak did or did not express any disagreement with the policy of the International Labor Defense did not influence the Supreme Court in the reversal of the lynch verdict of Alabama. The Scottsboro boys were saved by mass pressure. The campaign of the International Labor Defense balanced the scales in favor of the boys. The united voice of an outraged working class was too loud to ignore.

Incidentally, the ruling class of the South threatens Mr. Leibowitz with death because in the court room his fight is tearing at the basis of their system. Mr. Leibowitz's conduct has strengthened the basis of struggle for the International Labor Defense. He has exposed the hypocrisy of capitalist law. The danger to the lives of the boys lies in the failure of the entire labor movement to mobilize around their defense. What part have the gentlemen of the "Militant" played in this mobilization?

The determining factor in the class struggle in the capitalist courts, as elsewhere, is the relation of class forces. That is why success rests with the working class defendant only where the mobilization of the working class and its sympathizers around him is raised to an overwhelming high political level. The center of support must be shifted from reliance upon "justice" dispensed in capitalist courts to reliance upon mass pressure.

Basic International Labor Defense Policy.

The International Labor Defense believes that only mass pressure can bring about the release of a class war prisoner; that pressure must be supplemented by legal defense. The legal defense must be of the most expert character. Every legal technicality must be used. The more far-

[illegible] the knowledge of the lawyer retained by the International Labor Defense, the more easily and effectively can the worker be shown that the guarantees of justice extended him by the ruling class are meaningless.

Mr. Leibowitz has this expert knowledge. Every report coming out of the Decatur court house shows him in the forefront along the line of the International Labor Defense of the legal battle for every right supposedly guaranteed the innocent defendants, by State and Federal Constitutions. He has brought out the class character of this case with the utmost clarity because he followed the International Labor Defense line.

Mass Pressure Only Guarantee.

Mass pressure by the American working class, mobilized to that point where the ruling class recognizes its potential force, is the only guarantee of safety for the Scottsboro boys. This mobilization does not rest alone in the hands of the International Labor Defense. It rests in the hands of the entire leadership of the American working class. This mobilization can be realized only to the extent that the American working class is made to recognize that the struggle against the system of national oppression, and for the democratic rights of the Negro masses, is part and parcel of the struggle for the democratic rights of the working class as a whole.

In the Scottsboro case, the International Labor Defense has achieved its greatest success defending the rights of members of an oppressed nation. It has, therefore, achieved its greatest success in the defense of the democratic rights of the working class of America as a whole. It has advanced this defense to a high political level under Lenin's slogans repudiated by the righteous "defenders of principles" who control the "Militant." Without a relentless united struggle for equal rights for Negroes, white workers cannot realize complete democracy. Without the right to self-determination, the toiling Negro masses cannot secure equal rights.

Onward to mass mobilization of the American working class in defense of the Scottsboro boys, of Tom Mooney and of all class war prisoners! An end to capitalist justice!

ALABAMA "ON THE SPOT"

Decatur

4-8-33

THE silver lining in the cloud of the Scottsboro trial in Decatur, Ala., is the bringing out into the pitiless light of world publicity the evils of the exclusion of Negro citizens from jury service in that State, regardless of the qualifications of such Negroes to serve. Alabama is painfully trying to deny that such a policy of Negro exclusion exists, but nobody either inside or outside of the State is fooled. The effort to fool the outside world on this issue indicates what chance there is of the Scottsboro boys getting justice. While white Alabama contends with some heat that the Negroes will get a fair trial, in almost the same breath it declares that they are guilty.

Pittsburgh

Pa

There can be no justice in the administration of the law in any State or community when a large section of qualified citizens are excluded systematically from jury service. This is especially true in the South, where Negroes constitute one-third of the population and three-fourths of all offenders hailed before the bar of justice. In almost all parts of the South Negroes are excluded from jury service. In other words, Negroes can be sent to prison, but Negroes are not permitted to sit in judgment. That is still considered a white man's job.

If the fight of the International Labor Defense attorneys accomplishes nothing else, the revelation of the jury jim-crowism of the unreconstructed South will be a great service to the cause of right and justice.

Daily Worker

THE jail is situated directly in back of the Morgan County Courthouse. It is a squat two-story red brick building. Every morning, lunch hour and evening the boys are marched to and from the side entrance to the courthouse, a distance of about 30 yards, with a squad of soldiers in front and back. There is always a group of spectators numbering between fifty and a hundred, most of them Negroes, gathered along this short line of march.

Members of the National Guard Company stationed at the jail had told us of the complete change in the spirit of the boys as soon as they left the jail house door. They immediately straighten up, become more self-confident and more at ease.

New York

Only when we entered [illegible] and after spending two ho[illegible] the boys in the cell block really understand why.

IN THE JAIL

One gains entrance to the jail through the dwelling quarters of the sheriff. No sooner do you descend the two steps into the first tier of cells when an acid stench strikes your nostrils. It is a mixture of urine, bugs and antiseptic. One gets the impression of a medieval dungeon, with its stone slab floors, damp, stuffy.

One flight of steps up is the second tier of cells where the Scottsboro boys are kept.

Opposite the loose-hinged door to the cell block is an old gallows. The rings are still fastened on the crossbar ready for the rope. The trapdoor on the floor still works. Four times a day the boys pass by the gallows, they can see it from their cell block. They have been transferred from death cells within the sight of the electric chair in Kilby Prison only to be placed here within sight of the gallows. The last time the trapdoor gave way and the rope tautened was in 1926 when the State of Alabama abolished legal lynching. Who can tell how soon these gallows will be in use again without the official sanction of the sovereign State of Alabama?

acceptable to Poland, judging by a leading article in the semi-official Pilsudski paper, Kurjer Poranny which denounces them as a trap for Poland. The official Polish Gazette says that frontier revision is a nonexistent question for Poland, and criticizes the French version as much as the Italian.

It is also announced that Goering and von Papen are to visit Italy, the former to see Mussolini and the latter to see the Pope

Christ, completed by a Negro prisoner just before he was hanged. He succeeded in imparting to the eyes of the mother a pensive melancholy, and to the child a hopeful reaching out to life. This picture standing in the shadow of the gallows, despite its religious subject, is symbolic also of the new life lying in the lap of the Scottsboro case.

With the boys free—and freed as the result of a persistent world-wide mass movement—the road to a new life will become more evident to the Negro masses.

We first became aware of the boys as dim shadows behind bars. A flimsy door separates the small hall with the gallows from the cell room. As you enter this door the stench becomes even sharper. The cell block itself is in the center of the room with a narrow corridor around it. There are six individual cells within the cell block, the light from the small windows across the corridor barely penetrating. An uncovered toilet is situated in the center of a narrow passageway separating the individual cells for the common use of all the boys. The dirty cream paint on the cell walls has pealed, and numerous bugs of all sizes roam leisurely about.

The cell block reminds one of the traveling cages used for chain gang prisoners on road work, into which up to twenty-five prisoners are crowded and shackled.

When we first caught sight of the boys they were attempting to clean out a mattress. It seemed a hopeless job.

OUR artist wished to draw each one of the nine boys and we asked the Captain of the guardsmen to let us into the cell block with the boys. But the turnkey could not open the door into the group of cells. This jail is so old, that the bolts jammed. It was only after a few hours of work that he finally succeeded in opening the door. I was reminded of the fire two years ago on a Georgia chain gang, in which a number of Negro prisoners roasted to death because the guards could not or would not open the door to the traveling cage.

While our artist sketched the boys through the bars, we talked with them. Soldiers and curious visitors who had come to see an artist sketch the "niggers" stood about. At first the boys were retiscent, refusing to let us draw them.

"Are you from a local paper?" asked Haywood Patterson who was to go on trial the next morning. When we explained to them that we were "from outside," the word went around that we were friends.

"No Southern paper would print a Negro's picture, anyway," one of the boys told me later.

Whatever suspicion remained was dispelled when the boys saw the finished drawing of Haywood Patterson. There was no mistaking the truthful and sympathetic portrait, so different from the distorted pictures first taken of the boys. They all crowded against the bars to convince themselves by looking at the drawing that we were friends.

WITH the exception of old scars from beatings suffered at the hands of sheriffs and prison guards at their first trial and subsequent transfers, the boys looked well. They were all dressed in blue denim overalls. Roy Wright who was 14 and Eugene Williams who was 13 at the time they were picked off the freight train at Paint Rock, Alabama, have not permitted two years of imprisonment and nervous tension during their formative years to warp them. Instead they have been busy making up for lost time in reading and writing. Their youthful vigor still bursts out into laughter and all the boys manage to pass jokes.

"NONE OF THEM BEST"

When someone asked the boys which of the five jails they have been in during the last two years they liked best, Andy Wright answered, "We like none of them best, although this is the dirtiest we have ever been in. We want to get out of here."

And they are all hopeful that the International Labor Defense will be able to obtain their freedom, although extremely nervous about the strong likelihood of an attempt at lynching if the court would be forced to return a verdict of "Not Guilty." Every minute they spend in the cell block is full of tension. They must stand the gaze of visitors who come to "look the niggers over." They have formed a chorus among themselves singing Negro spirituals. This singing seems to be the only moment when the tension is relaxed, when they seem to forget their growing hunger for freedom.

It is hard to forget that soft, intense longing in their eyes. It bursts upon you with tremendous force when they raise their eyes to look at you.

"WE have been in prison for two years and five days," one of the boys said, brushing a huge bug off his knee.

And during this time they have managed to build a friendly discipline among themselves and a keen sense of the role these nine unemployed boys looking for jobs have been made to play by circumstances. The Wright brothers and Ozie Powell have probably done most to impart a keen appreciation of the significance of the Scottsboro case and a feeling of social dignity to all the other boys.

WHAT THEY CRAVE

The boys long for letters, fruit, candy, books — anything to make the nerve-racking experience they are now going through easier to bear. Flood them with these and even in this medievel dungeon they will remain more keenly aware of the tremendous movement which has risen in their defense and which is determined to free them.

THAT SCOTTSBORO VERDICT

Argus
8-4-33
St. Louis

The conviction by a jury of Haywood Patterson, one of the nine Scottsboro boys, and the fixing of his punishment at death in the electric chair is quite a reflection on the people of the State of Alabama.

Judging from the information we have, it looks to us as though no attempt at justice was made on the part of the jury which sat in on the Patterson case. In fact, the whole proceedings, so far as the prosecution was concerned, bore all the earmarks of a fiasco so far as justice is concerned. There is no doubt in our mind but that every juror in the panel had already made up his mind to return a verdict of guilty, regardless of the facts presented in the case. We do not believe that there is a sane person in the United States, or elsewhere for that matter, who will say that the State proved that Patterson was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. If the jury had any sense of fairness or justice, it undoubtedly would not have assessed the severe punishment of death; because the best the State could do was to offer the testimony of persons whose character, standing and veracity was questionable from start to finish. The defense put on contradictory witnesses which, to say the least, matched any testimony which had been given for the prosecution; and therefore, under the circumstances, the judge, we believe, would have been fully justified in throwing the whole matter out of court.

Surely, there was no effort made on the part of the court to see that the case was properly tried. Judge Horton allowed the prosecution, including Attorney-General Knight, to get in its "dirty work" by constantly referring to "Niggers" and "Jews," etc., without rebuke, all of which we regard as prejudicial to the rights of the defendant. To be sure, it was easy for Judge Horton to give what may be called a fair instruction to the jury before it retired when he said that the jury should disregard the reference which the attorneys had made. But the jury had heard these expressions. The dirty work had been done, and the verdict was sure.

Because of this case and the miscarriage of justice which has characterized it from the beginning, the whole system of administering justice to the Negroes in the South is brought to the fore in the eyes of all the civilized world. The big question which ultimately must be settled by the public is whether a white jury is capable of sitting in judgment in cases where Negroes are defendants, particularly where life and death are at stake.

Everybody knows, if this case was just reversed and there had been nine white youths accused of criminally assaulting two colored girl hobos, just what would have happened in Alabama. There would have been no arrests made in the first place. At least, we doubt it. And, if by chance the case had reached the court, it would have been outlawed by the first appearance of a demurrer. Thus, we see just how one-sided the so-called justice of the South is.

Further comments in the case which may be mentioned here are, can any man, white or black, anywhere in all the world receive a just trial in an atmosphere of mob-lynch spirit? Is not the spirit of the Constitution of the United States violated when a person is tried by a juror not of his "peers?" "A juror of his peers" means absolutely a juror of his equals, a person on the same plane, same standing, etc. We cite these few incidents to show that it is impossible for these boys to get a fai trial in Alabama. There ought to be some way in which their cases could be tried in Illinois or New York.

Should this case go to the United States Supreme Cour or to the Alabama State Supreme Court, we have no doub but that it will be thrown out.

SCOTTSBORO JUSTICE

Philadelphia, Pa.

DURING the week just passed America has been honoring the memory of Booker T. Washington, who labored and sacrificed for better relationships between the white and colored races in his beloved Southland. In the State of Alabama he erected an Institute, which is a model for industrial schools all over the civilized world.

Tuskegee Institute, Alabama, is known and appreciated in every section of the world where men read, because of Booker T. Washington. It stands as a beacon light of culture and human brotherhood. Within its confines are peace, love and hope for those eternal truths which are right and just. It teaches a doctrine of work and love and mutual understanding. America and the world is a better place because Booker Washington lived and worked at Tuskegee in the benighted State of Alabama.

Until a few months ago Scottsboro was unknown. Its prejudices and bigotry were buried until the civilized world was alarmed and startled when a Court of Justice sentenced eight boys to death for alleged rape on two white girls, admittedly prostitutes.

The Supreme Court of the United States found as a fact that the boys were tried and convicted without the benefit of counsel; that the trial was a Roman holiday, so pitched that justice was under the circumstances impossible. As a result of this finding, a new trial was granted.

The scene shifted from Scottsboro to Decatur, Alabama, last week. A change of venue was granted on the theory that racial feeling was so bitter it would be impossible for the accused boys to have an impartial trial. But it is submitted that the feeling was just as tense in Decatur as it was in Scottsboro.

This is well explained in the statement of Samuel Liebowitz, chief counsel for the defense: "This verdict is an act of bigots spitting upon the tomb of the immortal Abraham Lincoln." "I think the prosecutor of this county when he resorted in his bombast to the mud gutter in hurling vilification on the great people of New York and its vast body of Jewish Citizens, perhaps represented in his way a cross section of what the defendants and lawyers representing them were faced with."

The racial identity of the defense counsel was interjected with malice: "Are you going to permit Alabama justice to be bought with Jew money from New York?" asked the prosecutor. These are the same kind of expressions used by Jew-baiting Hitler of Germany. They have no place in a court of law. The race of neither the Jew or Negro was on trial. It was put into the case to prevent a fair trial.

No intelligent, unprejudiced individual can read the facts and believe those nine boys guilty of rape. About two years ago on a freight train were two white women, Ruby Bates and Victoria Price. On that train were twelve Negro boys and seven white hoboes. There was a fight, which ended when the whites were forced off the train. The whites flashed word of their battle to Paint Rock, where a white posse stopped the train, arrested 9 of the Negroes and took the two women into custody as material witnesses. At Paint Rock the girls charged they had been raped by the nine Negroes, one of them a boy 13 years of age.

The white hoboes were not called to testify by the State. Victoria Price stuck to her story. Ruby Bates said she had not been touched by the Negroes. Stating that her former testimony was untrue; that so far as she knew the Price woman was not attacked and they were together. Lester Carter, one of the hoboes, supported this statement. It was shown by the defense that Victoria Price had made several untrue statements.

Upon the foregoing evidence one of these boys has been sentenced to die in the electric chair. No sane man will believe that if he was white the same verdict would have been reached. And unless some superior court takes a hand, the other boys will receive the same sentence.

The unfair name of Alabama has been made blacker. The courts upon which rest the last vestige of respect for American institutions have been soiled with racial bigotry and narrow sectionalism. Decatur, Alabama, cowed by hatred, has been unable to rise above the thinking of morons and cowards.

THE DECATUR VERDICT

Once more an Alabama jury, hearing all the testimony, has said that Heywood Patterson is guilty of a capital offense against the laws of Alabama and once more he has been sentenced to the electric chair.

The State of Alabama gave this man a fair trial. When the defense asked for a change of venue from Jackson County, the request was granted. When Morgan County was selected the defense squawked. Having lost a case before a Morgan County jury the defense will ask for a change of venue for the remaining defendants.

The trial judge, (an Alabamian!) presided with such impressive fairness that even the chief of the defense counsel while denouncing the jury in scandalous terms, pays Judge Horton the tribute of saying that he would have been "delighted" to leave the case in the Judge's hands!

That is to say, he would have been willing for this lone Alabama judge to decide whether his client should live or die.

Twelve jurors, friends and neighbors of Judge Horton, sat in judgment on the facts in this case. They heard the whole sordid story, including the highly suspicious testimony of La Bates whose staged appearance at the eleventh hour with her avowal of perjured testimony in the previous trial, proved a dud.

These twelve jurors did not go out, smoke a round of cigarettes and return with a hasty verdict. They deliberated for 21 hours. In the end they agreed that Victoria Price had told the truth and that Ruby Bates had not.

Mr. Samuel Leibowitz wanted to be the hero of this unpleasant drama and emerge from it with an enhanced professional reputation. He says that he acted without remuneration, even without expense money. No doubt he did, but if Leibowitz had succeeded in his natural ambition to set his man free, he would have had ample compensation in his enlarged fame. He is perhaps less of an altruist than he represents himself.

But he lost, in spite of his device of using the Lord's prayer as a peroration.

He lost because the jury believed the facts did not support his fervid oratory.

Did Leibowitz accept the verdict with becoming grace, after the manner of lawyers everywhere? Not at all. His answer was a brutal attack upon the jury. Said he:

"This verdict is an act of bigots, spitting upon the tomb of Abraham Lincoln.

The chief of all the bigots at Decatur was Mr. Leibowitz himself.

He left little if anything undone to arouse the resentment if not the bitterness of everyone in the courtroom, including members of the jury.

He was not content to try his client on the facts, as other clients in Alabama are tried.

His purpose was to put the State itself on trial.

From the beginning of the trial he was arrogant, contemptuous and domineering.

Anyone of 100 Alabama lawyers would have handled Heywood Patterson's case far more effectively.

Mr. Leibowitz came into Alabama as the voice of bigotry and arrogance. Instead of seeking to make the way easy for his client he exercised his talents to make the way as difficult as possible.

What a stupid lawyer poor Patterson had!

Solicitor Wade Wright, of Morgan was unfortunate in his reference to "Jew money" in the case. This was an appeal to prejudice and Judge Horton asked the jury to disregard it, as he should have done.

But even Mr. Leibowitz refrains from accusing the Attorney-General of Alabama to whom he lost after a long and bitter struggle, of any improper remarks.

Mr. Knight was chief counsel for the prosecution, for whom it should be said by the way, that he managed the case with fine ability and a coolness which must have been difficult to maintain at times.

Mr. Leibowitz bestows high praise upon the presiding judge, he is silent on the conduct of his opponent, Mr. Knight.

But he denounces the jury in savage terms.

Mr. Leibowitz is a poor sportsman.

A good lawyer should know when he has a bad case, and hope for better luck next time.

PLAN NATIONAL AID AT NEGROES' TRIAL

Defense Attorney Will Speak Tonight at Labor Defense Meeting in Union Square.

Nationally organized Negro defense of the nine Negroes involved in the Scottsboro case is being planned by New York leaders of the race.

CONFER WITH LEIBOWITZ

Bill Robinson, Negro dancer, visited Samuel Leibowitz, counsel for the Scottsboro defenants yesterday and submitted a proposal that funds be raised with several benefit performances. Delegations representing various Negro organizations also called on the attorney.

"It now become apparent," said Mr. Leibowitz said last night, "that irrespective of any small differences that may have arisen in the past between different organizations seeking to lead this fight, the race has reached the conclusion that this case marks a turning point in the life of the American Negro, who has been kept shackled by intolerance of the bigots. They are going through with the fight."

Mr. Leibowitz was announced as one of the principal speakers for a demonstration in Union Square at 8 o'clock tonight by the International Labor Defense. Mrs. Janie Patterson, mother of the Negro reconvicted in Decatur this week, is due in New York this afternoon and will attend the meeting.

Hays Listed as Speaker.

Others scheduled to speak are Joseph R. Brodsky, chief counsel for the International Labor Defense; John Haynes Holmes, Arthur Garfield Hays and Roger Baldwin.

The International Labor Defense, through William L. Patterson, its national secretary, assailed the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People yesterday for its statement of Monday to the effect that the injection of communism into the trial affected the verdict in the Patterson case.

"The directors of the N. A. A. C. P. have seen fit to gloat over the death verdict against Heywood Patterson," said the defense secretary. "They take the occasion of this verdict to bring forward a ridiculous claim that had they been in the case, the verdict would have been different.

"They say that 'racial prejudice closed the eyes of the jurors' and at the same time that 'the injection of Communism into the case brought about the death verdict.'

"Aside from the completely gratuitius confusion of the International Labor Defense, a non-partisan organization, with the Communist party, which is brought forward merely to hide the existence of a workers' organization of defense, this statement is in itself a contradiction.

Statement Declared Untrue.

"The statement that the N. A. A. C. P. has twice offered to cooperate with the International Labor Defense is a deliberate untruth. The statement that the N. A. A. C. P. went to the aid of the Scottsboro boys at the trial is another. The records prove this conclusively."

Harlem Negroes, led by several ministers of their race and by W. H. Davis, owner of The New Amsterdam, a Negro publication, plan to hold a number of mass meetings in Negro churches and at various outdoor points in Manhattan as well as in the other boroughs, Davis announced last night.

A. J. Muste, chairman of the conference for Progressive Labor Action, sent a letter yesterday to President Roosevelt asking that he use his influence to obtain a new trial for Patterson.

The conference, in a letter to The Amsterdam News, suggested yesterday that 50,000 Negroes be enlisted to March to Washington to protest against the Patterson verdict and that 50,000 white workers be asked to join the march.

✓ Alabama Self-Convicted.

Not the Scottsboro Negroes but the State of Alabama was on trial at Decatur. To the regret of all fair-minded Americans, Alabama is self-convicted. There is one commonwealth in this Union where the judicial murder of innocent persons can be forced on a jury by an outside mob loudly threatening lynching.

Doubt in many minds as to the legalistic innocence of the accused was common enough before the Supreme Court of the United States set aside the earlier conviction. That doubt was strengthened when one of the alleged victims of outrage, Ruby Bates, having come to New York was persuaded by the Rev. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick to go back to Alabama and tell the truth in court. She explained under oath that the Negro youths had been "framed." That she faced possible conviction for perjury in the first trial can hardly be denied.

It is fair to say that Judge James E. Horton who presided at this trial, showed no prejudice in his rulings or in his charge to the jury. Under Alabama law the jury decides for or against the death penalty. That is why the jurymen were out 22 hours. They agreed on a guilty verdict on the first ballot, but one juror held out for life imprisonment. The accused men are being tried separately. Technically, the verdict only affected the defendant Patterson.

There is a strong probability that the other defendants will be convicted as this one was. There is a vague possibility that the Governor of the State may prevent judicial murder by his power of commutation. The Brooklyn lawyer who headed the defense, Samuel S. Leibowitz seems to have done all that was possible for his client up to date and is likely to use tact and discretion in appeals proceedings. And, though he received many threatening letters, he appears to have been treated with courtesy and respect by the court and by the prosecuting attorney.

BACKGROUND STUDY OF SCOTTSBORO CASE

Scenes That Marked the Clash of Issues In the Little Courtroom of Decatur

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

DECATUR, Ala.

ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTEEN years ago, on Jan. 13 last, President Monroe ordered his Surveyor General to lay out a town to be named in honor of Stephen Decatur, the distinguished naval commander dear to the 100 per cent American for his words:

"My country—may she ever be right, but, right or wrong, my country."

The selected site, in Northern Alabama on the south bank of the tortuous, muddy Tennessee River, remained part of the Cherokee Indian Reservation until 1826, when it was incorporated. From then until a little more than a month ago it continued on its tranquil, almost somnolent, way with only an occasional disturbance, such as a strike in the Louisville & Nashville Railroad shops or a crime of purely local significance.

Then, through no fault of its own, Decatur inherited the now famous Scottsboro case—a Southern cause célèbre involving nine Negro youths and two white girls of a stratum of society only a little above the inexorably drawn color line. The little community, drafted for a part in history which it did not seek or relish, approached its task of rendering fair judgment under the play of conflicting public opinion with an added mélange of emotional and intellectual contradictions. It wanted to be impartial and unbiased, but many of its more thoughtful citizens wondered if that were possible.

Rustic Southern Traditions.

Despite its external appearance, suggesting a small Middle Western town, Decatur is Southern and rustic in its traditions and its background. Some of its buildings bear the scars of Union shells, many of its residents bear in their hearts the wounds left by the war between the States. The memory of the reconstruction period which followed the peace is a vivid and haunting one to many of its people and the people of Morgan County, of which Decatur is the seat of government.

A few days before the Negroes were brought from the Jefferson County jail in Birmingham to the vermin-ridden jail in Decatur, condemned two years ago as unfit for white men, the little city buzzed with anticipation and preparation. The one hotel, its three stories topped only by the water tower dominating the town's main street to the west, threw open a whole wing of rooms long out of use.

A long wooden table was built in the second-floor courtroom, its floor dotted at one-yard intervals with cuspidors for the tobacco-chewing gentry, and places were marked off for visiting newspaper men. Cards of admittance were printed and issued carefully to exclude gate-crashers, Communists and trouble-makers from the arena before the judge's bench.

The National Guard Called.

Sheriff A. W. Davis—Bud to his friends—had a final conference with Judge James E. Horton, who was to preside over the wrangling lawyers with such enlightened impartiality that he won the admiration of neutral observers and even the most radical of the Negroes' sympathizers. At that conference they decided to call upon the National Guard to see that mob spirit did not interfere with the orderly processes of justice.

Sheriff Davis let it be understood that the call for troops was prompted more by a wish to prevent escape of the Negroes from the flimsy old jail [illegible] of trouble from the townsfolk. They were a law-abiding lot, he said, patient and willing for the law to take its course. The Negroes, he said, had nothing to fear from the citizens of Decatur.

So it seemed as the proceedings got under way on March 27 with the defense, led by Samuel S. Leibowitz, New York criminal attorney, calling Negroes as witnesses in the most formidable legal onslaught against the selective jury system of Alabama and the South that the last sixty years of jurisprudence has seen.

The court room was as quiet and as orderly as a church, even when the New Yorker, after addressing one of his dark-skinned witnesses as "Mr.," questioned the veracity of a white official of Morgan County, who had said that he did not know whether any of the persons whose names appeared on the jury rolls was a Negro. Row upon row of rough-faced, unshaven countrymen in blue denim overalls and cowhide boots chewed their tobacco meditatively, but uttered no sound of disapproval. Their faces were set in hard, unsympathetic lines.

The Judge on the Bench.

Upon the bench sat the lank, raw-boned jurist who was called upon to rule upon questions of law involving in fact matters which he had grown up believing were undebatable. He allowed the defense much leeway—so much in fact that he was criticized privately in some quarters for leaning backward, and newspapers of the South declared in headlines that the time-honored jury system, which is held necessary by many to preserve white supremacy below the Mason-Dixon line, was in greater jeopardy than ever before.

termined that if they were not to have the final word in a case that had disturbed the peace and quiet of their community and brought it unwelcome publicity for two years past they wanted desperately to have the case tried by people of their own kind. They were pleased when Judge Hawkins "for reasons of economy" sent the case to Morgan County.

Thus when twelve citizens of Morgan County raised their hands before Judge Horton and swore they would "a true verdict render," they were swimming in strong currents. A complexity of issues intruded upon the plain issue of guilt or innocence of the defendants.

Handicaps of the Defense.

The Negroes were under the natural handicap of appearing as defendants in a case in which a white woman was their accuser. Communist support, though it saved them from the electric chair, at least for a time, was another handicap. There was another. That was the almost unexpressed resentment among many Alabamians at what was considered a rebuff to the Supreme Court of that State, a rebuff that could only be offset by a new conviction, which would be a ratification of the Jackson County jury's verdict, which the State's highest court upheld.

The supposed wealth of the defense, despite the repeated assertions of Mr. Leibowitz that he was serving without a fee, made the hill folk suspicious of the Negroes' defense; led to the charge in open court that its witnesses were "bought and paid for" by "sinister influences" in New York.

The Semitic complexion of the defense led by Mr. Leibowitz and assisted by Joseph Brodsky, an admitted Communist, helped to increase the antagonism of the natives of Decatur toward the Negroes. A common comment of the townsfolk, after a medical exper had been called by the defense t estify that the story told by th Price girl did not gibe with scientific findings, was:

"When a nigger has expert witnesses, we have a right to ask wh is paying for them."

"Real Issue" of Trial.

It remained for Wade Wright circuit solicitor associated wit the prosecution, to lift the curtai on what had become a real issu of the trial. He thundered anathema at the city and city way until the walls of the court hous seemed to shake. He stamped u and down before the jury a though transported in religiou ecstasy, as he summed up the cas for the Southland against th meddlesome East, which had sol slaves at a profit and then taken them away.

Judge Horton told the jury to disregard the inflammatory words, but he could not stop them from appearing in print from one end of the country to the other. Whether the jury did disregard them is a question which the United States Supreme Court may yet be called upon to decide.

Whatever the result of an appeal may be, in all fairness it should be said that Attorney General Knight and many of the more enlightened people of Decatur wish that the earnest young circuit solicitor had prepared a manuscript and submitted it for approval before delivery.

phers gamboled about his court room. Typewriters clattered so that lawyers finally asked him to quiet the din. It seemed as if he scarcely noticed any of it as he rendered his rulings first for one side and then the other, occasionally sending unabashed for law books to look up some moot legal point.

He held—to the surprise of many, after several Negroes had laid claim to the very qualifications laid down in the statute for jury service, and after the defense had shown there were no Negroes on the jury rolls of Morgan County—that Mr. Leibowitz had established a prima facie case of systematic exclusion on racial grounds in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. The courtroom crowd gasped and frowned. Not long afterward they recovered their composure and faith in the jurist and the orderly processes of law which he represented.

The Jury Board's View.

The State, represented by Attorney General Knight, sharp-faced and sharp-voiced, had to call only one white witness to refute the evidence the defense had offered. Arthur J. Tidwell, President of the Jury Board, testified that while it might be true that only the names of white men were inscribed upon the jury rolls it was not because of any arbitrary discrimination against the African race but merely because he and his fellow-commissioners in the exercise of their discretion had not encountered a Negro fit to serve as a juror when judged by the terms of the statute.

Thus, with the issue one of fact rather than law, since the defense conceded that the Alabama statute fixing the qualifications of jurors was constitutional while contending that it was misapplied by the jury commissioners, Judge Horton rendered his final ruling on a question which agitated the Southland considerably more than the question of the guilt or innocence of the accused Negroes. The court room breathed more easily.

"I am going to deny the motion of the defense," he said. "Let's get on with the trial."

The attack by the defense on a time-honored jury system was only one of the factors which so combined extraneous matters with the main facts at issue—the question of whether two white women were attacked by a dozen Negroes on a freight train—that it is doubtful if any jury of twelve good men and true could have rendered a verdict based solely on the evidence presented to them.

To understand this fully it is necessary to go back more than two years to the little town of Scottsboro nestling in contented isolation among its beloved hills. There it was that the Negroes were taken by the armed posse, which removed them and their white accusers from a freight train at Paint Rock, a few miles beyond, and lodged them in the Jackson County jail. There, two weeks later, they were tried for their lives, with the result that eight of them were condemned to die in the electric chair.

While their trials progressed the Negroes could hear, welling up from the court-house square, the cheers that greeted the announcement of each verdict of guilty. No witnesses were called in defense of the accused at the hastily ordered trials, and the lawyer appointed by the court to defend them prefaced his defense with a protest to the court against his assignment.

Into this atmosphere, attracted by the publicity that accompanied the Negroes' arrest and conviction, there walked one day, while the trials were still under way, a New York lawyer associated with the International Labor Defense, which is the legal arm of the Communist party. He wired a description of the scene to New York headquarters, and immediately there started a flood of telegrams, couched in the accepted phraseology of Communist diplomacy, demanding protection for the Negroes and holding the officials of Alabama responsible for their safety.

Reds Become Interested.

Whether from pure altruism or a desire to make capital of the plight of the Negroes for organization work among the members of that race, the Communists became as interested in the case as though a member of their own group were under arrest.

Lawyers were engaged and the verdict was appealed. The Alabama Supreme Court, holding that one of the convicted Negroes was a juvenile, ordered a new trial for him and affirmed the death sentences imposed upon seven others. Attorney General Knight's father wrote the prevailing opinion of the court. The case then went to the United States Supreme Court, which last November reversed the original verdicts of guilty, set aside the death sentences and ordered new trials.

On the date set for the opening of the new trials defense attorneys moved for a change of venue, and Judge A. E. Hawkins, after inspecting the affidavits charging fevered prejudice in Jackson County, granted the motion. The defense, seeking a trial of the issues in the urban community of Birmingham, sometimes called the "Pittsburgh of the South," had sought to disqualify all the other county seats in the vicinage.

Through some oversight in drawing the papers Morgan County and Decatur had been overlooked. The people of Jackson County were de

We would make the friendly suggestion to Mr. Liebowitz, the New York lawyer who volunteered to defend the Scottsboro negroes on trial for attacking two white women, that there might be healthier places for him than Alabama in the future. The attorney explained the conviction of the first of his clients to go on trial by a statement to the New York Herald-Tribune; "If you ever saw those creatures, those bigots whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs, whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy, you would not ask how they could do it." The members of that jury might not be flattered at Mr. Liebowitz' colorful word picture of them, and his next contact with them might make his opinion of them still less favorable. Judging merely from this uncalled-for and malevolent outburst, there was not a member of the jury who wasn't more of a man and a gentleman than this ill-conditioned, poor losing lawyer, bursting with preconceived prejudices that totally unfitted him for his self-appointed role.

The Scottsboro Case

Two years ago some girls of questionable character were riding a freight train in Alabama. According to reports they were accompanied by some white boys. At a small station they were set upon by a bunch of negroes who threw the whites off the train and took charge of the girls. These negroes were charged with rape by the girls. The cases were tried and the negroes found guilty and sentenced to be executed. Here the saviors from the north entered the case, and as usual in such circumstances made a mess of it.

It is the same old story, and the results are the same. The "buttinskys" did not receive a warm welcome, and their influence on the jury was what was expected by all who know anything about human nature. It would have been the same had the south, through some of its zealots, sought to interfere with a case in the courts of the north. Meddling with the affairs of other people is reprehensible, and this is especially true when those doing the meddling are radicals who have no regard for right or wrong, but are only interested in tearing down the established order and customs of the people, and establishing in their places their peculiar ideas of how things should be.

The result is that the jury in the second trial of Patterson, one of the negroes, found him guilty. The penalty is death. Another very peculiar circumstance is that one of the girls, who swore in the first trial that she had been attacked by Patterson, after going north and spending some time, returned to the stand in the second trial and swore that she had not been attacked. The question is, did she swear falsely in the first trial or the second one? Certainly she swore falsely in one of them.

At any rate it seems to be an underworld case which has been magnified out of all proportions to its importance.

A JUST POSTPONEMENT

It is with the greatest satisfaction that we note the action of Judge Horton in the so-called "Scottsboro cases." He has postponed indefinitely the trial of the second of the nine Negro boys accused of rape upon two white girls. In so acting Judge Horton, whose fairness and dignity have been constantly impressive in this difficult trial, made a most interesting and fitting statement. He first cleared the race-prejudice record for the four Alabama counties that compose his district, taking up the three cases of assaults upon white women by Negroes which have made up the entire court record of that crime for the last twelve years and showing that in two out of the three cases white juries acquitted Negroes. He then quoted from the utterly shameful statement attributed to Samuel S. Leibowitz in the columns of the Herald Tribune. It is the one picturing the Alabama jury as "those bigots, whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs, whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy.' Judge Horton said from the bench that such a statement, even if not accurately quoted, "must of necessity make impossible any just and impartial verdict to be arrived at at this time. The accused Negro must now be the victim of this statement. His leading attorney would be a millstone around his neck." This is precisely the decision at which dispassionate observers have arrived concerning the intervention of the Communists and their attorneys in the Scottsboro cases. It is refreshing to find a judge with sufficient regard for justice to act firmly in line with it.

LEIBOWITZ PLANS A NEW COURT TEST

May Seek Ruling by Supreme Bench Before Resumption of Scottsboro Trials.

SAYS "WE MEAN BUSINESS"

"We Will Not Pussyfoot on the Constitutional Question," He Writes to Judge Horton.

Characterizing the postponement of the remaining trials in the Scottsboro case as "undoubtedly a blessing to both sides," Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief counsel for the Negro defendants, informed Judge James E. Horton of Decatur, Ala., in a letter yesterday that he may utilize the opportunity offered by the postponement to bring the case before the United States Supreme Court on the issue of race discrimination. This, it is presumed, will be in the form of an appeal from the conviction of Heywood Patterson, the first of the defendants to be retried and again sentenced to death.

At the same time Mr. Leibowitz declared his belief that Judge Horton, the presiding jurist in the case, was desirous of according the defendants a fair trial and asked the judge's assistance in having the trials of the remaining cases transferred to Mobile, where "the Ku Klux Klan is practically extinct" and where "it will not be necessary for militiamen to protect the entrance to [illegible] town with machine guns against invasion by a band of hooded bigots bent upon murdering the defendants and their counsel."

Disputes Judge's Statement.

In his letter to Judge Horton, Mr. Leibowitz took sharp issue with the jurist's statement that the attack made by Mr. Leibowitz upon Alabamans for their alleged prejudice against the defendants and Negroes in general made impossible a fair trial for the remaining defendants by creating prejudice against them.

Mr. Leibowitz said "the prejudice you refer to was there long before the trials were transferred to Decatur."

"No verdict of any jury has received more universal condemnation at the hands of the enlightened press of the world than the verdict of this jury," Mr. Leibowitz wrote. "Anything said by me by way of criticism of the verdict did not create one-thousandth of the prejudice against this Negro that already existed at the beginning of the trial and that was intensified immeasurably by the conduct of the prosecution and others during the trial.

"The prosecution must now realize that we mean business; that we will not pussyfoot on the constitutional question and that we will fight honorably and diligently for the freedom of nine innocent men. Perhaps with the spotlight of public opinion now focused upon the Scottsboro case they now see that the world will not tolerate the execution of these defendants.

"The Negro as a Chattel."

"The sentiment expressed by many of the unthinking in your State that a Negro is a chattel and that he can be referred to as 'my nigger' just as the master refers to 'my dog' is symbolical of that attitude which excludes worthy citizens from service upon juries solely because their skins are black.

"As for the defense, we are delighted with the postponement because it may give us the opportunity to obtain a ruling from the highest court in our land upon this major issue which means so much to millions of Americans."

The International Labor Defense, the Communist organization which has taken a leading part in the defense, issued a statement yesterday through William L. Patterson, its national secretary, asserting that the basic reason for the postponement of the remaining trials "was solely the tremendous world protest against the lynch verdict handed down against Heywood Patterson."

LEIBOWITZ GIVES NOTICE OF APPEAL

Writes Judge, Lauding Delay of New Trials, Condemning Attack on Himself

Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief counsel for the Negro defendants in the Scottsboro case, plans an appeal to the United States Supreme Court from the conviction in Alabama of Heywood Patterson, the first of the defendants to be retried and again sentenced to death.

He declared his intention to utilize thus the interim, occasioned by the postponement of the trials of the remaining defendants, in a letter to Judge James E. Horton, who had presided at the Patterson trial. Judge Horton had deferred the remaining trials on the ground that a statement of Mr. Leibowitz in New York describing the Alabama jurors had prejudiced the cases of the other defendants. Mr. Leibowitz called the postponement of the remaining trials "undoubtedly a blessing to both sides."

"The prosecution must now realize," he wrote, "that we mean business; that we will not pussyfoot on the constitutional question and that we will fight honorably and diligently for the freedom of nine innocent men. Perhaps with the spotlight of public opinion now focused upon the Scottsboro case they now see that the world will not tolerate the execution of these defendants.

Mr. Leibowitz took sharp issue with the Judge on his statement that the lawyer's attack on Alabamans for their alleged prejudice against the defendants and against Negroes in general had made a fair trial for the other defendants impossible.

He declared: "The prejudice you refer to was there long before the trials were transferred to Decatur."

"No verdict of any jury," he continued, "has received more universal condemnation at the hands of the enlightened press of the world than the verdict of this jury. "OUTDOING ALABAMA"

To the Editor of the Evening Post:

Sir—There is an old European saying which, in a somewhat stilted translation, goes something like this: "They flogged him and they wouldn't let him cry."

In your editorial entitled "Outdoing Alabama" you submit that the radical, Northerner and Jew, Leibowitz, is just as bad as, if not worse than, Alabama at its worst. Why? Because in an interview with a news reporter he spoke his opinion of the jurors in the Scottsboro trial and did so in language which was bluntly unmistakable? The closing sentence of your comment on Leibowitz's statement is, I think, largely rhetorical. Or am I to understand that you really believe, cross your heart, that the remark made by Leibowitz is more vicious, if it may be considered vicious, than deliberately sending a man to death for a crime which it is highly probable he did not commit? Even if Leibowitz is entirely wrong, can his offense to justice in general be compared even remotely with that of Alabama?

But just a minute. Are Leibowitz's words entirely out of order? If they are, then what do you think of Dean Swift, Voltaire and Bernard Shaw, who at one time or another gave the entire world a good, swift kick in the pants? They used the same weapon employed by Leibowitz, and that weapon is ridicule. Can anything be more bitter in its implications than "Gulliver's Travels"? It is all a matter of literary skill and brilliance of expression. Leibowitz, as it is, struck out with a bare fist instead of a gloved one.

There is no doubt that he and his client got a rotten deal in Alabama. It hurts. What would you do, Mr. Editor, if some one let you have it in a very cowardly fashion and you were hurt not only spiritually but physically? I notice you retaliate readily enough in your captions on letters that do not meet with your approval. If you think for a moment that vitriolic words hurt more than actual physical injury, ask that sadistic imbecile who at present is running the show in Germany if his health is rapidly declining. I am afraid it is not. But his victims are suffering terribly, as you ought to know. Would you say that the Jews were worse than Hitler if they protested and in protesting used some pardonably hard words?

One of the things the world needs today is more intolerance of intolerance. With so many economic headaches annoying us, this is no time to pamper bigots. They deserve whatever they get, even if the wounds are inflicted by an ax instead of a rapier. Whether it be Germany, Alabama or anywhere else, give them the barbs of ridicule full in the face, and let them be thankful in the stony kernels loosely called their hearts that, for the time being, they are being punished with nothing more substantial than words.

Mons. Belford Also Urges 'More Recognition' at Brooklynites Dinner

Mons. John L. Belford, pastor of the R. C. Church of the Nativity, last night assailed anti-Negro sentiment in the Scottsboro[redacted] South and anti-Semitism in Germany as "contemptible and inexcusable."

The Catholic priest decried prejudice against Negroes and Jews in an address before 250 business and professional leaders of Brooklyn at the 53d annual dinner of the Society of Old Brooklynites held at the Towers Hotel.

At the same time he hit the "hoggishness" of Manhattan in grabbing an undue share of the city's political plums and civic improvements, declared that a Brooklyn man should be in City Hall and called on Brooklynites to make a concerted drive "to get what we deserve."

Cites 'Bad Influence'

Aldermanic President McKee followed Monsignor Belford with a criticism of the tendency in this country today to shift more and more responsibility on the Government and attacked the movies and modern fiction as a "bad influence" on the younger generation.

McKee sidestepped any mention of the political situation in this city despite the fact that Richardson Webster, first vice president of the society, who acted as toastmaster, said the residents of Brooklyn will not stand for any charter revision that invades borough autonomy.

The Aldermanic President was given a rousing reception when he was presented as 'the man of the hour" and "the man who very many people believe is destined to be the next Mayor of New York City."

'Dodge Responsibility'

"There is too much turning to the Government and giving up responsibility that should be ours," McKee said.

In attacking the movies and present-day fiction he declared "the average boy and girl today is being subjected to a corroding influence that is bound to have an effect on their morals."

In decrying racial and religious prejudice Monsignor Belford attacked any "holier-than-thou attitude" as 'inexcusable in intelligent people" and warned that "the Lord who made us free holds us responsible for the freedom He has given us."

'Fair Trial for All'

"I hope we shall never live to see the day when any individual because of his race, creed, sect or color cannot get a fair trial because some one in power does not like it.

"The nation or the individual that tries to dominate any other person or group of persons because it does not agree with that group's tenets of religion or race is unfit to be a nation or the citizen of a nation."

In deploring Brooklyn's dependence on Manhattan he saw a 'great many inconveniences and privations" under the consolidation of the five boroughs and decried the fact that "we must take second place here because the great wealth is on the other side of the river."

'Treated as Foster Child'

"Brooklyn has always been treated as a sort of foster-child of Manhattan and anything that has been cast off as third or fourth hand has been considered good enough for us," he said.

"If we had anything to say about it I think we would have an entirely different type of person than the Mayor we have today. I don't want to criticize the present Mayor but I think we should have selected a Brooklyn man.

Deplores Borrowing

Monsignor Belford cited reports of more city borrowing and said the "question now is how long we can keep this up and avoid going into bankruptcy."

Former Register Edward T. O'Loughlin and the Rev. Dr. Charles William Roeder, pastor of the Flatlands Dutch Reformed Church and honorary chaplain of the society, also spoke.

Mr. Webster announced that on May 24 the society will sponsor a celebration marking the 50th anniversary of the completion of the Brooklyn Bridge and that on April 8 next year the society will hold a celebration in honor of the 100th anniversary of the establishment of the old City of Brooklyn.

Following the dinner the guests were entertained by May Singhi Breen and Peter De Rose; Robert Simmons, tenor; Erva Giles, soprano; Baby Rose Marie and Herbert Steiner, accompanist.

Seated on Dais

Those on the dais in addition to the speakers were:

Committee Members

Arthur Hoffman, secretary of the society, was chairman of the dinner committee for the 14th consecutive year.

Others on the committee were:

COLORED BOYS' CASE IS TAKEN BY LEIBOWITZ

Samuel Leibowitz, prominent attorney, announced last night that he had agreed, conditionally, to conduct the defense of eight colored youths in Scottsboro, Ala., recently snatched from death by a United States Supreme Court reversal.

Samuel
Leibowitz

The prisoners were convicted of an attack upon a white woman, a capital offense in Alabama, and were sentenced to die. In the reversal decision a new trial was ordered.

In accepting the invitation to defend the men, Leibowitz made it clear at the outset that he is not in sympathy with the political and economic views of the International Labor defense which has made a cause celebre of the case. He declared he would try it solely on its merits, insisting he would not be involved in any controversy over racial prejudice.

Offers Services Free.

He also informed William L. Patterson, secretary of the International Labor Defense, who extended the invitation, that he would give his services free and would not even permit the organization to repay him for the expenses he may incur.

"If the views I have expressed match yours, then I will accept the task of conducting the defense," he wrote Patterson.

Leibowitz said that he would not discuss the case nor its ramifications.

Calls South Fair.

"I do not believe it has been the desire of the people of the South to deal unfairly with the colored man," he continued. "Customs differ; social usages and points of view are dictated by conditions.

But persons of substance in the southern States have recognized for many generations a moral obligation toward the simple and generous folk whom slavery brought them first as chattels.

"Some of my friends have advised me to take no part in this case. They fear that the defendants have been prejudged; that irrespective of the action of the Appellate Court they are doomed because their skins are black. I cannot partake of that opinion."

BIRMINGHAM, Jan. 19—Hearing on a petition of habeas corpus seeking the release of Roy Wright, one of nine colored youths indicted in the Scottsboro-attack case, has been postponed until Jan. 23.

The petition, filed by George W Chamlee of Chattanooga and other lawyers employed by the I. L. D., seeks the freedom of Wright on allegations that he is illegally held because a juvenile. When seized with the other youths March 25, 1931, on a freight train at Paint Rock, Ala., Wright gave his age as 14 years. The prisoners were charged with attacking two white girl hoboes, who were on the train with a gang of white youths.

A jury failed to agree on the punishment for Wright and a mistrial was declared, but the other eight indicted were convicted and sentenced to death. The Alabama Supreme Court reversed the sentence of Eugene Williams, holding he was a juvenile and should be tried in a juvenile court. The U. S. Supreme court reversed the other seven death sentences.

Judge J. P. McCoy postponed the hearing of Wright Monday in Jefferson circuit court. The postponement was agreed on by attorneys.

The Revolutionary Press and the Scottsboro Case

By CYRIL BRIGGS

1-31-33
New York, N.Y.

THE Scottsboro case presents one of the most dramatic proofs of the absolute indispensability of the Daily Worker in the developing struggles of the toiling Negro and white masses against the misery and hopelessness of the capitalist system and its increasingly murderous terror.

It was the Daily Worker that sounded the alarm when in March, 1931, the landlord court at Scottsboro, Alabama, attempted to rush eight of the nine innocent Scottsboro Negro lads to the electric chair, at the same time paving the way for a living death of life imprisonment for the ninth boy, 14-year-old Roy Wright. It was the Daily Worker that smashed through the conspiracy of silence of the capitalist press and the Negro reformist leaders of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. It was the Daily Worker that rallied the white and Negro masses behind the International Labor Defense and the League of Struggle for Negro Rights for a vigorous mass defense of the nine child-victims of capitalist justice, framed up on a lying charge of "rape."

The mass fight has won several tremendous partial victories. The Negro and white workers, in joint struggle, have four times forced back the outstretched murderous claws of the Alabama ruling class, have four times forced the lynch courts of the United States to set back the date of execution. The mass fight forced the U.S. Supreme Court to reverse the lynch verdicts last November and to order new trials for the boys. These great partial victories could not have been achieved without the daily leadership, agitation and constant vigilance of the Daily Worker, expressing in its news articles and editorials the clear line of the Communist Party in the fight to free the Scottsboro boys, in the fight against ruling class terror, against national oppression of the Negro People and against all attempts to split and divide the working class and disrupt the mass fight which, life itself teaches, alone can free the Scottsboro lads and other Negro and white victims of capitalist class justice.

The Scottsboro boys are still in danger. The U.S. Supreme Court verdict returned them for new trials to the Scottsboro court which originally rendered the lynch verdicts. The mass fight must be intensified and broadened out to draw in new sections of the working class, new sections of intellectuals and all elements opposed to the brutal persecution and oppression of the Negro People. In this fight and other defense campaigns the Daily Worker is absolutely indispensable.

PRECISELY because the Scottsboro Case is an expression of the horrible national oppression of the Negro masses, any real fight for the Scottsboro boys must necessarily take the character of a struggle against the whole brutal system of landlord robbery and imperialist national oppression of the Negro people. The struggle for the Scottsboro boys and for Negro national liberation is thus a direct menace to U. S. imperialism, directed against its weakest link: the existence of a brutally oppressed and resentful nationality, at the very heart of American imperialism.

This explains the viciousness of the attacks on the Scottsboro defense, the police attacks on white and Negro workers demonstrating for the freedom of the Scottsboro boys, the deportation of militant foreign-born workers (Yokinen, etc.) who rallied to the defense of the Negro people.

This explains the frantic mobilization by the imperialists of all their corrupt agents in the ranks of the working class and the Negro people: the Norman Thomases and Heywood Brouns, the Walter Whites and William Pickens. This explains the attempts of the U. S. State Department to disrupt the European tour of the Scottsboro Mother, Mrs. Ada Wright, and the late J. Louis Engdahl—their arrest by "socialist" and capitalist police chiefs in many European cities, their deportation from Belgium, Czechoslovakia and other countries.

This explains the vicious attacks by the authorities of the State of Georgia and the bosses and their agents throughout the country on the growing unity of the white and Negro workers, which is being forged under the leadership of the Communist Party in the Scottsboro struggle, as well as in the mounting resistance of the toiling masses to the bosses' program of hunger, fascist terror and imperialist war.

The Daily Worker is the weapon of the whole working class and of the Negro people in the fight against the rapidly worsening conditions of the toiling masses, in the fight against starvation and national oppression. Rally to the support of the Daily Worker! The Daily Worker must be saved from suspension! Rush funds at once! Mobilize your organizations, your clubs, etc., for immediate aid to the Daily Worker!

Chief of Police H. C. Blakemore said the letter in question which was taken from Danny Dundee, a pugilist, the night of January 5, 1932, had been sent to court officials in Birmingham, where habeas corpus proceedings are pending in behalf of Roy Wright, 14, one of the nine defendants.

Girl Assaulted By Negroes Says She Did Not Repudjate Testimony

HUNTSVILLE, ALA., Jan. 25—(AP)—Miss Ruby Bates, 22-year-old textile operative and one of the accusers of the nine negroes in the Scottsboro case, today reiterated previous denials that she had written a letter repudiating the testimony given in the trials in April 1931.

"I didn't write any such letter, and I don't know who did," the girl hotly declared when questioned toay.

Police Chief H. C. Blakemore said the letter in question, which was taken from Danny Dundee, a pugilist, the night of Jan. 5, 1932, had been sent to court officials in Birmingham where habeas corpus proceedings are pending in behalf of Roy Wright, 14, one of the nine defendants.

Montgomery Ala

The existence of the letter was brought out before Judge John P. McCoy in Jefferson Circuit Court last Monday, by Irving Schwab, one of the negroes' attorneys employed by the Internationational Labor Defense. He said the letter "repudiated" the testimony of the Bates girl.

Dundee at the time the letter was found on his person, signed an affidavit in which he accused an attorney of hiring him to obtain the letter. Dundee's affidavit said he got the girl drunk and forced her to sign the letter, stating that she had testified falsely against the negroes.

The letter was addressed to "Earl Streetman."

The girl also signed an affidavit Jan. 6, 1932, repudiating the letter and declaring if she had signed such a document "it was when I was so drunk I did not know what I was doing." She reiterated her testimony against the negroes was truc.

The attorney named by Dundee later was absolved by an affidavit by George Proctor, of New York, who said he was a writer and had employed Dundee to obtain information on the character of the two girls involved in the case but denied instructing Dundee to get them drunk.

Seven of the nine negroes indicted for an alleged attack on Miss Bates and a girl companion aboard a freight train near Paint Rock on March 25, 1931, are facing retrial at Scottsboro in March. Death sentences imposed on the seven in their first trial at Scottsboro were set aside by the U. S. Supreme Court last November.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., Jan.—A letter written by Ruby Bates, upon whose testimony of "rape" the Scottsboro boys were railroaded to lynch-verdicts, and which categorically denies all the charges she made in the lynch-court, was produced in court here Wednesday at the hearing on a writ of habeas corpus for the release of Roy Wright youngest of the boys.

Philadelphia

The hearing, in a courtroom crowded with Negroes, while hundreds more stood in the corridors and street, was adjourned when the court refused the demand of Gen. George W. Chamlee and Irving Schwab, International Labor Defense attorneys, to order Solicitor-General Thomas E. Knight to come to court to testify. Knight said he was "too busy". The hearing will be resumed Tuesday, January 31.

Mrs. Ada Wright, mother of Roy Wright, and his sister, Beatrice Maddox, were in court, to testify as to his age. Ruby Bates herself was also present, as was Chief of Police Blackmore of Huntsville, whb was forced to give up Ruby Bates' letter.

Police Forced Girl to Lie

The letter, examined by the I. L. D. attorneys, contains startling disclosures. The police forced her to lie with threats of keeping her in jail, and lodging charges against her, Ruby Bates wrote.

None of the Scottsboro boys ever touched her, the letter says categorically. In this letter, written to Earl Streetman, Ruby Bates tells of her remorse for her testimony which assisted in obtaining death-verdicts for the boys. She repeats again and again that the whole case was a frame-up, and that this letter is "the Gods truth."

The letter was impounded by the court and filed in the clark's office upon motion of the I. L. D. attorneys, who were denied the right, however, to obtain photostatic copies before the reopening of the hearing, and at the hearing would make a fight to obtain possession of the letter itself.

Continue Effort to Lynch Boys

This letter knocked the last legal props from under the prosecution's frame-up of the nine innocent Negro boys. The attitude of the prosecution, however, and the maneuver of Knight in obtaining an adjournment of the hearing, indicates that the southern boss lynchers will continue their effort to legally lynch the boys.

I. L. D. to Demand a Change of Venue

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., Feb. 14.—The new trial of the nine Scottsboro boys has been set for March 6, in Scottsboro, before Judge Alfred E. Hawkins, who presided over the original lynch trials which resulted in death-penalties for eight of them, it was learned today.

On that day General George W. Chamleee, Samuel S. Leibowitz, Joseph Brodsky, and Irving Schwab, International Labor Defense attorneys, will appear in the court to demand a change of venue from the town in which the local band played "There'll be a Hot Time" while the jury sanded down its hideous lynch verdicts of death against the innocent boys in April, 1931, to Jefferson County, which is the city of Birmingham, Ala.

Knight Advised 7 Negroes Must Appear March 6 Before Judge Hawkins

New trials granted seven negroes convicted at Scottsboro, Ala., of criminally assaulting two young white women, and given the death penalty, are set to take place at Scottsboro during the week beginning March 6, Atty. Gen. Knight has been advised by Circuit Judge A. E. Hawkins. The crime of which the defendants were found guilty occurred last March.

Atty. Gen Knight will personally prosecute each of the cases for the State, in the Circuit Court, he said yesterday.

Whether the trials will actually take place in Jackson County, is not yet definite, however, as counsel for the negroes have stated a change of venue will be applied for. Such application will have to be made to Judge Hawkins, the trial judge, and he can grant it or not, at his own discretion, it is understood.

If he grants it then the trials will take place in some other county and jurisdiction in the State, designated by him. If he denies it, the trials will proceed at Scottsboro, as the matter of his refusal of a change of venue can be taken up only on appeal of the cases or any of them, to a higher court, it was learned.

Same Counsel Likely

Though there has been no announcement from the defense as to who will represent the seven negroes at their second trials, it is presumed that this defense will consist of the array of counsel retained in behalf of the negroes by the International Labor Defense that appeared for the defendants when the cases were presented to the Supreme Court of Alabama on appeal, following the original convictions, George W. Chamlee, of Chattanooga, Tenn., with Irvin Schwob, of New York, are included in this array.

The seven negroes convicted and sentenced to death after they were found guilty of the assaults on the white women, are Haywood Patterson, Charles Weems, Clarence Norris, Ozie Powell, Willie Roberson, Andy Wright, Olin Montgomery and Eugene Williams. All took appeals to the Supreme Court of Alabama, which affirmed judgments of the trial court in all cases except that of Eugene Williams. This case was reversed and remanded, Williams being held a juvenile.

Trial of a ninth defendant, Roy Wright, resulted in a mistrial, and he was later removed from Scottsboro to the Jefferson Conunty Jail in Birmingham, where he is now confined. An effort to obtain his release recently through a habeas corpus proceeding was unsuccessful, the Jefferson Circuit judge sitting in the case holding he was without jurisdiction to act and that jurisdiction rests solely with the Circuit Court of Jackson County.

Montgomery

Action Fails To Materialize

A reported similar effort to bring about the release of Eugene Williams, through a similar proceeding filed in the Montgomery Circuit Court, did not materialize.

After the affirmance of the cases on appeal by the Supreme Court of Alabama, with the single exception referred to, appeals were taken in all other cases to the Supreme Court of the United States. Judgment of reversal was subsequently rendered by that tribunal and the new trials ordered that are now set for the first week in March. Reversal by the U. S. Supreme Court was on the ground of error by the trial judge in appointment and assignment of defense counsel.

Through the International Labor Defense and other radical organizations, cases of the negroes convicted at Scottsboro were given international publicity, and thousands of telegrams regarding them were received by Gov. Miller from various parts of this country and the rest of the world.

While the appeals were pending in the Supreme Court of Alabama, many such messages were delivered to members of that body and when these appeals were about to be submitted Chief Justice John C. Anderson took occasion to publicly denounce these attempts to influence the court, as highly improper.

Both before the Supreme Court of the State and the Supreme Court of the United States, the State of Alabama was represented on submission of the appeals, by Atty. Gen Knight.

When the Nation's highest court rendered its final decision on the appeals, a demonstration of radicals was attempted at the national capital, but was broken up by police.

All of the negroes convicted, with the exception of Roy Wright, who is in jail at Birmingham, are confined at Kilby Prison.

SCOTTSBORO CASE EYEWITNESS WILL AID PROSECUTION

Journal 6-25-33

Montgomery, Ala., June 24.—(AP)—Orville Gilley, of Guntersville, Ala., a much discussed figure in the "Scottsboro case" has returned to Alabama and has given Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., an affidavit purported to corroborate the story of Victoria Price.

Gilley was one of seven white boys aboard the train on which Mrs. Price alleged she and Ruby Bates were attacked, and was an eye witness to the occurrences.

Gilley was with Attorney General Knight and his assistant, Thomas E. Lawson, at Decatur on Thursday shortly before Judge James E. Horten at Athens set aside the sentence of death imposed on Heywood Patterson April 9.

Attorney General Knight informed the court that the state was ready to begin new trials at once, and has since indicated that the state would proceed as planned to try the other defendants.

Thomas Heflin, former United States senator, yesterday wired Attorney General Knight he would be glad to volunteer his services in having Judge Horton removed from jurisdiction in the case, and "having another judge appointed to try the Scottsboro Negroes."

Death Sentence Set Aside in Scottsboro Negro Case

Chicago Tribune 6-23-33

Athens, Ala., June 22.—[Special.]—The second death sentence imposed upon Heywood Patterson, one of nine Negro defendants in the Scottsboro rape case, which has received world-wide attention, was set aside today by Judge James E. Horton, who also granted Patterson a new trial. Judge Horton declared that in the last trial the testimony of Mrs. Victoria Price, a white woman who said she was attacked in a freight car by the nine Negroes, was not corroborated and bears on its face indications of improbability and is contradicted by other evidence."

The Scottsboro conviction was reversed by the United States Supreme court, which said the seven Negroes who were convicted had not received a fair trial. Two had been turned over to juvenile authorities. In the second trial, in which Patterson alone was the defendant, a second conviction was obtained here in Athens and again the death penalty was decreed.

Gives Reasons for Decision.

"History, sacred and profane, and the common experience of mankind teach that women of the character shown in this case are prone for selfish reasons to make false accusations both of rape and of insult upon the slightest provocation, or without even provocation, for ulterior purposes," Judge Horton said in rendering his decision.

"These women are shown, by the great weight of evidence, on this very day before leaving Chattanooga to have falsely accused two Negroes of insulting them. The tendency on the part of the women shows them to be predisposed to make false accusations upon any occasion whereby their selfish ends may be obtained."

The other woman in the case was Ruby Bates, also white, who in the first trial testified she was assaulted along with Mrs. Price. The two women were riding in a box car with the nine Negroes. In the second trial Miss Bates came here from New York, wearing fine new clothes, and denied that she was attacked in any way by the Negroes.

Early Trial Date Requested.

Thomas E. Knight Jr., attorney general of Alabama, who prosecuted, asked the court to set an early date for Patterson's new trial. He said the state is ready now to proceed with the third trial of the Negro, the ultimate outcome of which is expected to determine whether the others shall be retried or the charges dismissed.

"Constitutional law still prevails in Alabama,'" said George W. Chamlee Sr. of Chattanooga, one of defense counsel, when the court set aside the verdict.

"There are still just judges in Alabama," said Osmond W. Fraenkel of New York, another defense counsel.

The first trial, which the Supreme court of Alabama held to have been fair and proper, was followed by a cry of "lynch law" from defense lawyers. The cry was taken up by radicals all over the country and a considerable defense fund was raised. The defendants have been held in jail in Birmingham for safe keeping.

Judge James E. Horton

EVERY lover of justice and fair play of all races, nationalities, and creeds was thrilled beyond description by the good news that Judge James E. Horton, the presiding judge in the Heywood-Patterson case recently tried in Decatur, Ala., had set aside the guilty verdict brought in by the jury, thus opening the way many thought closed for saving the life of Heywood Patterson and others charged with him of the same crime. It also shed a bright beam of light on the dark shadows of this famous Scottsboro case and revived the faith growing weak of many believers in America's sense of justice as practiced in Alabama. The judge's decision emphatically confirmed our belief expressed in another editorial that a solution of such problems as arose in the Scottsboro case can be found in the communities where these alleged crimes are committed.

We beg to disagree with some of our editorial writers in our great weeklies who try to take away from Judge Horton the honor, praise, and apprecication due him in his most courageous decision in this case. The Pittsburgh Courier has the following to say concerning it:

"In the midst of general jubilation over the judge's decision and congratulations of him for his courage and fairness, it is well to point out that his action was the lesser of two evils, from Alabama's standpoint. The New York Times significantly states: 'Judge Horton's ruling today will prevent a review of Alabama's jury system by the higher courts, as it removes the necessity for an appeal.' In other words, Alabama's jim crow jury system is far more precious to the white people of that state than the life of Heywood Patterson. It can be confidently expected that when Patterson is tried again, as he will be, certain steps will be taken by Alabama to forestall attacks on its jury system while seeking to convict Patterson. Already Orville Gilley, the only white witness to the alleged rape, has been 'found' and will testify for the state against the nine Negroes."

In the first place, what does the New York Times know accurately about Alabama's point of view in this matter? The statement itself of the Times is erroneous and is hardly worth noticing. Alabama's jim crow jury system can become the subject of review by the higher courts at any time and in any case appealed for the purpose. Again, does not the statement that "Orville Gilley has been found," point toward the editor's belief in the future conviction of Patterson by corroborated evidence to be furnished by him? Will not this possible conviction be subject to appeal? And, in said appeal, will not the jim crow jury system of Alabama become subject to review by the higher courts? The only plausible explanation of the statement is that it is manifest communist propaganda. The editor of the Courier gives the secret away when he follows up these insufficient reasons with the urgent exhortation that "money will be needed yet to push the defense of Patterson by the International Labor Defense." The truth of the whole matter is:—The International Labor Defense has made a propaganda and financial racket out of this Scottsboro case, seriously endangering the life of those boys and making their acquittal almost impossible, had it not been for the independent spirit of Judge Horton, who was courageous enough to do justly in a case which had been badly muddled by these propagandists. We too are to be blamed because we so easily allow our love for being duped and humbugged to blind the eyes even of our seers who ought to know better. We cannot afford to permit our race to be a cat's paw for these communists. If here be virtue in their contentions, let them put them directly before the American people. We, economically and socially on the ragged edge of things, are certainly poor instruments with which to effect a reform movement so revolutionary, no matter how virtuous, as that advocated by the communists.

Furthermore, why seek to impugn the motives of Judge Horton, who of his own volition and conviction, against the sentiment of his community and the verdict of the jury of his fellow citizens, put his judgment against that of twelve jurymen backed by public sentiment and race prejudice in a matter in which the whole white race is very sensitive? Why seek to detract one iota of the glory, honor, praise, appreciation, and gratitude from this judge who believed like we did that Heywood Patterson was not guilty as charged because the evidence of his guilt was not sufficiently corroborated; and was bold, daring, and courageous enough to believe as we believed and express it clearly as he does in the text of his decision?

Such action on our part would be worse than the mob spirit prejudice which convicted Heywood Patterson and those charged with him with the same crime, and has caused the shadow of death to hang over their heads two full years. To fail to accord to Judge Horton the honor and praise and appreciation due him, would be an unpardonable sin against the spirit of justice and fair play which as a race, sinned against so often ourselves, we cannot afford to commit. The fact is, a notable deed has been done. What does it matter if this good man and noble deed have come out of an unexpected Nazareth? That is an asset rather than a liability. The truth of the matter is that in Judge Horton we have found a truer friend than our propagandists from New York, and Judge James E. Horton, of Athens, Ala., by this expression of courage, backed by high character, has won for himself a place and a name among America's truest and noblest sons. The whole race owes him a debt of gratitude which we cannot afford to permit to remain unpaid at least by our sincere praise and appreciation and gratitude.

London Citizens Protest in Scottsboro Matter

LONDON, July 21.—Interest in the infamous Scottsboro case in the United States continues to hold the spotlight of the world. Recently a group of men and women of both races assembled and marched to within a block of the American embassy, where they were halted by the police.

Officers informed the marchers that only one of them would be permitted to go to the embassy, whereupon R. Beresford Gale was selected to present a petition to the ambassador to be forwarded to President Roosevelt. The following resolution was presented:

"A petition to Franklin D. Roosevelt, president of the United States of America for justice in the Scottsboro case.

"We, Negroes, who are residents of London, England, petition that you, as president of the United States, use all your powers to see that justice is done by insuring that these nine boys get a fair trial."

Several hundred persons signed the petition. A high official at the embassy received Mr. Gale and assured him the petition would be given to the ambassador as requested.

Judge Horton, who presided at the trial in which Haywood Patterson, one of the negroes in the "Scottsboro Case" was convicted, has ordered a new trial because "the evidence greatly preponderates in favor of the defendant." Now that the judge has taken this action it is to be hoped that the negro's retrial may be made in the courts, and not on soap boxes and communist halls in New York and other large cities. The defendant's lawyers, who have thus seen that Alabama courts are fair, should unite in aiding the state to see that the next trial is orderly and free from prejudice.

NEW SCOTTSBORO TRIALS MAY HAVE KU KLUX JUDGE

I.L.D. Learns Callahan Likely to Preside

NEW YORK, July 11.—If Judge James E. Horton refuses further to consider the Scottsboro case, the retrial of Heywood Patterson will be thrown into the court of Judge W. W. Callahan, of Morgan County, one of the most notorious Negro-baiters and Ku Klux Klansmen in Alabama, it was learned today by the International Labor Defense.

Judge Horton's decision was seen by William L. Patterson, national secretary of the ILD, as a maneuver to accomplish more skillfully the lynch purposes of the white landlords of Alabama, led by Ex-Senator Tom Heflin and Attorney General Thomas E. Knight.

Judge Horton's decision to grant a new trial, and his statement that the "evidence preponderates in favor of the defendant" is seen by William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense as a means to lull the masses into a sense of security, halt the mass protest, and create the illusion that the Alabama courts can be relied upon.

At the same time, Judge Horton is scheduled to plead that this same decision disqualifies him from further participation in the case, throwing it into the hands of Judge Callahan, who has no such statement of the innocence of Heywood Patterson to support, and who will proceed more ruthlessly with the legal lynching.

Under these circumstances, the ILD pointed out, intensification of mass pressure in meetings, telegrams, resolutions and letters of protest, demanding the immediate, unconditional release of the boys, is imperative.

Protests should be addressed to Governor B. M. Miller, at Montgomery, Ala.; Attorney-General Thomas E. Knight, also at Montgomery, and to Judge James E. Horton, Athens, Ala.

JUDGE HORTON'S DECISION

Judge Horton's decision in granting a new trial for Patterson in the only Scottsboro case tried at Decatur came as a shocking surprise to those who have been keeping up with the record in the case, especially since Horton was the trial judge and permitted the testimony which now furnishes the technicalities for a new trial.

That part of Judge Horton's ruling that appeared in the daily papers furnishes one with enough evidence that the court wanted to argue the case in favor of the defendant rather than pass on the merits of it. The court is placed in somewhat delicate situation over this ruling and it will be difficult for him to explain this unusual procedure.

This newspaper is concerned only with the merits of that case and all others. It is possible that Judge Horton's ruling was right, but it's up to Judge Horton to be more explicit for people to have that opinion and the facts.

A Victory for Justice

Every fair minded person must approve the action of Federal Judge Horton in Alabama in setting aside the conviction of Haywood Patterson, one of the nine Negroes accused of assault in the now famous Scottsboro case. It is a simple fact that the guilt of these men was not proved and that the last trial of Patterson was a travesty on justice. It will be recalled that at this trial one of the two women who brought the assault charges completely reversed her story, admitted that the whole thing was a "frameup" and that she had been induced to tell the truth after conferring with a New York clergyman. The other woman stuck to her story of the assault, and it was her story that the jury of white men believed.

Eight of the nine Negroes were convicted at their first trial, but the Supreme Court of the United States set aside the convictions and ordered new trials on the ground that the prisoners had not been properly defended. Patterson was the first to be retried. The unfortunate injection of Communistic activities into the case and bold attempts to stir up racial prejudice worked to the disadvantage of the accused man. It was alleged that groups interested in the man's defense were also trying to foment trouble among the Negroes in the South. Under the circumstances, a trial strictly on the merits of the case was impossible.

Judge Horton, who was roundly criticized by the defending attorney, has now taken the right course in insisting on a new trial. More than the guilt or innocence of these particular men is at stake; the question is whether or not a fair trial for Negroes accused of this crime is possible in the deep South.

ATHENS, Ala., July 26. — Judge James E. Horton yesterday set a new trial for Haywood Patterson and the other innocent Negro boys for the October term of his court.

New York, N.Y.

NEW YORK, July 26.—"The decision and announcement of Judge Horton setting the date for new lynch-trials of the Scottsboro boys is proof that in making the concession to mass pressure of granting Haywood Patterson a new trial, Horton, together with Attorney-General Thomas E. Knight and ex-senator Tom Heflin, maneuvered to take the best advantage of even this concession to railroad the Scottsboro boys to the electric chair," William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense, said today.

"This setting of trials for the Scottsboro boys, when he has admitted that they are innocent, proves Horton's determination to legally lynch them. It was in his power to free them.

"Only a tremendous increase in the mass pressure which has suffered a lull under these illusions, can save the boys."

DENIES SHE FEARED TO GO TO DECATUR

Kansas City

NEW YORK. — As the Scottsboro boys for the third time wage a court battle for their lives down in Decatur, Ala., Ruby Bates, white alleged attack victim who from the witness stand during the second trial last spring established the youth's innocence, is also fighting for her life on a hospital cot here following a critical operation performed Friday, November 24.

Ruby Bates, who was waiting near New York for her deposition to be taken by a New York lawyer for use in the Decatur trial Thursday notified the International Labor Defense that her physical condition had become such that she had been obliged to go to a hospital. There, an examination by specialists made it evident that an immediate operation was a matter of life and death.

"I'm Not Afraid"

Ruby Bates was operated on early Friday morning. Physicians in charge could not pronounce her out of danger, Friday night.

Thursday night, in the presence of a representative of the International Labor Defense, Ruby Bates told a reporter of her arrival in the hospital and the operation she expected.

"I knew about my condition, but I didn't tell anybody just how bad it was, until I was forced to come to the hospital," she said. "I wanted to keep on fighting for the Scottsboro boys actively.

"Then when I realized I'd have to be operated on, I came here, and notified Mr. Paterson of the I. L. D.

"You know I was forced to testify against the boys in the first trial. I told the truth at the last trial in Decatur, because I didn't want these boys to die on account of a lie I told. I have received threats that I will be lynched if I return, but in spite of that, if it were necessary, and if I were able, I would go back and testify in Decatur. I would be afraid, because I know they are after me. But if I could, I would go.

"I just have heard that Knight will put Orville Gilley on the stand to testify against the Scottsboro boys, in this trial. I know they have filled him full of lies. They kept him in jail with us in Scottsboro, but they never dared put him on the stand. I wish I could go back to answer his lies, but I can't. And it isn't because I'm afraid. That wouldn"t be enough to stop me."

Writes To Workers

As the reporter was leaving her bedside she called him back:

"Do all you can for the Scottsboro boys," she said. "I did my best while I was able ...."

She was weak, tired. It was obviously an effort for her to talk but she smiled gamely, and gave a firm handshake.

Before she went on the operating table, Friday, Ruby Bates propped herself up in bed to write this letter to all workers, Negro and white, fighting for the freedom of the Scottsboro boys:

Dear Friends:

I am confined in bed and cannot help the way I want to help save the nine innocent boys in Decatur, Ala.

The only way I can help them while I am confined here is to send my greetings and best wishes to them through newspapers. Whether they get the news I don't know, but friends, I will give my life anytime to see these boys free and back in the ranks of the working class.

So, friends, I appeal to you, both Negro and white, to take up this struggle and at the present time take my place to save these boys.

My last appeal is, please don't let the Scottsboro boys die.

Yours truly,
RUBY BATES.

NEGROES FACE STARK TERROR

Decatur's 1,300 Black Citizens Gripped by Fear of Trouble

11-29-33

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 27.—Terror—stark terror based on bitter experience—grips the Negro population of this town as the third trial of Haywood Patterson, Scottsboro defendant, progresses here.

"Decatur," to use the exact words of the first person interviewed by the writer on his arrival, "is sitting on a keg of dynamite—no, of nitroglycerine—and the least spark, a careless word, a street fight, a swallow of liquor, might set off an explosion which may endanger the lives of every Negro in this town."

These are not idle words. And no one knows it better than Decatur's colored inhabitants who during the last six months have lived through a reign of terror which will rival anything in our modern fiction of oppression and intimidation.

The Palm Sunday decision, condemning Patterson for the second time to death in the electric chair, was scarcely six weeks old when the white lawless element in this town, angered no doubt by the universal wave of resentment directed against that infamous verdict, turned and struck against the defenseless Negro residents of this couity seat.

The old story. A Negro was accused of rape. The sheriff arrested the suspect and spirited him out of town. And carloads of bloodthirsty whites descended on the Negro section. A boy was returning home from work. One of the cars swerved toward the curb. A full charge of buckshot tore the youth's face away and ended his life before he had a chance to even look up. Down the street, another shotgun bellowed forth its deadly charge. Another youth, more fortunate than the first, stopped dead in his tracks behind a sheltering tree and turned and fled. A gaping hole in this same tree today bares mute testimony of the deadly intent of his assailant.

That was the beginning. Since then the cold [illegible] terror has gripped the heart of almost every substantial Negro citizen in town. One, a professional man, has been forced to flee for his life. Several others, who figured either directly or indirectly in the previous trials have been warned that they must get out. Rumor has it that twenty-seven leading Negroes have been marked for death. A man who pleaded for funds for the Scottsboro boys while visiting Chicago, has been visited and warned to leave town.

Rumors fly so thick and fast that it is impossible to hear them all. And in their homes, these God-fearing folk remain many not daring to appear on the streets at night, awaiting a doom which may descend any minute.

Fight back? How can they? No many of them ever owned guns. Most of those who did have been forced to pawn their weapons or sell them for food in these hard times of depression. Buy more now? Impossible in Decatur—even if the money was available. Flee? How? That too takes money. And it is not easy to leave a home for which you have slaved your whole life. Besides, Decatur was not always so.

So. while the world looks on and hopes for the best where seven black souls are concerned, 1,300 equally innocent persons look on also and pray for their own deliverance from a danger not of their own making.

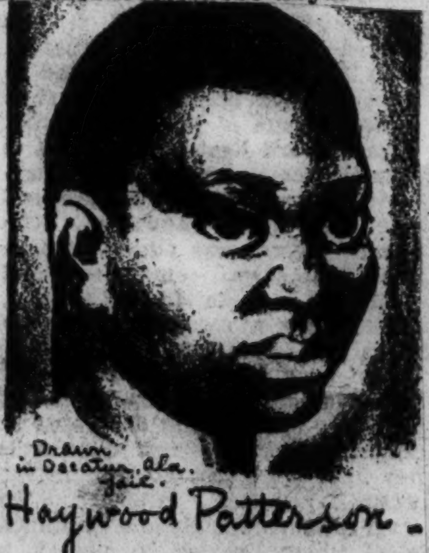
By JOHN L. SPIVAK

(Special Correspondent to the Daily Worker)

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 27.—For the third time in his 22 years, Haywood Patterson today faced a lily-white jury in the Morgan County court house here in another desperate struggle waged by the International Labor Defense, seeking to save his life and the lives of the eight other Scottsboro boys.



Drawn in Decatur, Ala. Jail.
Haywood Patterson.

Heywood Patterson, one of the nine innocent Scottsboro boys, who went on trial before Judge Callahan in Decatur, Ala., for the third time yesterday.

"God be willing, I'll finish this case by Wednesday night," Judge W. W. Callahan announced, as the case got under way in the stifling court room, crowded with jury panel and their friends and relatives. For the first time since the preliminary hearings began last Monday, the section reserved for Negroes was filled. At the foot of stairs leading to the court room, two deputies kept scores of spectators away by stretching a rope across the stairs. The atmosphere is so far, peaceful, although armed deputies patrol the corridor and frisk everyone entering the court.

Immediately after court opened, Leibowitz asked Judge Callahan to allow his two "assistants, Harold Fox and Tiney Daley," Leibowit's bodyguards to sit at the defense table. Callahan looked at the two "man mountains" and announced his refusal. Permission for them to sit in the front row was also refused.

Sheriff Davis then called the list of the prosecution witnesses. Hardly any answered to the call. Judge Callahan irritably comments on the lack of State witnesses. Sheriff Davis declares that many defense witnesses called are not to be found. Leibowitz asks the court to issue a body attachment for Mrs. Jack Tiller, who refused to appear to testify.

"Mrs. Callie Broochi" is called by defense as witness. "Couldn't be found," declares Sheriff Davis. Callie Broochi is a fiction character of Octavus Roy Cohen's Saturday Evening Post stories. At the last trial Victoria Price swore that she and Ruby Bates spent the night at Callie Broochi's house in Chattanooga before boarding the freight train from which the Scottsboro boys were taken.

The regular venire panel is then called from an almost filled court room. The prospective jurors line up before Judge Callahan. Men in overalls, store suits, bespectacled, marked by lined faces and gnarled hands.

Daily Worker

Out of a panel of 100 [illegible] prospective jurors, [illegible] four ask to be excused. All the others seem anxious to sit in judgment on the nine Negro lads. Alabama picks its juries by "striking" names not wanted. The procedure is to call twelve men. The prosecution walks up and down and points to a man, calling "strike." This means he does not want him. For every State "strike," the defense is entitled to two. So on down the line, until twelve are left out of the hundred. These twelve make the jury.

New York

From the first twelve called, five said they had no fixed opinion which couldn't be changed no matter what the evidence showed. Two more were excused because they are opposed to capital punishment. To the five left, Joseph Brodsky asks if they would believe a white man's word against a Negro's word. Judge Callahan refuses to allow this question, also barring the question if the jurors felt any resentment at the criticism levelled against Wade Wright, Morgan County prosecutor, who made the "Jew money" speech in the last trial.

From the second dozen prospective jurors examined, three admitted having fixed opinions on the case and one stated opposition to capital punishment.

Both Leibowitz and Brodsky in their questions to prospective jurors constantly emphasized the effect of Wade Wright's inflamatory speech at the last trial. Prospective jurors admit discussing the case, but deny they have been influenced.

Leibowitz asks a perspective juror:

"Have you any opinion of the guilt or innocence of this defendant?"

Callahan intervened "He needn't answer question." Leibowitz protested that he "asked if he had fixed opinion." "We are wasting time," replied Judge Callahan. "Let's get moving."

Several minor spats between the judge and the defense attorneys were not recorded by the court reporter.

From the third batch, five announced opposition to capital punishment and five admitted having fixed opinions. The prosecution challenged all those opposed to capital punishment, showing its intention to demand the death penalty. Those with fixed opinions, looked Leibowitz grimly, in the face, announcing loudly:

"Nothing can make me change my mind. I have read about the case in the papers."

Leibowitz asked a prospective juror the usual question about Wade Wright, when Judge Callahan interrupted him irritably: "I think we've had enough of that. Why popularize him?"

From a fourth batch, four admitted fixed opinions, two opposed capital punishment, one said he would not convict on circumstantial evidence. Judge Callahan thereupon asked him if he knows what it means. The juror answers no. Callahan explains:

"If you walk in a field, find ears of corn chewed, and the only tracks around that of hogs, would you find the hogs did it?"

"I would think so, but I wouldn't know it," the juror replied. The court room laughed. Callahan continues:

"Suppose you were locked in a dark house for a long time and lost track of day or night. A man comes in and says there is no cloud in the sky. Another says it is noon. Would you need more evidence that the sun was shining?"

"I'd take his word for it."

"Well, that's circumstantial evidence."

The fifth batch included the remainder of the venire. Two opposed capital punishment, one admitted having a fixed opinion, one declared against circumstantial evidence.

After four and a half hours wherein 63 prospective jurors were excused from the panel of 100, "striking" for jury was resumed at 2 o'clock. Out of panel, 36 were excused for illness and other reasons, and 32 for cause. Of the 32, nineteen had fixed opinions and 13 were opposed to capital punishment.

Fifteen minute recess granted to decide whom to "strike" off the panel.

Now that the jury is about to be picked, there is a sense of tension in the court room. Wright calls "strike" and Brodsky calls "two strikes" for the defense for each one for the prosecution.

"State strikes number eight," calls Wright loudly.

"Defense strikes numbers four and sixty-two," Brodsky returns.

Numbers being called. Tension and drama increase, for upon the remaining numbers the boy's life hinges, and everyone seems to realize it.

"Number four," Brodsky calls.

It is the last strike. The jury to try Patterson has been picked.

Just as Judge Callahan declared the court ready to order for "striking" for jury, Leibowitz declared:

"Defense not ready. I have just been informed by phone that the testimony of Ruby Bates cannot be taken before Wednesday and expect to receive doctors' certificate to this effect and file it for record."

While this was occurring, Victoria Price, dressed in blue, with a new hat and a dangling veil and chewing gum methodically, walked in, creating a stir in the court.

The selection of the jury was completed at 2.55. It consists of nine farmers, one merchant, one truck driver and one painter.

The jury follows: Hickory Bridges, Danville, farmer; Elbert Conn, Eva, farmer; Gladstone G. Isley, Hartzelle, farmer; Edward E. Nelson, Decatur, truck driver; Avery Roberts, Decatur, painter; Claude J. Roberts, Somerville, farmer; John H. Russell, Decatur, farmer; John Halbrooks, Somerville, farmer; Homer Johnson, Somerville, farmer; Titchler Johnston, Somerville, farmer; Floyd H. Lyle, Somerville, farmer; Homer Summerford, Falkville, merchant.

Immediately after the selection of the jury, the defense set up on a board an exact replica of the freight train on which the aleged attack occurred. All witnesses were sent to witness rooms. The courtroom filled up, with about 100 downstair kept out by the rope stretched across the stairway.

"State's first witness," Callahan called iritably when the train was set up.

Wade Wright, of the "Northern Jew Lawyer" speech in a voice not quite bellowing as at the spring trial read the accusation against Patterson.

Victoria Price Memorized Her Part

Knight then called Victoria Price. Sitting in the witness chair here legs crossed, a merry-widow veil over the upper part of her face, she repeated the accusations against Patterson and the other boys.

Her story of the alleged rape was told in almost the identical words she used at the trial this spring. It seemed as though she had memorized a part and repeated said answers in response to Brodsky's questions.

Upon cross-examination she testified that she had been married twice, but could not remember the dates or the year. Her second husband's name was McClendon, she said.

Judge Protects Victoria Price

"Is your name McClendon now?" Liebowitz asked.

"I never used that name."

"Are you divorced from McLendon?"

Callahan interrupted by telling her that she did not have to answer that question. Each time Liebowitz tried to probe into her past life, Callahan shut him up. Even when Liebowitz offered to tell what he wanted to prove by his questioning, Callahan did not listen. The judge grew more irritable with the defense counsel as he probed deeper into her story. Victoria admitted running around with Jack Teller, a married man. Callahan did not permit Liebowitz to probe into Victoria's sexual life immediately preceding the alleged attack, though the defense pleaded that it was essential for them to show that Victoria had had intercourse with boy friends immediately before the alleged rape

Birmingham Meet Demands Release of Scottsboro Boys

11-28-33

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., Nov. 27.—Raising high the banner of struggle against lynching, 600 Negroes supported by a number of white workers attended the Scottsboro Anti-Lynching Conference here yesterday, on the eve of the Decatur trials of the innocent Scottsboro boys.

New York

The meeting was one of the most militant and determined gathering ever held in this city, and was unmolested by the police who confined their activities to propagandizing white workers "not to mix with niggers." Despite this propaganda quite a number of white workers attended.

Ben Davis, Jr., one of the International Labor Defense Negro attorneys defending Angelo Herndon and Jane Speed, southern white woman active in the Scottsboro defense, gave a graphic exposure of the frame-up of the Scottsboro boys and of the lynch preparations in Decatur against the boys and their defenders.

The meeting unanimously adopted a resolution demanding a change of venue from lynch-infested Decatur, quashing of the indictment returned by a grand jury from which Negroes were excluded, and the release of the Scottsboro boys. Other resolutions were passed demanding the release of Herndon and the Chambers County croppers, and a halt to the lynch wave and police terror.

The audience pledged redoubled support to the International Labor Defense and vigorously applauded the program of the League of Struggle for Negro Rights, which was presented by Ben Davis, who also reported on the results of the Eastern Anti-Lynching Conference held recently in Baltimore. In an atmosphere of militant enthusiasm, the audience further pledged to carry on the fight for the rights of the Negro people in the heart of the lynch country, for the freedom of the Scottsboro boys, the smashing of the lynch terror and the building of a mighty League of Struggle for Negro Rights as a prerequisite to final victory over the landlords, their courts and agents.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 26 (AP)—In the same courtroom where eight months ago a jury sentenced him to death, Heywood Patterson, one of seven Negro defendants in the "Scottsboro case" tomorrow faces a new trial with his life in the balance.

Macon Ga.

Patterson is the first of the seven Negroes facing a new trial under a change of venue to Morgan county on charges of attacking two white girls aboard a Southern railway freight train in Jackson county on March 25, 1931. Patterson was tried a second time here last April and sentenced to death. This verdict was set aside in June by Judge James E. Horton on grounds of insufficient evidence to warrant the penalty.

As in the first trials in Jackson county two weeks after the alleged crime, Patterson was selected by the State to be tried first, and was arraigned last Monday.

A venire of 100 has been called from which to select the 12 Morgan county citizens who will sit in judgment on the evidence. Approximately 75 witnesses have been summoned, most of them from Jackson county where the Negroes were taken from the train at Paint Rock.

Macon Ga.

Patterson's third trial will offer a decided contrast to the two previous public hearings, as this time deputy sheriffs in mufti will stand guard to prevent any violence or disorder, instead of the troops with glistening bayonets and smart uniforms who mounted guard in Scottsboro in April, 1931, and here last spring.

Judge Callahan's Charge to the Jury in the Scottsboro Case

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 30.—The text of Judge W. W. Callahan's charge to the jury in the Scottsboro case was as follows:

Gentlemen of the Jury:

At a special term of the grand jury of Jackson County, Ala., the grand jury of that county returned into the Circuit Court an indictment against this defendant, jointly with others.

That indictment, leaving off the State and county and date, reads as follows:

Times

"The grand jury of said county charge that, before finding of this indictment, Haywood Patterson, Eugene Williams, Charlie Weems, alias Charles Weem; Roy Wright, alias Ray Wright; Ozie Powell, Willie Robinson, Andy Wright, Olin Montgomery and Clarence Corris, alias Clarence Morris, whose names to the grand jury are otherwise unknown than as stated, forcibly ravished Victoria Price, against the peace and dignity of the State of Alabama."

By due process of law, this charge has been transferred to this county and to this court in the Eighth Judicial Court of this county jurisdiction to try and determine the cause just as though the crime charged in the indictment had occurred in this county.

This is a suit, not of Victoria Price against Haywood Patterson and these other parties, but it is a suit of the State of Alabama against these parties.

Now only Haywood Patterson is on trial. The others are not on trial. It is no concern of yours or mine what has happened or what may happen to the other defendants. You have nothing to do with that, and the fact that they are not on trial now is not to be considered by you either against the defendants or in their favor. It just has nothing to do with it.

Describes Intent of the Statute

The crime charged in the indictment is known in law as rape. Rape is defined by the law to be the carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly against her will. The offense is complete when the woman is made to yield through fear and does not consent voluntarily and consciously. Although a man may not tend to resort to actual force, if on account of the circumstances or the relationship of the parties, he intentionally, for the purpose of accomplishing his unlawful purposes, puts her in fear of personal injury or a violation, and she yields on account of these influences, he is guilty of rape.

I see that I used a word here that does not make good sense, about putting her in fear of "personal injury"—or "violence," I should have said.

When the female is not an imbecile, or is not rendered unconcious or bodily weak by the administration of drugs or other substance, force is an essential element of the offense of rape. Force is either actual or constructive. Actual force would be the application of personal violence literally.

Constructive force is a force brought to bear on the mind and amounts to mental force. Acquiescence obtained through duress of mind of the woman, or by putting her in such, is constructive and is as much forbidden by law as actual force.

Law Does Not Compel Killing of Assailant

If the act is accompanied by force, actual or illegally implied, it is constructive force, and against the consent of a woman, it is rape, without regard to whether the defendant put the prosecutrix—in this case, Victoria Price—in fear of her life or fear of great bodily harm in the accomplishment of his purpose.

Consent or acquiescence obtained by duress or fear of personal violence will constitute no defense, the law regarding such submission as no consent at all. If the mind of the woman is overpowered by a display of physical force, threats, expressly made or implied therefrom, his conduct and surroundings, or she ceases resistance through fear of great harm, the consummation of unlawful intercourse by the man is rape.

The offense is complete when the woman is made or caused to yield through fear and does not consent voluntarily, whether or not the apprehension of bodily harm is reasonable or unreasonable. While the law arms a woman who is assaulted by a man with intent to ravish her with the legal right to stand her ground and if necessary to kill her assailant to protect her person from the gratification of his lust, the law does not compel her to resort to such means, and the fact that she does not so resort does not strip the charge of the offense of rape in and of itself.

All the circumstances surrounding the commission of the alleged crime are to be considered, and whether the prosecutrix does or does not repel force by force, or resist her assailant to the utmost, if the act of penetration is actually accomplished by force, actual or constructive, as I have defined these words, and against the will of the prosecutrix, the defendant is guilty of rape.

Storm's Effect Cited As Direct Evidence

In considering all these questions, the relative sizes of the parties, the attitude of the defendant or his accomplices, if there were any, the social and racial differences, are all matters to be weighed by you in passing on the question as to whether all the necessary elements of the crime exist, and when all the elements of the crime are shown by the evidence beyond all reasonable doubt.

Suppose you are passing through a forest heavily timbered and suddenly you come upon a belt where every tree is blown down and uprooted, saplings and all, and the tops of all are lined to the east.

Now that is direct evidence. You saw the trees uprooted. You saw the directions of the tops. Now you want to find out what caused the trees to be uprooted and how came the tops all to be in one direction.

Nobody was there, no other evidence is before you. You naturally apply your past experience and observation, and you reach a conclusion that those trees were uprooted by some severe wind, and you want to know the direction from whence it came.

The one fact that the trees are all lying to the east tells you from your experience that that wind was from the west, and you know, just as well as if you had been there and had seen the flash of the lightning, the roar of the thunder and of the wind. You don't need somebody to appear before you and tell you that the wind blew the trees down, nor that it is from the west.

Two Important Witnesses Claimed By State

They are the things that you conclude from what you do see. That is somewhat a striking illustration, I will admit, and you will not find the application of the principles of circumstantial evidence just as outstanding and clear at all times as that. But made it striking, so that you could be impressed with the meaning of it and the purpose of it.

Now, according to the State's theory and contention, there are two outstanding witnesses for the State, as they claim, that show that Victoria Price was raped. I mean to say, if they are believed, and believed beyond all reasonable doubt, from all the evidence in the case. The law would authorize a conviction on the testimony of Victoria Price alone, if from that evidence, then the crime is one of rape, although the prosecutrix may have been shown to have made no actual effort to resist.

The act must not have been by the consent of the woman, but in this case there is no claim by the defendant that the prosecutrix, Victoria Price, gave her consent, but on the contrary, the defense is that the defendant did not have sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix, either with or without her consent.

Where the woman charged to have been raped, as in this case is a white woman, there is a very strong presumption under the law that she will not and did not yield voluntarily to intercourse with the defendant, a Negro; and this is true, whatever the station in life the prosecutrix may occupy, whether she be the most despised, ignorant and abandoned woman of the community, or the spotless virgin and daughter of a prominent home of luxury and learning.

The law forbids rape, and that law is made for all and reaches out its protecting arm for all, regardless of race, color, creed, or station in life.

"Abetting" Principle Explained in Law

It is the glory of the law of this State and of the States of this union that its protecting wings encompass all womankind.

If her person has been unlawfully violated she may appeal to the courts with an abiding faith that no accusing finger can be pointed to her erring past or hopeless future, as an excuse for denying to her full and adequate protection of the law.

Now, gentlemen, there is a principle of law involved in this case, technically known as "aiding and abetting." That law is this—that any person who advises, encourages either by act or word, in violation of law, is just as guilty as the party committing the actual wrong. It makes no difference, and the punishment in the eyes of the law is the same.

To illustrate: If a man should call on you for a gun and inform you for what purpose he wanted it, to wit, to shoot or kill one of your fellow-citizens, and you loaned that gun to him for that purpose, the law says you are a murderer and you are guilty of murder and should be punished and will be in the eyes of the law, as such.

So as applied to this case.

One other thought before leaving that—the law on the question of aiding and abetting says that the mere presence of a party at or while the crime is going on, and his presence is for the purpose of aiding, encouraging, assisting or abetting in any way the commission of crime if aid becomes necessary and the party who is committing the crime knows that he is there and there for that purpose, he is as guilty as the one who committed the offense, although he never moved a muscle or said a word; provided his presence did encourage, aid or cause the other party to commit the offense.

Discusses Evidence On "Conspiracy"

There is still another principle of law very much akin to aiding and abetting. It is known in law as "conspiracy." Now a conspiracy is where two or more persons, either by prearrangement or upon an emergency, enter upon a common purpose which contemplates crime each is a conspirator, and if the purpose is carried out, each is guilty, whether he did an overt act or not, and this purpose extends well to the approximate and natural consequence of such purpose.

A very wide latitude is allowed in proving conspiracy, extending to everything said, everything done or written by any one of the conspirators in the execution or furtherance of the common purpose.

The conspiracy need not be proven by positive evidence, but its existence and extent are to be determined by you gentlemen from the conduct of the parties charged with the conspiracy. It may be a mere gesture or a mere nod, or it may be inferred that there was a conspiracy by a consideration of all the acts and circumstances and situations of the case at the time; provided those acts and circumstances permit a reasonable inference therefrom.

When a prima facie conspiracy is established, any acts or declarations upon the part of the co-conspirators in connection with and in furtherance of the common purpose, is proper to be considered and weighed.

That, gentlemen, is a statement of the law concerning the crime of rape. When this case was entered upon before you, the State read or stated this indictment to you. That was the State's charge.

Rights of Defendant Are Pointed Out

The defense in reply to that said he was not guilty and that plea of not guilty in law denies every material charge made or involved in this indictment against him. This same law to which I have referred guarantees to him freedom of defense and a fair, just and impartial hearing and determination as to his guilt or his innocence.

He, like the woman to whom I referred, has guaranteed to him by the Constitution of the State of Alabama and the United States that he will receive such consideration, and that law and Constitution is all pervading.

It is no respecter of persons. The most humble, the most despised, the most abandoned, the confirmed criminal, as to that matter, comes into court with that guarantee standing by him, and it enters upon the trial with him.

So solicitous is the law for an accused that it declares that he is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is shown by the evidence in the case "beyond a reasonable doubt." This presumption enters the trial with him and abides with him until his guilt is so shown.

By reason of that principle of law, the defendant is not required to do anything when he is arraigned and entered upon his trial but to put in that plea and sit down, and he can't be convicted under the law until the State has presented evidence to you that authorizes, or rather establishes, in your minds, his guilt from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt.

"Reasonable Doubt" Explained to Jury

This is a presumption, however, which may be answered, met and overcome, and it is met, answered and overcome, whenever from all the evidence offered in the trial of a case you are convinced beyond all reasonable doubt of his guilt, but it is not answered or overcome unless the evidence rises to that degree of credence.

Now in the trial of this case, as in all criminal cases, there are two main things to be considered. The first is what the law calls the corpus delicti—that is to say the body of the offense.

The body of the offense here is that this woman must have been ravished within the meaning of the definitions that I have given you. That is the offense charged.

Now that same rule of law with reference to the proof beyond a reasonable doubt [as I will explain what that means directly] applies in the determination of that question, and that is the first question you have to determine in this case.

Has there been an offense committed and the offense here charged against the peace and dignity of the State of Alabama?

So you take up all the evidence in the case to first determine whether or not that crime was committed by anybody. If you so reach the conclusion that it has been, then the next question is: Not who did it, but did this defendant do it.

That is necessary in order to connect him with the crime. If you should determine from the evidence in this case that no rape had been committed, then your duties end, and your verdict should be "not guilty."

But if you do not so conclude, then you take up the consideration of all the evidence and the legal inferences to be drawn therefrom to determine whether this defendant did it, either actually, as I have defined that to you, or did he "aid and abet" in the offense, or did he "conspire," as I have defined that to you, in the commission of the offense?

Both of these must be shown by the evidence or reasonable deductions therefrom beyond a reasonable doubt.

Suspicion Not Evidence, Judge Points Out

Gentlemen, suspicion is not evidence and it is not proof. It is not a matter proper for you to allow a lodgment in your mind for the purpose of considering the guilt or the innocence of the party. His guilt cannot be shown by a suspicion nor can his defense be bolstered up and made out by suspicion.

The law requires evidence, and that is such as the court trying the case declares to be evidence by allowing the recital of it to you.

The means of arriving at the truth of the charge has to be established by what we know as "evidence." No need of my defining that to you. We all know what that means. It doesn't require any definition.

Evidence may be oral or it may be documentary (or we call it written) or it may be both. Oral testimony, of course, is what some witness stated as to what he saw or what he heard. That i evidence, and being evidence, then you are authorized as jurors to apply your experience and your observation and your common sense to that evidence and see whether or not, not only have you the evidence to make out statements but you are authorized to take that evidence and draw reasonable conclusions therefrom.

Now, there is another classification of evidence. There is a kind of evidence that we call "direct evidence." That is where some man, as I said a while ago, appears as a witness and testifies as to what he saw and what he heard.

Then there is what we call "indirect evidence." You know it probably as "circumstantial evidence." That is more easily illustrated than it is defined. It is where the juror takes the direct evidence and applies his reasoning power, aided by his experience and observation, in determining, or trying to determine, whether or not the facts sought to be established can be drawn by the application of reason to the facts proven.

To illustrate, and for illustration only, that it may aid you on the question of circumstantial evidence.

Says Corroboration Is Not Required

The law would authorize a conviction on the testimony of Victoria Price alone, if, from that evidence, taken into consideration with all the other evidence in the case, both for the State and for the defendant, convinced you beyond a reasonable doubt that she had been ravished. The law does not require corroboration.

There may be cases in which corroboration is to be desired, and it is always permissible to show it. So the State contends, on this question of corroboration, that Victoria Price, the prosecutrix, has been corroborated by the testimony of the witness Gilley.

Now, gentlemen, corroboration means "to support, to strengthen, to aid." It does not mean that everything the witness said, that some other proof must come along before it can be corroborated, that it says the same thing and says it in the same way.

But it does mean to say, before it could be corroborated, it must aid or strengthen some material statement of the witness.

The State further contends that she is further corroborated by the alleged statement or declarations of her companion when taken off the fateful train, making complaint that they had been raped. Well, under the law, if you belive from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that such a complaint was made, the law says that that may be looked to, and that, if established, it may constitute corroboration of the witness to some extent.

The State further contends in this case that both Victoria Price and Gilley are corroborated by other evidence in the case, showing that a fight occurred on that train between Stevenson and Paint Rock.

They claim and contend the corroboration is in this way: They both testified to a fight occurring on the train between the white boys and the Negro boys, and they offered that fact as a corroboration of some part or parts of the testimony of Victoria Price and also of Gilley.

Fight On Train Cited As Corroboration

Now they further say that that fact, if it be one, is also corroborated by other witnesses who saw the scuffle, or alleged scuffle, or fight, and saw some of them jump off or be thrown off, and that blood was on their faces and on their persons.

Now that is offered in corroboration, as I said, of both Gilley and Victoria Price, but the defendant also contends that that is not to be considered as corroboration of Victoria Price as to a rape having been committed.

They say: "Yes, there was a fight on the train; but it constituted no part of, or a forerunner of the rape that then and there or afterward occurred; that it was simply a fight; that it was a fight between the white boys and the black boys and that they were put off, and that the blood that was found on them afterward was the direct result of that fight and that there was no rape in connection with it.

Well, that is a matter that you have to deal with. I can't help you on that. That is a matter of weighing evidence. That is a matter of drawing conclusions from evidence, so you will have to deal with that by weighing the evidence of each side on that question, and, of course, if that presented an explanation of the fight that satisfies your mind that it was a fight and had no connection with a rape, then, gentlemen of the jury, that presumption has been met by the defendant's evidence in the case.

Gentlemen, at this point I desire to say to you that during the progress of this trial, wherever the court sustained an objection to any question asked by either side in this case, that ended the matter.

You have grave responsibility to perform, but one of them is that you do not have any responsibility on questions of law, and when the court rules on a question and says that question shall not be answered, that ends it as far as you are concerned; and it makes no difference whether the court is right or wrong, fair or unfair, you have no right or authority to supervise and regulate the rulings of the court, and when you attempt to do it, you violate your oath and step outside of the scope of your power and authority.

Warns Jury to Ignore Unanswered Questions

It is a comment on the rulings of the court that is adverse to counsel, and is not to be considered by you. In that case you would violate your oath, and there is just common sense and reason in that.

If the case is not to be tried under the rulings and directions of the court, then, gentlemen of the jury, when the court says that a question shall not be answered, if that is to be used as a legitimate argument to speculate on what the answer would be, then the parties have got as much benefit from an adverse ruling as they would have gotten by a favorable ruling, and the whole action of the court would have been thwarted, and the evidence that the court declared to be illegal and improper would drift into the jury box to be considered by the jury in arriving at a verdict in the case.

If that is to be the law, then we have no law. And when we have no law the government fails.

Gentlemen of the jury, there are some peculiar cases or conditions in cases where the failure of one party to call a witness might be taken as something from which presumptions might arise, but that is not this case.

It doesn't make any difference who called the witness. The thing you have to consider is, if the court allows a witness to testify, is to weigh his testimony, and it doesn't make any difference from what source the witness came, from what side he came.

What you are after is the truth—the truth to be determined under the rules of the law of evidence; that evidence is admitted to you for the purpose of your consideration.

Rules Are Explained on Credibility

When a witness is brought into court and under the jurisdiction of the court during the trial, that witness is the witness of either side that desires to use him, and it doesn't affect his credibility ordinarily, whether he is used by the party that had him subpoenaed or by the other party, nor does it reflect on the guilt or innocence of the defendant whether he had him subpoenaed or didn't have him subpoenaed.

He has a legal and constitutional right to the benefit of his testimony regardless of who had him brought into court.

There is another rule of law, gentlemen, applicable to this case—and, as to that matter, all cases of this type—and that is that the party who presents a witness in the witness chair vouches for his credibility.

There of course could be exceptions to that. The law doesn't allow a man to be butchered or entrapped by his own witness misleading him off the stand and getting on the stand and giving adverse testimony against him. The law doesn't permit a thing like that and justice could not condone it, but it does say, without some other reason or some good reason, that when you place a witness on the stand, you vouch for his credibility.

Now, gentlemen, all along I have repeatedly referred to believing things beyond a reasonable doubt. That is rather a simple term, but it is like a good many simple things, it is rather hard to define. It didn't say believe it, so there is no doubt. It said a "reasonable doubt." Now, gentlemen, you can't conjure up a doubt or arbitrarily establish one—it doesn't mean that.

It means this in simple language: That when you enter the consideration of this case and dealing with any material phase of it that is necessary to make out the offense, that if a doubt arises in your minds on that point, that you find in the evidence—no where else—if that doubt is created after an examination and consideration of the evidence, that is a doubt and that is a legal doubt, but it is no more.

Former Testimony Must Be Weighed

The law says it muts be a reasonable doubt. So if a doubt of that character arises in your mind in a consideration of this case, the next sensible thing to do, and the next thing that the law requires you to do, is to examine the evidence and all of the evidence to see whether or not that doubt is a reasonable one; that is, one that addresses itself to your mind as being one that appeals to your reasoning power as being reasonable.

If it does, it is a reasonable doubt and if it is there, regardless of whatever else may be there, the defendant is entitled to the benefit of that doubt and entitled to an acquittal.

Now, gentlemen, that is about all the law there is on the case, as I see it.

There is one other thing I will talk to you about and that is about the witnesses. All I could do here is to glev you some rules of law by which you are to examine and consider the evidence from the witnesses.

Well, the first thing that suggests itself to my mind is this: That there is some testimony offered here, in sum, all of the testimoyn of witnesses on former trial of the case and in some instances the testimony of parts of the testimony of certain witnesses on the other trial.

They are offered by what we call the official record in the case; that is, a transcription of the testimony of witnesses that were examined in one or the other of the former trials of this case or in the trial of companion cases, I believe it is; Wimms, instance, is one.

That is evidence in the case for you to weigh and consider along with the other evidence in the case, just as much so as if the witness had appeared on this trial and testified to the facts there set down.

Says Imagination Must Not Enter

Now gentlemen when you come to weighing the testimony of a witness, a good many things are proper to be taken into consideration, but the things that you do take into consideration must be things found in the evidence, not supposition, nor imagination, nor arbitrary figment of your minds. Cases are tried on evidence and evidence alone.

Of course when a witness testifies, his character for truthfulness is open to assault, but the law points out the mode and method of the assault, and that is to bring his neighbors and his acquaintances into court and say, "I know this man. I know his reputation in the community where he lives for truthfulness, or his general bad character," either one.

Veracity of Witnesses Discussed by Judge

When that is done. That is a legal assault on his evidence, because it is shown. We call it his "character." but of course you couldn't show the character of a witness directly, because that is what he is, that is his mind and his heart, his desires and his aspirations and his viewpoint of his life and duties of life, but the law does the next best thing and the only thing that it can do, and that is this: That is it says: "We cannot furnish you direct evidence on character, but you are permitted to show his reputation, and when you show that, it stands for his character."

Of course, reputation is what he is reputed to be. The other is what he is, but being unable to show the one, you are authorised to show his character by showing his reptuation. That is evidence of his character. That is the method to assault witnesses for their truhtfulness, and that is the legal method prescribed by law and guaranteed to every man that comes into court to be tried.

Of course, that is not the only way to arrive at whether a witness is telling the truth or not. When a witness takes this stand, not only what he says is evidence in the case, but he himself becomes evidence. You may look at his countenance.

God Almighty's hand can be seen in his face by one who can study—that is expert enough. It is there whether you can see it or not. Sometimes it is so plain that the wayfaring man may see it, but again it may not be able to be seen by mortal man. The hand is on his brow.

You look at his conduct on the stand, as I said, and his countenance. How does he impress you by the way he looks, by the way he acts and by the way he talks?

Then, again, you are authorized, in looking at him, to apply your common sense, your observation. What sort of a story is it he is telling? Is it reasonable? Does it appeal to your sense of reason?

You have a right to look at that. Then, in weighing his testimony, is he corroborated by some one—not that somebody must come along and testify to the same facts that he does, but has some other witness—hose testimony you believe—has he corroborated him on any of the material points of his testimony.

If so, that should be used in weighing and examining his testimony. Has his testimony been impeached or contradicted, rather, is a better term, by the testimony of some other witness or witnesses?

Well, simply because somebody else swore differently doesn't establish the fact that he is wrong. You first have to determine which one of them is right—as to whether he has been successfully contradicted or not. If he has you take that in examining his testimony and arriving at its probative force.

You may look at a witness's environment—that is, as shown by the evidence in the case—his associates, his companions. Has he any bias? Well, you will have to look to the evidence to determine that. You can't guess at it. The law is not guesswork. Does the evidence show that he is biased one way or the other?

If so, you take that in weighing what he said. Has he any interest in the case? You find that from the evidence.

You have to look to the evidence to find all these things—that is, if you find them at all. They are not found if you find them any other way.

Defendant Is Declared "Interested Witness"

Now, gentlemen, because a witness has not been corroborated or even contradicted, if he be contradicted or shown to be biased that in and of itself doesn't warrant you in setting his evidence out of the case. And that is true about interest as well. You find all these things, I repeat, from the evidence.

But when it comes to the defendant, the law steps in and says that whenever a defendant takes the stand and testifies in his own behalf he is an interested witness. You don't have to look any further to see whether or not he is interested.

The law declares it. He is interested in the result of the case. He is to suffer the penalties of a verdict against him or is to reap freedom from a favorable verdict.

But, gentlemen, I repeat, that all these things, though he be the defendant or what not, does not authorize you by that alone to discredit his testimony. The law simply allows you to examine the testimony of these witnesses with that kind of light shining upon him. Although he may be biased, although he may be interested, yet if his evidence is corroborated by other evidence in the case that leads you to believe what he said about it, then, gentlemen of the jury, you cannot throw it aside, but it must receive your consideration.

This case must be tried according to law. Your object here is to find the truth—not absolute truth, because that is impossible for the human mind.

All men are liable to err. The law doesn't require that you shall be satisfied to a mathematical certainty or so satisfied that it is impossible that a mistake could be made. The rule is that you must be so satisfied that you are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt. That is all, but it is that much.

Warns Race Question Must Not Influence

Something has been said through this case in argument, about the defendant's being a Negro.

I would be ashamed of you if that is to enter into your consideration for search for truth in this case. No man is worthy to be in the jury box that would reach the guilt or innocence of a man on any such contemptible grounds.

Before the law of Alabama and before the law of this nation, men stood on equal rights, as far as the law is concerned. He is entitled to expect and receive the administration of the law in that manner and no other.

Whenever it is administered in any other way, the law has failed, and when the law fails, eventually the government will fail.

Gentlemen, go into the jury box here, take the evidence in this case. You know it is written: 'Come, let us reason together."

That cannot be better applied anywhere to my mind than in the jury room. That is what the law expects. It does not expect you to go into the jury room with some prime of your own conviction and the powers of your mentality and your cock-sure view. You are expected to go in there and reason together. You are not expected to sacrifice your own judgment, but you are expected to listen to the other man's reason.

I realize, gentlemen, I am getting on hard ground. It is human nature when we hear a thing—particularly when it is made our duty to listen and hear and reach conclusions—it is rather difficult to hear the other man's viewpoint of the same thing.

Oh, you maq look at him while he is making his statement, but the difficulty is if you don't watch, you will just be listening for the purpose as soon as he quits, of jumping afoul of his argument and trying to tear it to prieces. Don't do it that way. You don't arrive at verdict that way. Hear one another.

Instructions Are Given on Possible Verdict

Gentlemen, if after a consideration of all the evidence in this case in the trial that I have tried to instruct you—if you are satisfied therefrom beyond a reasonable doubt that this defendant is guilty, then your verdict should be one of guilty, and if it is, your verdict may assume two forms.

You may say: "We the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment, and we fix his punishment at death."

Or if the evidence doesn't justify that kind of punishment and you think he is guilty as I have charged, then it may assume another form, and that is: "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment, and we fix his punishment at so many years in the penitentiary not less than ten years and any amount above that you se fit to fix according to the evidence."

Gentlemen, if you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt and that his punishment to be death, that is to be your verdict, whatever your desires may be outside of the evidence. You fixe a verdict according to the evidence as it convinces you, as I have indicated, because that is the law and that is what you are sworn to do—to follow the law.

On the other hand, if the evidence satisfies you beyond a reasonable doubt that death should not be the penalty and still you say he is guilty, you should fix it for a term of years, as I have indicated, but you have no right to fix it in one of the forms there if, under your conscience and under the evidence, you believe from the evidence that it belongs in the other.

Take the case, gentlemen, and give it your consideration.

Opposing Counsel Hold Conference

[At this point, Mr. Leibowitz rushed up to the bench followed by Attorney General Knight and a whispered conference ensued. Judge Callahan told the jury to keep its seats.]

Then the judge said:

Gentlemen of the jury, all the way through my charge I have cautioned you and tried to impress upon you that a verdict must be the product of evidence offered on the trial.

If there isn't evidence justifying conviction, then there ought not to be any; and I have also tried to impress you that the duty rests upon the State in the first instance, to convince your minds by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt. Of course you are not limited on that question to just the State's evidence. You are authorized to look at all the evidence. Of course, if the defendant—they have offered evidence—and if you find in the defendant's evidence something that supports and corroborates the State's evidence, why that is as much required to be considered by you in determining whether the offense has been made out as if the State had offered it.

And on the other hand, if you find evidence that has been offered by the State that corroborates the defendant's theory, why he is entitled to the benefit of that. If there isn't enough evidence to warrant a conviction, then there is a lack of evidence and a lack of evidence that is necessary to make out an offense is just as much to be considered as evidence itself because you have to consider the evidence to ascertain whether or not there is a lack of evidence.

Now, gentlemen, I believe I overlooked one thing about the forms of verdict. I gave you the form of the verdict on conviction, but if after considering all the evidence in this case you are not satisfied beyond all reasonable oubt that the defendant is guilty as charged, then he ought to be acquitted and must be under the law; and the form of your verdict in that event would be:

Now, in trying to aid you about how to reason together, again here, I repeat, I didn't expect you to reach the conclusion, or what I meant by that, that you should destroy your own opinion in there and scuttle away with it. You are entitled to your opinion, that is, when it is based on evidence.

All right, gentlemen.

VARIES STORY AFTER SEEING 'TOM' KNIGHT

Tenseness in Decatur Increases Following Coast Lynching

11-29-33

By STAFF CORRESPONDENT.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 28.—Although carefully shielded by repeated objections of Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, Orville Gilley, hobo youth, admitted in court here late this afternoon on cross-examination by Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief defense counsel for Heywood Patterson, now on trial, that Mr. Knight had suplied his mother with funds. He also admitted that he had been in three conferences at the home of Victoria Price with her and Knight.

In direct examination by Mr. Knight, Gilley substantiated the story told yesterday by the Price woman about the freight car ride two years ago. Cross-examination brought out many conflicts, however. Gilley, known as "Carolina Slim" calls himself a vagabond poet. He, however was unable to name a single hotel or city where he had recited.

Circuit Court Judge W. W. Callahan, who is presiding, is pressing to end the trial tomorrow.

Depot Agent Refutes Victoria's Testimony

DECATUR Ala., Nov. 28.—Under cross-examination by Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief defense counsel in the Scottsboro case, Victoria Price in Circuit Court here today admitted having had two or three conferences with Attorney General Thomas E. Knight and Orville Gilley, hobo youth, called as a prosecution witness. Beyond denying that testimony was discussed, the witness refused to explain the nature of the conference. Gilley may be called to the witness stand today.

Luther Morris, farmer, testified he heard screams, saw fight and rape from barn fifty fet from the railroad tracks. On cross-examination he appeared unable to hear questions clearly and to see pictures offered in evidence without glasses. When defense pictures refuted distance of barn, Morris replied: "I don't understand pictures. I only understand what I saw from the barn."

W. W. Hill, depot agent at Paint Rock, where the Price woman, Ruby Bates, the nine Scottsboro boys and several white boys were taken from the train, refuted, upon cross-examination, Mrs. Price's story of her physical condition upon arrival at Paint Rock. Tom Rosseau, a member of the arresting posse, refuted his testimony in former trials by denying seeing the two women in the gondola.

Sam Mitchell, first Negro witness called by the state, turned out to be of aid to the defense when he testified that he had seen other Negroes in all parts of the train while the fight between the white and Negro boys was going on. Other witnesses called were Lee Adams and Tom Dobbins, both farmers, who testified seeing fight from distance.

The lynching of the two alleged kidnaper-slayers of Brooke Hart in California was much discussed in the corridors of the courthouse and throughout the city. Birmingham papers carrying the story of Governor Rolph's sanction of lynch law sold out quickly here last night.

New Republic

Nov. 29, 1933

THE beginning of the third trial of the Scottsboro boys has been marked by tense and tragic drama, much of it resulting from Judge Callahan's expressed opinion that three days would be sufficient for the third trial of Haywood Patterson. "We are going to make speed," he remarked, and if he meant speed in comparison with the pace of the first few days, the remainder of the hearings promises to be more like an automobile race than the trial of seven young men for a crime which most of the country doubts that they ever committed. Thus far the defense has submitted affidavits gathered by investigators who toured Morgan County, posing as salesmen; the affidavits give the names of five hundred individuals in the county who expressed themselves in favor of lynching the defendants; most of the people interviewed wanted to see the lawyers for the defense lynched, too. When the prosecution answered by proving that four of the individuals named were dead, the investigators explained that they could not ask the names of everybody with whom they talked, but had taken the names listed on the mail boxes. Judge Callahan decided that the defense had not proved the existence of prejudice, and denied the motion for a change of venue.—The defense asked that the indictments be voided on the ground that Negroes were systematically excluded from the jury rolls; the roll was produced and it was found that the names of seven Negroes were included. The defense thereupon produced a handwriting expert who testified that in his opinion, based on the location of the names on the roll, they had been added after March, 1931, and thus after the issue of exclusion had been raised; he also testified that they had probably been written in by the clerk of the jury board. Judge Callahan ruled that the roles had not been tampered with.—Subpoenas were issued for six of the seven Negroes named; Judge Callahan declared that he would not allow them to take the stand.—The court stenographer of Jackson County testified that in twenty-four years' experience he had never known a Negro to serve on a grand or petit jury; others testified to the same effect. Judge Callahan overruled the motion to quash the indictment. "We are going to make speed," he said. In his desire to make speed, he is in danger of forgetting that a judge is not an aviator or a racing driver, and that his first duty is to see that justice is done.

Dixie Cites Frameups Like Scottsboro Case

Amsterdam

Staff Writer Hears Tales of Horrors Which Never Found Way Into Newspapers

11-29-33

SOMEWHERE IN THE SOUTH, Nov. 27.—If one cannot get a true picture of the conditions which create Scottsboro cases from discussions with the majority of the South's community leaders, doctors, lawyers, teachers and ministers, one can at least get a true picture of the South itself from discussions with the common people—the workers, the small town and city residents, and the rural inhabitants in their meeting places, churches, homes, poolrooms, and [illegible].

Sharing ofttimes with their leaders an ignorance of the latest developments of the Scottsboro case, these people seldom display the lack of interest or the optimistic outlook which seems to characterize the southern intelligentsia. To them the incarceration and impending death of the nine youths in Alabama is not an isolated incident which occurs occasionally in the South. To them it is, if one is to judge from innumerable discussions, just another instance of the oppression and persecution which they suffer daily in their precarious existence here. It is not easy to get them to talk. But if you [illegible] avoid arousing their suspicions, you can hear tales which are as horrible, if not more so, than the Alabama incident which has aroused the civilized world.

Any group discussion here is almost typical. Take this one. It is Sunday night. You are in a small Tennessee town with a four-hour wait for the next bus. You seek out the nearest Negro church. The services will not start for an hour. You introduce yourself to the half dozen early arrivals merely as a native who is returning home to a neighboring town. You discuss conditions in the northern cities for a while. Eventually you remark "I haven't been in this neighborhood since they lynched those two fellows at such-and-such a town." The conversation turns to that particular incident and in a few minutes these solemn, God-fearing people are recalling incidents which will make you shiver. Incidents which never reach the newspaper.

Lynchings Follow Frameups.

Among others, you hear the tale of a white railroad foreman who went to town weekly to get the section payroll. One time he stops for a drink and a game and loses most of the company's money. Fearing discharge, he secures a local white prostitute for a witness and swears that two of the colored men working under him had held him up and robbed him. The sheriff arrests the accused pair, despite the testimony of three other Negroes that the two men had been with them all that night. When the prostitute is called to identify the men, she decides to make her story more realistic and says the pair also tried to rape her. That night the two innocent men are lynched. Two days later one of there defense witnesses is slain. The other two disappeared. Maybe they fled. Maybe they had no chance to flee. No one knows.

In a Memphis poolroom you hear this tale from the lips of the brother of a 15-year-old mob victim. The youth had been doing afternoon work for a white family while going to an Arkansas county school. The next year he was planning to go to Tuskegee. One afternoon, because his mother was very sick, he started home before he finished his work. The white woman stopped him at the gate and told him to finish his work. When he insisted upon going to attend his mother's wants, she called him an "uppitty-educated nigger" and began to his him in the face. He caught her hand. She screamed. He fled. They dragged him from his mother's side and strung him up. When the brother came home from the funeral, they wouldn't let him off the train. "I going back some day," he says quietly, and you believe him.

In another town, best left unnamed, you hear this: She was a girl with a light complexion and as such was "taboo" to the Negro men of the town. A local boy fell in love with her, however, and defied the "taboo" by marrying her. They knew they would have to leave town, and made preparations to do so.

Hate Smoulders.

While the youth was at the store buying a suit case, one of the girl's former white lovers went to the house and forced his attentions on her. The youth returned. There was a fight. The white man was cut. The boy and girl fled to his father's house. The mob burned the house down, shot each member of the family as he fled from the burning structure. The weekly white paper said nothing of the incident. No one else did. But Negroes there still remember and their eyes are not pretty when they discuss the incident.

These three stories were not the worst told in these informal discussions. There were others not so bad. But the three are typical of the scores of incidents the writer heard recalled around churches, bus stations, poolrooms, and in homes in three southern states, Kentucky, Tennessee and Arkansas. The people who told them didn't always know of the Scottsboro case. Those who did seldom expressed a belief that the boys would be freed.

With them there is no optimism. They have prayed for years with no answer. As they quietly recall these incidents, one has the impression that they will not long be content to pray. There were few expressions of what they intend to do. But with their homes and rights taken from them, their least opportunities denied, and their future apparently hopeless, it is not surprising to find that they are deserting the faith of their fathers. If ever the smouldering resentment in their eyes or the deadly hate of their voices is transferred into action, the South will find too late that it has toyed too often and too carelessly with its powder keg.

PATTERSON TRIAL BARRIERS LIFTED

Judge Overrules Defense Motions Based on Question of Negroes in Jury Duty

Montgomery, Ala.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 25 (AP)—The last obstacle to the third trial of Heywood Patterson, one of several Negro defendants in the "Scottsboro case" was cleared this afternoon as Judge W. W. Callahan overruled a motion to quash the indictment on grounds of alleged fraud and "systematic exclusion of Negroes" from the jury rolls.

The decision was handed down this afternoon by the jurist who held that there was not sufficient evidence to "presume fraud" in the entering of several Negroes' names on the rolls from which the grand jury had been drawn and that there was not conclusive testimony that Negroes were "systematically excluded."

Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief counsel retained by the International Labor Defense to defend the Negroes, entered an exception to the ruling, paving the way to take the case to the United States Supreme court again, where death sentences imposed on all the defendants on April 9, 1931, were set aside.

Leibowisk Asks More Witnesses

Leibowitz also sought to summon additional witnesses, offering six of the Negroes whose names appeared on the rolls to "prove that except for those in controversy, there are no Negro names on the roll." He also sought to call Judge A. E. Hawkins of Fort Payne, before whom the Negroes first were tried, Sheriff J. E. McBride of Jackson county and J. M. Money, probate judge of the county.

Judge Callahan denied the request, asserting that defense under the law was required to be prepared for preliminary motions when the defendants were arraigned last Monday. The judge also pointed out that Thursday he had offered to issue attachments for the witnesses who were absent but this was not accepted. Leibowitz entered exceptions.

Change of Venue Denied

Previous to the decision, the defense had called a number of witnesses who testified they had never seen a Negro serve on a jury in Jackson county and an expert on handwriting to bolster its contention of fraud.

Judge Callahan earlier this week had overruled motions for a change of venue to quash the venire drawn for the Patterson trial.

The latter motion was also based on the grounds that Negroes were systematically excluded from the jury rolls on Morgan county.

Patterson and the other six defendants are charged with attacking two white women aboard a Southern railway freight train in Jackson county, on March 25, 1931, as the two women were hoboing their way home from Chattanooga.

State Calls Orvel Gilley, Who Describes Assaults By Defendants On Trial

By T. M. DAVENPORT
Associated Press Staff Writer

DECATUR, ALA., Nov. 28.—(AP)—The defense story of the events aboard a freight train in Jackson County on March 25, 1931, tonight was being built up against the State's case against Heywood Patterson, one of seven negro defendants in the "Scottsboro Case."

Patterson, on trial for the third time in a little less than three years, late today took the stand, and, under questioning by Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief counsel retained for the negroes by the International Labor Defense, said he did not attack any woman on the train and that he did not see a woman on the train.

Judge W. W. Callahan, presiding, in an effort to speed the trials, and over defense protests of attorneys, ordered a night session.

Witness Describes Attacks

The denial came within two hours after Orvel Gilley, of Albertville, Ala., had told the jury that he saw Patterson attack Mrs. Price, and Ruby Bates, her companion, on a hobo trip from Chattanooga to their home in Huntsville. Patterson and the other defendants were convicted of the attacks in Scottsboro in 1931.

In a 30-minute direct examination, Patterson, who frequently was asked by Leibowitz to "speak up," told of boarding the train, having a "ruckus" with some white boys, and finally going over the tops of several cars to a gondola, filled with chert, accompanied by 10 or 11 other negro boys to "have it out" with the white youths, who had been "throwing rocks at us."

After the fight, in which he said five white boys jumped from the train between Stevenson and Scottsboro, Patterson said he and three companions, including Andy Wright and Roy Wright, went back to an oil tank car and rode to Paint Rock, where they were arrested.

"Did you know of any woman's being attacked on that train," Leibowitz asked.

"No, sah, if I had, I'd jumped off that train," Patterson said, shaking his head for emphasis.

Says He Saw Attacks

Gilley had testified that he remained on the car and witnessed the attacks on both Mrs. Price, who yesterday pointed to Patterson as one of six negroes who attacked her and Ruby Bates, now ill in a New York hospital.

Describing the fight to which Gilley and half a dozen other State witnesses had testified, Patterson said "after we got over there (in the gondola he had fixed as the fourth in the string from the caboose) the boys had some rocks and a piece of iron."

"I didn't see anyone put off, they jumped off," Patterson replied to a question from Leibowitz. "One white boy was hanging between the cars and some of the boys was trying to put him off. I and one of the Wright boys pulled him up."

Patterson said his group of four went back to the oil tank car and remained there until the train reached Paint Rock, where they were arrested. During the defense examination, Leibowitz asked concerning the condition of his clothes. He also said he saw two or three negroes leave the train between Stevenson and Scottsboro.

Atty. Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., took over the cross examination and, when he asked Patterson as to his testimony in the original Scottsboro case, and if he hadn't said he saw the attacks but did not participate, the defendant replied "they told me if we didn't say we done it, they would give us to the mobs. Even the national guard boys got hot against us."

Tells of Alleged Threats

Asked where these threats were made Patterson replied "In the courtroom they was saying 'send all the negroes to the electric chair. There are too many negroes anyway.'"

"The judge heard that?" Knight asked and Leibowitz repeated the question.

"I guess so, we boys heard it and he was there," Patterson replied.

Patterson denied testimony read to him from the record of the first trial over the objections of Leibowitz in which he had testified at Scottsboro in April, 1931, that he saw the attacks from the top of a box car, but did not participate. To each question and answer he replied that he didn't say it, and that it was not so, as the testimony was that he saw 11 or 12 negroes in the car.

Patterson is the first of the negroes to be retried in Morgan Circuit Court under a change of venue from Jackson County where all of them were convicted and sentenced to death on April 9, 1931. The U. S. Supreme Court set the verdicts aside and ordered new trials.

Patterson was tried here last Spring and again convicted but the death sentence was set aside by Judge James E. Morton, who presided.

Tells of Start of Trip

Gilley, on direct examination, told of boarding the train with Mrs. Price, the Bates girl, both clad in overalls, and Lester Carter, and of having moved to the gondola car where the attacks were alleged to have taken place when the train stopped at Stevenson.

Gilley said that, as the train pulled out, a group of negroes piled into the car and ordered him and the other white youths out. A fight ensued, he said and several of the white boys were thrown from the train.

After that, he said, the negroes attacked both women, and desisted when he interceded with one of them, who was armed with a pistol, to make the other stop "before they killed that woman."

His own life had been threatened if he attempted to interfere, Gilley said.

Direct examination of Gilley by Solicitor H. E. Bailey, of Boaz, who prosecuted in the original trials, lasted but 15 minutes, but cross-examination by Sameul S. Leibowitz, chief of counsel for the negroes retained by the International Labor Defense, lasted two hours and 40 minutes.

Gilley a "Wanderer"

Under Leibowitz's examination, Gilley, who appeared on the witness stand clad in a worn and unpressed blue suit, identified himself as a "wandering entertainer," who recited poetry on the street, in hotel lobbies, and other places and "took up collections."

The youth is tall, ruddy-faced, with tousled black hair and his replies to questions frequently caused ripples of laughter through the court room in which every seat was taken.

During the cross-examination, Leibowitz sought several times to get into the record events in a "hobo jungle" in Chattanooga, Tenn., in the Patterson trial last Spring. Carter, identified as the "Knoxville Kid," testified Gilley, himself, and the two women spent the night in the "jungle" before starting the trip on which the attacks are alleged to have occurred.

Gilley repeatedly denied that he lived in "hobo jungle" when on the road, and said he spent the night before he made the trip with the two women on the now-historic freight train alone in an empty box car.

Gilley was asked if he had even seen Dallas Ramsey, a Chattanooga negro, before when the negro was brought before him.

"I have," he replied, and then Liebowitz asked if it wasn't in the "hobo jungles" in Chattanooga where the witness was with Mrs. Price, Ruby Bates and Carter. A state objection was sustained.

Gilley placed the scene of the fight and attacks as the first or second of the string of eight gondola cars on cross examination, the opposite end to that where all other witnesses had testified to seeing them.

Changes Testimony

On re-direct examination, he gave the location as the seventh or eighth, saying he was confused as to which direction the engine was headed on the miniature duplicate of the train set up in the court room.

Leibowitz asked Gilley if the State had not bought him some wearing apparel.

"The State hasn't bought me any clothes," Gilley replied. "Mr. Knight (Atty. Gen. Knight) gave me $3 and I bought these shoes."

Later he said the Attorney General had been sending "a little money to his mother in Albertville while I'm away and can't help her by reciting poetry."

Gilley was unruffled throughout the cross-examination and finally under Leibowitz's pressing, talked of "hobo monikers."

Other white boys participating in the fight, he said, were known by "monikers" as "Georgia Chickens" and "Knoxville Kid."

"Wasn't one known as 'Carolina Slim?'" Leibowitz asked.

"Yes, that's me" Gilley replied.

"You mean those boys had those names," Judge Callahan asked.

"Them's monikers," Gilley said.

"I guess that's all right, but I don't get it," Judge Callanan said, shaking his head.

State Testimony Ends

Gilley was the ninth witness and the State closed without offering any medical testimony, but may do so on rebuttal.

Four State witnesses, Luther Morris, Lee Adams, Tom Dobbins, and Sam Mitchell, the latter a negro farmhand, told of seeing the train pass within two miles of Stevenson. Each witness told of seeing a fight taking place in one of the string of gondola cars on the train.

Morris said he saw one of the negroes throw three white youths from the train and that he saw two white girls on the car.

Pressed by Leibowitz to explain how he could identify the two figures on the passing train as white women, Morris said "I can certainly tell a lady when I see her."

"Was it by their long hair?" Leibowitz asked.

"No, they had bobbed heir," Morris retorted.

Dobbins and Mitchell, neither of whom testified in the previous trials, told of seeing the fight as the train passed the Dobbins farm.

"Yes, sir, I want to tell the truth," said Mitchell as Leibowitz asked him if he saw some negroes sitting in box car doors.

During the cross-examination of Morris Judge Callahan and Leibowitz clashed.

"You came here to say you saw women on the car," Leibowitz said, with emphasis to Morris.

"That's improper, Mr. Leibowitz," said Judge Callahan.

"I am," Leibowitz retorted, and as he started to address something, Judge Callahan smote the bench and said, "that's enough, or I'll do something about it."

In the afternoon session, Judge Callahan frequently interrupted the questioning of Gilley by Leibowitz to say "that's enough of that, let's go to something else."

Judge Callahan and Leibowitz joined in the laughter when the Judge interrupted the attorney's questioning of Gilley about reciting poetry to the two women in the case, saying: "That ought to be enough of that. I don't like poetry anyway."

Knight Appeals To "Passion To Protect Women" In Row With Leibowitz

BY RALPH E. HURST
The Birmingham News Staff Writer

DECATUR—With the selection of a jury to try Clarence Norris under way at nightfall Thursday, another jury deliberated the fate of Heywood Patterson, first of the Scottsboro Negroes to be tried here this week.

Patterson, who has twice before been sentenced to death, and Norris are both charged with criminally assaulting Victoria Price on a freight train in Jackson County, March 25, 1931.

The fate of Patterson was placed in the jury's hands at 3 p.m. after a charge of one and a half hours by Judge Callahan, who immediately began qualifying the venire for Norris's trial.

Thursday morning's session had been devoted to closing arguments, featured by a clash between Atty. Gen. Knight and Defense Attorney Lebibowitz, which resulted in a defense motion for a mistrial with Judge Callahan denying it.

"You cannot avenge what has happened to Victoria Price," Knight said. "That is over, but you can prevent this terrible thing happening to other women."

Leibowitz objected on the contention that this was an appeal to passion and prejudice.

"If that is appealing to passion then I am appealing to passion to protect the womanhood of Alabama," Knight retorted, and concluded with a demand for the death penalty. At 10:30 a.m., the trial was recessed until 1:30 p.m., when Judge Callahan began his charge to the jury.

In his charge to the jury Judge Callahan said that "no man is worthy to sit in a juror's chair" who would be influenced one way or another by the fact that the defendant is a Negro.

Evidence in Patterson's trial, which got under way late Monday, was closed with the defense failing to get in the testimony of Ruby Bates repudiating the attacks. The defense may, however, present it in future trials.

Attorneys for Patterson sought to obtain a delay of proceedings until Thursday, when they were to receive the girl's testimony in writing, but the court overruled this as it did a physician's affidavit that she was too ill to testify.

After the defense had used all its available witnesses the prosecution called Maj. Joe Starnes in rebuttal to tell of an alleged confession made at the original trials in Scottsboro. Judge Callahan sent the jury out of the room during the rectial of Maj. Starnes, who commanded national guardsmen at the trials, and then refused to permit his story in evidence.

The officer testified that in the presence of himself, Capt. C. C. Whitehead and William Harris, a Chattanooga Times reporter, in the Scottsboro jail Roy Wright, one of the defendants, declared that Charlie Weems was the first to assault the girls and that Patterson also attacked them. Patterson, in turn, admitted it and accused Wright, according to Maj. Starnes.

All material evidence of the prosecution came from Mrs. Price and Orvel Gilley, who was in the gondola car when the attacks were alleged to have taken place. Gilley, surprise star witness for the state, was missing when Patterson was tried here last April.

Tell Same Story

Mrs. Price and Gilley told substantially the same stories, each taking 15 minutes to describe the assaults in direct testimony but being subjected to lengthy and rigorous cross examinations.

Both identified Patterson as one of the attackers, and Gilley said the defendant attacked both girls. The assaults, both said, followed a general fight in which the defendants threw six white boys off the car, leaving only Gilley and the girls aboard. Gilley said there were nine Negroes and Mrs. Price estimated them at 12.

Gilley was the last of the nine state witnesses to testify. He described himself as a "reciter of poetry in hotel lobbies" and said he also "made it up." Cross-examination attempted to establish him as "a hobo or tramp."

Other state witnesses were confined to men who said they saw the white boys and Negroes fighting in a car with two girls as the train moved from Stevenson toward Paint Rock, and to Paint Rock residents who described the train's arrival and arrest of the defendants.

In reply, the defense presented Patterson and four other defendants to deny that they had even seen any women aboard the train. These defendants were Willie Roberson, Ozie Powell, Olen Montgomery and Andy Wright.

Others For Defense

Other defense witnesses were called to attack credibility of prosecution evidence, but this was handicapped when Judge Callahan refused to permit questions reflecting on Mrs. Price's character and about the movements of her and Ruby Bates prior to boarding the train in Chattanooga.

Lester Carter, alias the "Knoxville Kid," told in quaint hobo jargon of events that began developing as he played his harmonica while riding on the freight train with the girls. Called by the defense, he told only of what took place between the time the journey was started and the fight with the Negroes, he being one of those that were thrown or jumped from the train.

Arguments, limited to two hours on each side, got under way at midafternoon and would have been completed except that at 6 p.m. Judge Callahan altered his decision on a night session and recessed until 8:30 a.m. Thursday because the jury was tired.

Solicitor Wade Wright, of Decatur, opened arguments for the state and asked for a fair verdict on the evidence, asserting that the evidence had shown conspiracy. He credited God with having placed witnesses along the railroad tracks to see the fight as the train went by and declared the strongest defense proposition is the "point blank denial of Patterson."

After 30 minutes, Solicitor Bailey, of Boaz, the original prosecutor, took up the arguments and asked the jurors to prescribe the electric chair if they believed the stories of Mrs. Price and Orvel Gilley.

Leibowitz Speaks

Opening for the defense, Leibowitz questioned what kind of a woman it is that would twice marry and neither time assume the name of her husband. He attacked the character and credibility of Mrs. Price and said Bailey had insulted the jurors by telling them that "those tramps had gone to Chattanooga looking for work."

The state has not proved beyond a reasonable doubt that there was assault, Leibowitz asserted. He often addressed his remarks directly to one individual member of the jury, Edward Nelson.

"Ask yourself the question of whether those two hoboes would have carried their girls down to another car to share them with the other tramps," he told the jury. "It isn't often that hoboes can get women to lay around in cars with them. When they can they will not want to share them with others. Ask yourself that question and answer it and when you have done that you will have just about solved this case."

Leibowitz declared that the testimony of Dr. R. R. Bridges "gave the lie to Victoria's story," and he reviewed the evidence in which the girl had declared she had been cut on the face but the examining physician had found no abrasions.

He told the jury it must take the word of the doctor "or the female tramp," and asked why the state did not call Bridges as it had done before.

Praises Prosecutors

"If there were evidence of rape it would have been on her clothes and they would have preserved them," he said, paying a tribute to the prosecutors individually and declaring they were shrewd enough not to overlook any proof.

"Tell me why it was there was not a single mark of violence on her person," he shouted. "Who makes accusations quicker than a lewd woman?"

He then attacked the logic of the Negroes keeping Gilley on the car to witness the alleged attacks and said that a train crew could hear signal torpedoes explode on the track and would have been able to hear any pistol shots.

Judge Callahan, he said, has conducted the case in a manner that is a credit "to himself, the State of Alabama and the entire nation. . . . He's done a wonderful job in this courtroom under very trying circumstances."

"Do justice. If this Negro is a rapist—hand it to him, if they've show this beyond a reasonable doubt. If you have a reasonable doubt, stand your ground like a man," he said. "Bring in a verdict of not guilty so that justice will be done between the State of Alabama on the one hand and the defendant, Heywood Patterson, on the other."

Leibowitz used all but 30 minutes of defense time which, with the one hour left for Atty. Gen. Knight to close, was carried over until 8:30 a.m. Thursday.

Chamlee told the jury that rape was the easiest charge to make, but is hard to prove and still harder to disprove. He reviewed evidence of the alleged confession at Scottsboro and said a clever lawyer could make a Negro admit anything.

"Sometimes a witness will say yes when he means no, and no when he means yes," he said.

Atty. Gen. Knight renewed demands for a death penalty but said if there is a reasonable doubt, to give the defendant the benefit of it.

"But if there is no doubt give a verdict that will say to others, not these defendants, but to others, that they cannot lay hands on a woman. . . . They are interested in your verdict in California and Canada and elsewhere," he said.

"There is no middle ground in this case; there should be either an acquittal or a death verdict," the attorney general declared. "And the verdict should be without regard to what others may think."

In opening his charge, Judge Callahan gave the legal definition of rape. Where the female is not an imbecile or unconscious, there must be a show of force, he said, and consent or acquiescence obtained through force, duress or fear is no defense. While the law clothes a woman with the right to kill her assailant, it does not compel her to do so and her failure to do so is not a mitigation of the crime. The defense here, he said, is that the defendant did not act with or without consent. A prostitute is entitled to the same legal protection as the spotless daughter of a high family, he said.

There is a point of law here that involves aiding and abetting and the degree of guilt is the same, the jurist instructed. The mere presence of a person while the crime is going on, who is there to encourage or aid the other party, constitutes guilt "even if he never moves a muscle," he declared.

Conspiracy

There is another point—that of conspiracy—and guilt of that is the same as guilt of actually comitting the crime. It may be a mere gesture, or a mere nod, the judge told the 12 men.

"This same law," Judge Callahan said, "gives the defendant the right to a fair and impartial trial and the most humble, the most despised, the most hardened criminal, comes into court with this guarantee . . . He cannot be convicted under the law until the state establishes his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

"Two main points are to be considered," he said, "and the first is whether there has been an offense as charged. You first take up the evidence to see whether the crime was actually committed.

"The next point, if you find there has been a crime committed is to determine not who did it but whether this defendant did it, or abetted, or conspired in it."

Judge Callahan warned the jury against supervising his rulings and conduct of the case, saying there must be no consideration except of evidence he has admitted. Neither does it matter who calls a witness, they can be used by either side, he said.

Credibility of witnesses was also discussed. The jurist said testimony read from previous trials must be considered.

Instructions as to how to render the verdict were given by the judge who said they could acquit or fix a penalty of 10 years or more or death.

Suspicion is not evidence and cannot establish guilt, he said.

There are two outstanding witnesses that Victoria Price was raped, he said. The testimony of Victoria Price has been corroborated by the witness Orvel Gilley. Her statement is further strengthened by testimony that her companion, Ruby Bates, on getting off the train at Paint Rock complained of being wronged. Testimony to seeing the fights is also corroborative of parts of the stories told by Victoria Price and Gilley.

"But the defendant says that is not to be considered as corroborative of their testimony of rape—the defendant says there was a fight," he continued.

There were no special charges and the jury went out. Qualifying of the venire for Norris' trial was started immediately.

Commenting on his rulings, which differed so vastly from those of Judge Horton last April, Judge Callahan told newspaper men he wanted it understood he was not being antagonistic to Judge Horton, but that circumstances were different in the presentation of witnesses and that he believed Judge Horton would rule as he was doing under these circumstances.

The manner in which Judge Callahan has presided might be described as "vigorous." He has ruled his court with stern and sharp words and permitted no bickering among attorneys.

Daily Worker 11-27-33

The Scottsboro legal defense is in danger unless funds are sent to Decatur immediately.

That was the message received yesterday by the International Labor Defense from Joseph Brodsky, chief counsel of the organization, in Decatur.

The rushing through of the trials by Judge Callahan means that all funds must be raised without the slightest delay, the message stated.

The International Labor Defense, all its immediate resources drained by the huge expenditures of the Scottsboro defense, must be immediately supported. Every dollar counts. Every day's delay endangers the lives of the Scottsboro boys.

Send in every penny you can, raise every dollar TODAY and continue the fight for Scottsboro funds. Show your working class solidarity.

Minor Urges Solidarity of Negro and White to Save Boys

NEW YORK.—Thousands of New York Negro and white workers marched Saturday in Harlem to protest against the massacre of the nine innocent Scottsboro boys by Southern lynch justice. Thousands more cheered from the sidewalks.

Massed at six concentration points, the workers marched from 118th St. and Lenox Ave., to 137th St. and 7th Ave., then returning to the meeting place at 131st Street and Lenox Ave.

Immediately following the I. W. O. band which led the parade was a line of girls each bearing one letter of the message, "STOP LYNCHING" A float depicting Gov. Ritchie of Maryland hung in effigy with the inscription, "We shall not forget him as the murderer of Euel Lee." There were placards stating "Mass Protest Will Save the Ecottsboro Boys," "Full Social and Political Rights for the Negro."

The crowd were so large that two meetings were necessary to enable all to hear the speakers though they spoke throuh amplifiers.

Robert Minor received a tremendous ovation, redoubled when he declared that "The Scottsboro boys are the symbol of Negro oppression," and that it was time to "meet the lynchers with well organized defence corps." Charles Krumbein, District Organizer of the Communist Party, declared that "It is the task of the Communist Party to lead in the struggle for Negro liberation."

Among the other speakers present were William Patterson of the International Labor Defense, Leonard Patterson of the Young Communist League, Richard Moore and Fitzgerald of the League of Struggle for Negro Rights and Sam Stein of the I. L. D.

When Robert Minor raised his hand and called for a pledge to fight for the cause of the Scottsboro boys every hand in the audience flashed up in answer.

Death Sentence Is Given To Scottsboro Negro In Assault Case

12-2-33
Birmingham, Ala.

DECATUR—A verdict of guilty with death was pronounced for the third time for Heywood Patterson by a Morgan County jury at 5:10 p.m. Friday after being out 26 hours. The defendant was apparently unmoved. Notice of motion for a new trial was given.

Another futile defense attempt to move the Scottsboro cases to some other county for trial was made late Friday as a jury continued deliberating the fate of Patterson, first of the defendants to be tried here.

The defense change of venue motion was entered at 3:30 p.m. after the court had failed to obtain the legal minimum of 30 veniremen from which to pick a jury for trial of Clarence Norris.

The venire had been reduced to 24 late Thursday through dismissals for fixed opinions and opposition to capital punishment. The court went through the procedure of subpoenaing two veniremen for each one short.

As these separate groups came up the preponderance of fixed opinions increased and the defense venue change motion, indicated since morning by tactics of defense lawyers, was entered with impossibility of a fair trial alleged.

In denying it, Judge Callahan said he thought the fact that the veniremen were honest enough to admit they had fixed opinions was in itself proof that an impartial trial could be had.

A defense motion for a venue change was denied at the opening of preliminaries last week.

A venire for the Norris jury was finally completed at 4:30 p.m. and the way cleared to strike it down to 12 and open the evidence Saturday.

The Patterson jury had been out 22 hours when court was resumed at 1 p.m., and the Norris venire was still three men short.

Defense attorneys were making much over the fixed opinions which they made certain would show in the record, indicating a renewal of their contention that the defendants cannot get a fair trial here. The point can be employed in appeal or another change of venue motion.

Both Patterson and Norris are charged with criminally assaulting Victoria Price on a freight train in Jackson County March 25, 1931.

In qualifying veniremen, Leibowitz asked them if they had read newspaper accounts "of what they claim" has happened here. He asked them specifically if they had read The Birmingham News and The Age-Herald or the Huntsville papers.

Although there has been a judicial ban against the corps of photographers already here, news reel cameramen and others were still arriving, rushed here following news developments in other states. Some were detached from presidential assignments at Warm Springs and sent here by airplane.

With the delay in getting the second jury, it became certain that the Norris trial would extend into next week, probably through Tuesday.

At 11 a.m. the court had still not found 30 veniremen who could qualify for the Norris jury.

Jury Told To Rest

The jury in Patterson's case had begun deliberations at 3 p.m. and at 6 p.m. Judge Callahan sent them to their hotel with instructions to rest and not discuss the case further until Friday morning.

After Patterson's case had gone to one jury, qualifying a venire for the Clarence Norris jury was started. After 22 had been dismissed for having fixed opinions and 19 for opposition to capital punishment, the venire was left with only 24 members or six less than the minimum required by law. This necessitated the drawing of 12 more names and forestalled a night session. The names were drawn and officers sent out during the night with subpoenas.

Sentenced In 1931

Patterson received his first death sentence April 9, 1931, three days after a Jackson County jury found him guilty at Scottsboro. On a reversal by the United States Supreme Court, and a change of venue, his case came up as the opening of the Scottsboro trials here last Spring.

The second death verdict for him was handed down by the Morgan County jury on Palm Sunday morning, April 9, 1933. Shortly thereafter Judge Horton, who presided, set it aside on the grounds that the state had not presented sufficient evidence.

Whereas the trial here last April occupied an entire week, Patterson's case was disposed of this time in less than four days with Judge Callahan pushing proceedings to the utmost.

A written statement of evidence from Ruby Bates, taken in New York where she is reported seriously ill in a hospital, was received by Judge Callahan Thursday but did not get before the Patterson jury.

The defense had sought a delay for its arrival so they could present it, but Judge Callahan refused to halt proceedings and the defense case was drawn without it. It will be in order for the trial of Norris and the other defendants, here, however.

Ruby Bates, missing from her Huntsville home several weeks, made a surprise appearance for the state here last April and repudiated her charges of attack, declaring the testimony she gave at Scottsboro was false.

ALLOWS PLEA TO 'PASSION'

Jurors Deliberate Three Hours Without Reaching Verdict, Then Retires for Night.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 30.—Unable to reach a verdict in the first three hours of their deliberations, a Morgan County jury which is weighing the fate of Heywood Patterson was told by Judge W. W. Callahan at 6 o'clock this evening to give it up for the night and try again tomorrow.

In their ears when they retired there must have lingered the final words of the charge of the rustic jurist, who after drawing the color line once more across the famous Scottsboro case, forgot to tell the jurors how they might acquit the defendant until defense counsel called the omission to his attention.

They must have carried with them into the jury room the impassioned plea of Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., to send Patterson to the electric chair, not to avenge Victoria Price but to stop attacks upon white women by Negro marauders.

Prosecutor's "Appeal to Passion."

The Attorney General, his eyes bulging, his voice trembling with emotion, whirled on his feet when Mr. Leibowitz protested that his words were "an appeal to passion," and said:

"It certainly is. It is an appeal to passion."

Mr. Leibowitz then asked the court to declare a mistrial and the hostile hillsmen who crowded the second-floor room, chuckled their delight and slapped each other on the back as Judge Callahan denied the motion and Mr. Knight continued.

"We all have a passion, and that is a passion for protecting the womanhood of the State of Alabama and, when we do protect the womanhood of the State, it doesn't lie in the mouth of any man to tell you what's best for your Commonwealth," he said.

"If you believe this defendant raped Victoria Price, be men enough to return such a verdict as you know and I know will be a deterrent to others."

Judge Stresses Protection.

Something of the same idea crept into Judge Callahan's charge when he instructed the jury that when the complaining witness in a case of criminal attack is a white woman "there is a very strong presumption that she did not yield voluntarily" to a Negro.

It mattered not, he said, whether the complainant was "the most despised, ignorant and abandoned woman of the community or the spotless virgin and daughter of a prominent home of luxury and learning."

"It is the glory of the law of this State and of the States of this Union that its protecting wings encompass all womankind," he added.

Then at the end of his charge, which took an hour and a half to deliver, Judge Callahan instructed the jurors on the form of the verdict they might return on two degrees of guilt. Explaining that the penalti[illegible] death or from ten years [illegible] life imprisonment. He was about to send the jury out when Mr. Leibowitz and Mr. Knight held a whispered conversation with him. It was then that Judge Callahan admitted that he had overlooked

SCOTTSBORO NEGRO AGAIN CONDEMNED

Third Alabama Jury, Out 25 Hours, Convicts Patterson and Fixes Death Penalty.

New York

BRIEF DRAMATIC SCENE

None Looks at Youth, Bitter Under Blow—Case Ready for Highest Tribunal.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., Dec. 1.—Another Alabama jury found Heywood Patterson guilty today and condemned him to death. The third trial of this 20-year-old Negro defendant in the Scottsboro case ended as had his first and second.

The twelve white men who sat in judgment on him had chosen to take the word of Victoria Price that he had ravished her against his own sworn denial of the charge and all the evidence the defense could muster to support it.

"We'll do our talking before the Supreme Court of the United States," said Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief defense counsel, when he was asked for comment on the finding of the jury which devoted eleven and a half hours debating what punishment should be meted out to a defendant who all agreed was guilty on the first ballot.

Record for Appeal Prepared.

Anticipating a verdict of guilty, Mr. Leibowitz, a New York criminal lawyer retained by the International Labor Defense, has been busy in the past two weeks building up a record on which to appeal to the higher courts once more.

That record contains a general exception to Circuit Judge W. W. Callahan's charge to the jury, motions for mistrials based on allegedly prejudicial statements from the bench and by Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., and a host of exceptions to rulings of the judge excluding what Mr. Leibowitz contends were vital parts of the evidence.

It contains also uncontested proof that a fair trial of the seven Negroes recently rearraigned is impossible in Morgan County and evidence of illegal and systematic exclusion of members of the colored race from jury service—evidence which Judge Callahan held insufficient.

The jury reached its verdict at 5 P. M., just as a new panel of twelve was being sworn to render a true verdict in the case of Clarence Norris, another one of the nine Negroes indicted at Scottsboro nearly three years ago for a criminal attack upon Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, hoboing on a Southern Railway freight train.

Such difficulty had been found in selecting twelve men without fixed opinions that Mr. Leibowitz renewed his motion for a change of venue on the ground that it had been "affirmatively proved" before the court today that a fair trial was impossible in this county, which received the cases from Jackson County because feeling was so bitter there.

Judge Callahan denied the motion, saying:

"The very fact that the jurors have been honest enough to state that they had fixed opinions indicates to me that the defendant can get a fair trial when a jury finally is picked."

Patterson Brought in Manacled.

The Patterson jury, which retired at 3 P. M. yesterday, signaled its readiness to report by a single resounding knock upon the brown wooden door which separates the court room from the small, bare chamber in which they reached the conclusion that Alabama justice demanded the life of Patterson.

A deputy sheriff was sent hurrying across the lawn to the jail to fetch Patterson while Judge Callahan went about the business of swearing in the new jury and cautioning them against discussing the case or reading about it in the newspapers. This took about ten minutes.

His wrists manacled together, Patterson, a six-foot Negro with the physique of a football tackle, strode down the aisle of the court room between two deputy sheriffs and sat down beside Norris before the newly selected jury had been escorted out.

When the last of these had passed through the doorway, Judge Callahan signaled a bailiff to open the door of the jury room. Then the jurors, filed out behind John Russell, their foreman, who held Patterson's fate scrawled in pencil on a piece of paper.

The faces of the twelve were grim. Patterson scanned each one and a ghost of a smile appeared upon his face, but in that smile there was neither happiness nor hope.

Rendering of the Verdict.

Then the twelve lined up before a bench, and there was dead silence.

The rough hillsmen who filled the court leaned forward expectantly, but with little uncertainty about the outcome. In the corridors and on the lawn where they gathered in little groups throughout the day of waiting they had predicted exactly what was about to happen.

"Gentlemen," asked Judge Callahan, "have you agreed upon a verdict?"

"We have," said Mr. Russell.

The words came in a whisper. The muscles in Patterson's neck grew taut.

Mr. Russell stepped forward and handed the slip of note paper which he had been clutching in his right hand to John Green, the court clerk. clerk.

It took Mr. Green almost a minute to flatten out the paper, which was moist and crumpled. He then read the fateful words:

"We find the defendant guilty as charged in the indictment and fix his punishment at death."

The whisp of a smile that had lingered on Patterson's lips almost like a smile in death changed to a malevolent leer as his angry eyes swept from the jury to the judge and back again. Once his big body twitched and his right arm came up. He was like a caged animal about to lunge at a keeper who had mistreated him.

"That ends your services here for this ter mof court," Judge Callahan told the jurors. "Thank you for your services and stop at the clerk's office on your way out for your certificates."

Patterson was sneering openly now at the judge and at the twelve men who had decreed that his life must be forfeited to the State. He had not risen from his chair behind the table at which his lawyers sat. Nobody had told him to. Scarcely any one had even looked his way.

Eight of the jurors walked past the chair in which he sat without turning their eyes upon him. Four others started to leave the court room that way, but changed their minds and too kthe long way out. Norris, who has seen two juries chosen but has heard only one condemn his to death, looked after the departing jurors like a man in a dream.

udge Defers Sentencing.

The verdict of the jury left Judge Callahan no alternative but to pronounce a sentence of death upon Patterson, who has been saved from the electric chair once by the United States Supreme Court and once by Judge James E. Horton, who presided at his last trial here in April.

"I make it a rule," said Judge Callahan, "never to sentence a man if I can help it on the day the jury brings in a verdict. I don't believe in yanking him around. I will fix a day for sentence, however, before you leave, Mr. Leibowitz."

The court the ninformed Mr. Leibowitz that he had thirty days in which to file a motion for a new trial. A request that the defense be given thirty days from the date when the transcript of the testimony taken at the trial is delivered, was denied.

In all, only fifteen minutes had elapsed since the knock on the jury room door resounded through the court room. The moment of drama was over and the spectators began to file out, stopping in the aisle and on the stairways to discuss it as men sometimes chat among themselves as they leave a lecture hall.

Similarity of Two Juries.

All the jurors chosen to try Norris were farmers except three—a carpenter, an oil salesman and a railroad employe. As they took their places in the jury box there was little about them to distinguish them from the jury which had occupied those seats from last Monday until yesterday afternoon.

All were in the neighborhood of middle age. Most of them were thing" he proceeded to instruct the jury that if they were not satisfied "beyond a reasonable doubt that Patterson was guilty as charged," he should be acquitted, in which case the foreman should report:

Selecting the Next Jury.

The moment the door closed on the twelve grim-faced jurors, Clarence Norris, another of the seven Scottsboro Negroes to be tried at this term, was brought to the courtroom from the adjoining jail and a new venire of 100 men filed into occupy the seats which had been reserved for them.

Within three hours all but twenty-four had been excused for one cause or another. Since the law requires that at least thirty talesmen shall be on hand when the peremptory "striking begins," it became impossible to select a jury to try Norris tonight.

It was the first time in fifteen years that such a thing has happened in this county. Sheriff Bud Davis was instructed to have twelve more venire men in court at 8:30 tomorrow morning, when court will reconvene.

It was a dramatic and colorful day which marked the submission of Patterson's case to the third jury to consider it. All of Decatur's citizenry, except those connected with the case, were enjoying the Thanksgiving holiday.

The cheers of the exultant students of the local high school, celebrating their thirtieth consecutive football victory, were wafted through the open windows while Judge Callahan was delivering his charge.

Even Judge Callahan, who has been holding court from 8:30 in the morning until nearly 10 at night in his determination to settle the case of Patterson in the space of three days, made a slight concession to the occasion. At the conclusion of the summation of the Attorney General, who under the law has the last word in criminal cases, Judge Callahan said:

"It is proper that we now pause and go to our firesides in proper recognition and gratitude for the favor of that All-Wise Being Who has been with us through these trying years."

This was at 10:30 A. M. Promptly at 1:30 he was back upon his high bench, the defendant was in his chair between two deputies and the court room was filled with unshaven farmers in overalls, except for the 100 vacant seats reserved for the venire for the trial of Norris.

At their counsel table Mr. Leibowitz, Joseph R. Brodsky and C. W. Chamlee, the lawyers retained for the Negroes by the International Labor Defense, sat stiffly with faces set and drawn. Facing them were the attorneys for the State, Mr. Knight, his assistant, Thomas S. Lawson; Wade Wright, Circuit Solicitor of Morgan County, and H. G. Bailey, who prosecuted the Negroes at Scottsboro. They were the embodiment of confidence.

Before he began reading his charge, Judge Callahan nodded and smiled at Mrs. Leibowitz, a modish figure in a smart gray ensemble seated just inside the railed enclosure before the bench. She returned the smile and the judge began explaining the law which in his opinion applied to the case.

Charge Disheartens Patterson.

As the judge began to speak, Patterson leaned forward in his chair intently. As one after another loophole was closed to him by the court's interpretation of the law, he sat back, slumping lower and lower in his seat, the picture of dejection.

The cold stenographic report of the charge does not convey the full force of its blow to the defense. Time after time the judge changed the intonation of his voice significantly and several times he glared in what seemed an unfriendly fashion at the defense counsel table while explaining to the jury that inference and innuendo were not evidence.

Defining the crime charged, Judge Callahan declared that it was not necessary to prove that the complainant resisted the advances of an assailant or that any but mental force was used. Nor was it necessary that the charge of the prosecutrix be corroborated so long as the circumstances bore out her story.

The judge said it was enough to show that the accused "aided and abetted" in the commission of the crime, even though he was not an actual participant.

He dwelt at length upon the fact that Patterson, with his life in jeopardy for the third time, was "an interested witness" under the law when he repudiated before this jury damaging statements he had made in his first trial in Scottsboro nearly three years ago.

Stern on Excluded Evidence.

Warning the jurors that they must not be influenced by rulings of the court sustaining objections from counsel for either side, he glared at Mr. Leibowitz and his voice rang out as he asserted that it was his function to decide what was proper and improper evidence.

He said that if questions which had been barred from the record were to be used as "legitimate argument to speculate on what the answer would be, then the parties have got as much benefit from an adverse ruling as they would have gotten from a favorable ruling."

Thus, he argued, the whole action of the court would be thwarted and illegal evidence would drift into the jury box and under such circumstances there would be no low and, when law fails, "the government fails."

Mr. Leibowitz returned the judge's stare unflinchingly. Since the trial opened he has been trying unsuccessfully to establish on the record that Victoria Price, Ruby Bates, Lester Carter and Orville Gilley spent the night before the alleged attack on a Southern Railway freight train in a hobo jungle near Chattanooga under unconventional circumstances.

Their behavior, he contended in summing up his case, might contain the explanation of the condition in which doctors who examined them found the girls after a posse took them off the train.

The judge turned once more toward Mr. Liebowitz and fixed him with a glassy eye as he declared that the proper way to discredit a witness was to call character witnesses, qualified to tell of his reputation in his own community.

Mr. Liebowitz had made much in his summation of the fact that the State had left it to the defense at this trial to place upon the stand Dr. R. R. Bridges, the Scottsboro physician who examined the girls immediately after the capture of the Negroes and who testified for the State at Patterson's two previous trials. It was no concern of the jury, said the judge, for which side a witness testified.

Before he completed his charge, Judge Callahan cautioned the jurors not to allow the fact that the defendant was a Negro influence them in finding their verdict.

No man who based his verdict on "such contemptible grounds," he said, was worthy to be in the jury box.

dressed, in the style of the community, in overalls or in coats and trousers that did not match. One was wearing riding breeches and rawhide boots. Scarcely a man among them wore a necktie and some had the collars of their flannel shirts open at the throat.

The new jurors were:

WILLIAM L. CARPENTER, a carpenter.
GEORGE H. DINSMORE, a farmer.
PHIL HUMPHREY, a farmer.
GEORGE B. KELLEY, a farmer.

WALTER H. TODD, an employe of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad.

Great difficulty had been experienced in obtaining the second jury. The original venire of 100 talesmen had yielded only twenty-four men qualified to serve, whereas thirty are required by law before the start of peremptory challenging. Nothing like that had happened here for fifteen years.

Times

Combing County for Talesmen.

As Judge Callahan construed the law, he was allowed to summon only twice the number of veniremen needed to make up the minimum. First he drew twelve names and sent deputies scurrying about the countryside to bring them to court. Then, when one more qualified juror was found, he sent out for ten more citizens of the county.

So it went through the day, with long intermissions while the deputies ran their quarry to earth. It was dark by the time the thirty were lined up for the inspection of Mr. Leibowitz.

A few of those who were excused for cause went out of the jury box because of secruples against the infliction of capital punishment. Fully 50 per cent were disqualified because of fixed opinions which they said would make it impossible for them to render a verdict on the evidence. Some stated, before they could be stopped, that they were sure the defendant was guilty.

The verdict of the jury which found Patterson guilty and condemned him to death in accordance with the law which leaves the punishment to the jury, relieved some of the tension which has pervaded the atmosphere here for the past fortnight.

This afternoon, however, Mrs. Leibowitz, who is staying with her husband at Cornelian Court, received two letters, probably the product of cranks, threatening to "get her" unless Mr. Leibowitz dropped the case. Mr. Leibowitz is escorted everywhere by two local deputy sheriffs and Harold Fox of the Brooklyn Homicide Squad, who is "visiting" here.

Defense Smashes Thru Perjuries of the Prosecution

Charge Is Whitewsh of State Witness, Victoria Price

By JOHN L. SPIVAK

(Special Correspondent of Daily Worker)

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 30.—With a pious word of thankfulness, "You have the blessings that the Almighty God gave us," Circuit Judge W. W. ("Speed") Callahan at 3:02 p.m. sent the jury to deliberate the fate of Heywood Patterson, who has been rushed through his third trial for life in the Morgan County Court House here.

Two minutes after the jury had been locked up, Callahan ordered International L[illegible] yers to begin picking jurors for the trial of Clarence Norris, second of the Scottsboro boys.

Callahan is determined to end the Norris' trial by Saturday night.

Judge's Charge

Callahan began his hour-and-a-half charge to the jury in a cold, hard voice that rang loudly through the silenced court room. No one was allowed in while he talked. Only messenger boys rushing with newspaper copy were permitted to enter the room.

At the end of his charge he told the jury to go into the room and deliberate, without having mentioned a single word about acquittal. Both Leibowitz and Knight rushed to the bench and whispered to him, whereby he stared in surprise at them and resumed charging the jury, addinges casually that if in the event that the evidence does not substantiate the charges, it was their duty to acquit.

Just before he concluded he gave the jury a strong hint that it could find Patterson guilty and give him a penitentiary sentence of from ten years to life.

Callahan read the charge from a prepared paper. The whole charge was filled with legal phraseology, which it is very doubtful, the jury of farmers could understand. He then ordered them to retire to the jury room, which is the room used by the defense for its witnesses. It was 3:02 p. m.

The court stressed in its charge that "if fear of force were present, rape is established, even though the woman did not fight for her honor or her life."

"The attitude of the defendant's social and racial defenses should be weighed by you," he cautioned. "Even if Victoria Prive made no effort to resist and penetration occurred, it is rape. It doesn't matter if she consented."

"The law says," he added, "That when the woman is a white woman, it is a strong presumption that she did not yield voluntarily to a Negro. It holds true no matter how despised the woman may be.

It is also a principle of law involved that any person that advises or encourages in the violation of the law is just as guilty as the person who actually violates the law. The punishment is the same.

"The evidence of Victoria Price is enough if you think it is corroborated by Orville Gilley."

Attorney-General Knight grinned and looked very pleased.

(Callahan said nothing about his refusal to adjourn the court in order to get Ruby Bates' prerogatories, which arrived this morning at 9).

The court then stressed that the State's failure to call certain witnesses must not be considered. "All you have to consider is what the witnesses who appeared here before you testified."

"You sheuld look at the witnesses' countenance. God almighty has put them there and it is there if you are expert enough to look for it. Look at the witnesses' conduct on the stand. How does he look, act, by the way he talks? How he uses his common sense? What sort of a story does [illegible] You have the right to [illegible] and weigh it."

"No finger can [illegible] at a woman's erring [illegible] of her future in denying her protection [illegible] the law," the judge said.

Judge Callahan declared:

"The strong presumption under the law is [illegible] this case did not [illegible] would [illegible] yield to the Negro defendant," the judge said. "Aiding in the [illegible] is serious and punishable as the attack itself. The conspiracy is as punishable and each conspirator of the attack is guilty whether or not he was one to actually accomplish the act.

"The existence of a conspiracy must be determined by you jurors from the party's conduct. The defendant must be shown guilty beyond a reasonable doubt.

"Two main things to be considered are that the woman must have been attacked within the definitions given in order to determine first if the crime was committed and if so, then the question is whether this defendant actually aided and abetted or conspired in the attack.

"This is a suit not of Victoria Price against Patterson and other parties but of the State of Alabama against Patterson and parties. You have only Patterson to consider and it doesn't matter what happens to the others.

"The offense is complete when the woman is made to yield through fear of violence.

"Outside of certain conditions, force is an essential element. When the mind is overpowered by show of violence or resistance ends because of physical fear and acquiescence is thus obtained, the offense is complete.

"The law does not compel the woman to resort to violence to resist."

Through his wohle charge he persistently used the word "he" or "his" instead of she.

"When a man testifies for himself he is an interested witness," the court continued, "and his testimony must be considered in the light. The law does not require that you be satisfied of his innocence to an absolute certainty. The rule is that you must be satisfied of his guilt or innocence of a reasonable doubt."

The court concluded his amazing charge to the jury, by the following statement:

"Before the laws of Alabama and our nation, all men stand on equal lines. He is entitled to and should receive equal administration of the law, no matter what his color or race is. When the law fails, eventually government will fail."

"There was something in the arguments about the defendant being a Negro," Judge Callahan concluded, unconvincingly. "I'd be ashamed of you if that entered into your search for truth. No man is worthy of being in the jury box who would reach a verdict on such contemptible grounds."

The courtroom was jammed with spectators and prospective jurors for the Clarence Norris trial when Callahan ordered the Patterson jury brought in to hear finishing summations by General W. W. Chamlee of Chattanooga, Southern associate defense cousel, Knight, and his own charge to the jury.

The prospective jurors were ordered to leave the courtroom when Chamlee began his summation.

Tall, spare and elderly, Chamlee in simple, touching language explained his early connection with the case; how the boys were terrified by the mob when he saw them, how no lawyers were present to really defend them, and how not even the judge knew who their lawyers were.

During Chamlee's address Patterson leaned forward in his chair eyeing him with pathetic hopefulness. The young Negro did not take his eyes off Chamlee during the whole hour's talk.

Knight followed immediately to conclude summation for the state.

Knight demanded death for Patterson, declaring there was no middle way. He based most of his appeal for the electric chair "to save our own daughters from the rapist." This time, instead of harping on preserving the purity of the "white woman," which he emphasized at the spring trial, he refers only to "women."

"I don't care how low Victoria is, we cannot forget she is a woman," he emphasized.

Chamlee's charge that the boys were fraed mwas countered by Knight in furious insinuations that the "defense framed its case." Smarting also from the defense accusation that the state hid Dr. Bridges, who first examined Victoria Price after the alleged attack, Knight cried angrily:

"Dr. Bridges was in court ready to testify, if the state saw fit."

Dr. Bridges, at the spring trial testifying for the state, became virtually a defense witness and the state refused to put him on this time.

Proudly admitting that he was playing upon passions of the jury for the sake of "white womanhood of Alabama," Attorney - General Knight demanded the death penalty for Heywood Patterson.

Attorney Leibowitz demanded that Knight's appeal be included in the record, and moved for a mistrial.

Judge Callahan promptly overruled the motion. and adjourned court before charging the jury "to give thanks to an all wise being who has seen us through the troublesome day."

Finishing his address, Knight virtually apologized for the court excluding vital testimony regarding Victoria Price's sexual relations in Chattanooga on the night preceding the arrest, saying that the court was absolutely justified according to law.

"The State of Alabama conducted this case according to law and has not made it a circus for the world to watch."

Immediately thereafter, carried away by his own eloquence, Knight, clapping hands and hopping about excitedly, cried:

"You cannot avenge Victoria Price, but you can prevent this terrible thing from happening to some other women."

Leibowitz jumped up and demanded that this statement be taken down by the stenographer because it was an appeal to passion.

"You're right!" Knight shouted. "It is an appeal to passion."

"The attorney-general has just admitted appealing to passions of the jury," Leibowitz returned sharply.

"I move for mistrial."

"Motion overruled," Callahan snapped.

"Yes, we all have a passion to protect the womanhood of the State of Alabama," Knight returned furiously.

"I want everything else the attorney-general says taken down in record," Leibowitz insisted.

With the rest of the summation being taken down, Knight concluded in another minute.

Callahan, instead of charging the jury immediately, apparently decided to adjourn court until one-thirty.

"In appreciation of this day of thankfulness for benefits given us by all wise being, I will adjourn court to give us all a chance to go to our firesides," Callahan said solemnly.

ALABAMA NEGRO FACES THIRD TRIAL

State Expects to Put Girl

Accuser of Patterson Before Jury Selected Today.

EX-HOBO TO SUPPORT HER

But Scottsboro Defense Is Said to Have 'Surprises' in Battle for Prisoner's Life.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

New York N.Y.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 26.—Although a twice-told tale, the case of Heywood Patterson may still contain surprises, it was indicated here today on the eve of his third trial for his life.

Three times this illiterate, penniless Negro has stood before the bar of Alabama justice to plead not guilty to a charge of attack on two white girls and twice he has heard himself found guilty by white juries and condemned to death.

His first trial at Scottsboro consumed a day. Last Spring, after International Labor Defense had come to his assistance and won him a new trial, it took a week to place him once more in the shadow of the electric chair, only to be saved again by Judge James E. Horton, who presided.

This time Judge W. W. Callahan, self-educated local jurist who in the past week has thrust aside two separate defense onslaughts against the "lily-white" jury system of his State, has declared that he thinks three days will be enough to determine whether Patterson shall live or die.

Expect Girl's Testimony Today.

Tomorrow morning at 8:30 o'clock from a panel of 100 white men Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief counsel for the defense and Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr. will begin the task of selecting tweive Morgan County citizens who "will a true verdict render."

Before the day's session ends the prosecution expects to have Mrs. Victoria Price's testimony on the record. Seven times, once before a grand jury of Jackson County and six times in open court, the young mill hand testified that she and Ruby Bates were attacked by Patterson and nine other Negroes on a freight train bound from Chattanooga to Huntsville on the afternoon of March 25, 1931.

Ruby Bates, who joined in the accusation at the first trial, recanted last Spring and testified that the whole case was concocted by Victoria Price to avoid a possible arrest for vagrancy. All that the Negroes did on the freight train, she declared, was overpower some white hoboes who picked a fight with them.

At this trial Ruby Bates will not return to testify, but will tell her story in a deposition from a hospital bed in New York, where recently she underwent an operation.

State Relies on Young Ex-Hobo.

The State, however, is counting upon 22-year-old Orville Gilley of Albertville, Ala., the only one of seven white hoboes not thrown off the train, to corroborate the charges of Victoria Price, whose testimony Judge Horton found so unreliable that he was constrained to reverse the jury's verdict against Patterson.

Although confined in the Scottsboro jail until the first trials were concluded, Gilley, who supposedly could have corroborated the testimony of the girls, was called in rebuttal at only one of the original trials, and then only to say that the Negroes were in the same car as their accusers.

Mr. Leibowitz made much of the State's failure to use him as a witness last Spring and failed to elicit an official explanation in the court room. J. G. Bailey, Solicitor of Jackson County, who arrived here today to assist the prosecution, said the reason was that Gilley's language was too rough for the court room of Judge A. F. Hawkins, who presided at the first trial.

Gilley has been here for the past week waiting to testify against the Negro, who, according to the defense at the last trial, saved his life by preventing him from jumping off the train after it had gathered speed.

He returned to Alabama from California voluntarily after the Patterson trial last Spring and sought out Attorney General Knight at Montgomery.

Other Surprises Predicted.

Sheriff Ben Giles of Huntsville predicted that there would be a surprise when Victoria Price was sworn. Since the last trial the NRA textile code has raised her wages from $5 to $14 for a shorter work week. Telling of the new frocks of the twice-married girl, who lives in Huntsville, he added:

"She's gained weight and had her hair curled and you would hardly know her."

The defense hinted at dramatic surprises too. Joseph R. Brodsky of its counsel has been absent for several days and tonight there was a mysterious conference of defense attorneys in Birmingham.

It was hinted that all the white hoboes, including Lester Carter, "The Knoxville Kid," who was the only one to testify at the last trial, would be on deck when Mr. Leibowitz puts in his defense.

Another report, about which Mr. Leibowitz declined to comment, was one that a former official of Alabama might appear to tell the court the "real reason" why Gilley's testimony was so limited at Scottsboro.

Before leaving here for Birmingham Mr. Leibowitz, commenting on exceptions saved in the skirmishes last week, said:

"I have the utmost confidence in the ultimate result when the case finally reaches the United States Supreme Court."

Judge Callahan has indicated that to keep expenses down he will cut the trial as short as possible and will hold sessions until midnight, if necessary, to clear the way for the trial of Clarence Norris, another Negro defendant, on Thursday morning.

Ruby Bates Not Out of Danger.

Ruby Bates, witness for the Scottsboro defense, who underwent a major operation in a New York hospital, Friday, was resting easily yesterday, the International Labor Defense said. Physicians in charge, however, would not pronounce her out of danger and her deposition in the case is not expected for several days.

A report that Ruby Bates was in the Beth David Hospital, at Lexington Avenue and 113th Street, under the name of Josie Smith, was denied last night by hospital officials.

A handwriting expert, called to Scottsboro, Ala., said that the names of negroes on the grand jury list were fakes and were added after the indictment of the negroes now on trial. It did not require a handwriting expert to know that. Anyone with common sense knows that there have not been any negroes on an Alabama grand jury list since the days of the Carpet Baggers.

Davis was accompanied by fifteen county officers in an auto caravan, some of them armed with machine guns, during the 90-mile trip to Decatur, made without incident.

Selection of additional guards was made public after Samuel S. Leibowitz, New York criminal lawyer and head of defense counsel, wired President Roosevelt at Warm Springs, Ga., asking that he urge Governor Miller to send them.

Mr. Leibowitz asserted "the probability of massacre of defendants and attorneys is extremely grave."

BULLETIN.

By the Associated Press.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 20.—Judge W. W. Callahan today set the third trial of Heywood Patterson for next Monday, November 27.

By the United Press.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 20.—Fifteen armed guards, selected by Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, Jr., with approval of Governor B. M. Miller, were on duty in the Circuit Court room here today as seven Negro youths, charged with attacking two white women near Scottsboro, Ala., on March 23, 1931, were arraigned for trial for the third time.

George W. Chamlee, of the International Labor Defense Counsel moved to quash the indictments, and arguments on the motion opened immediately.

Despite decision of Presiding Judge W. W. Callahan that he did the South in recent months and open threats against the lives of the Scottsboro defendants, lawyers and witnesses, the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners today redoubled efforts to persuade Governor B. M. Miller of Alabama to assign National Guard troops to the trial of the seven Scottsboro Negroes.

Well known liberal writers and clergymen have pledged their co-operation, and have sent wires to Governor Miller urging a National Guard force. A delegation of prominent authors and liberals will leave for Decatur Wednesday.

"It is hoped that their presence in Decatur may do much to calm the lynch fever," Alfred H. Hirsch, national secretary of the National Committee, said this morning. "We have grave fears for the safety, not only of the Scottsboro boys, but also for their attorneys and even the witnesses in the case, since the affidavits quote a cross section of Morgan County citizens as urging lynching of the chief figures in the defense.

A meeting of the Scottsboro delegation will be held tomorrow night at the studio of Margaret Larkin, 126 E. 27th St., at which there will be present George S. Count, professor of education, Columbia University; Mary Van Kleeck, of the Russell Sage Foundation; Susan La Follette, Malcolm Cowley, Edward Dahlberg and others.

Troops Not Needed, Governor Miller Holds.

By the Associated Press.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., Nov. 20.—Governor B. M. Miller today wired George W Chamlee that he did not believe troops were necessary at Decatur, but that they would be sent if there was any change in sentiment.

The telegram said "Your wire received. Have kept in close touch with Trial Judge at Decatur and State and county officials there. They advise me there is no indication of mob violence. Have authorized Trial Judge to appoint necessary additional deputies at expense of State. Investigation has been in all portions of Morgan County and local officials base their judgment on this investigation and state that in their opinion, no military guard is necessary. I am keeping in close touch with officials of Morgan County in charge of these cases and should they advise any change in sentiment, or any necessity for military guards, I will provide such immediately. I have confidence in the judgment of civil authorities in charge of these cases and I have an abiding faith i nthe law abiding spirit of the citizens of Morgan County.

SCOTTSBORO JUDGE BARS TROOP GUARD

But He May Revise Decision Not to Ask for Militia at New Decatur Trial.

LEIBOWITZ PLANS PLEA

He Will Urge Upon Prosecutor Protective Steps for N[redacted] —To Ask Change of Venue.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 18.—Despite reported threats of mob violence, seven of the nine defendants in the Scottsboro case are to be brought here Monday from the jail in Birmingham without a military guard.

Judge W. W. Callahan, who was assigned to try the cases after Judge James E. Horton reversed the verdict of guilty returned against Heywood Patterson last Spring, is understood to feel that the display of military force at the last trial helped engender bitterness among the townsfolk against the Negroes.

His decision not to request Governor Miller to summon a detail of the National Guard, however, is subject to revision. It was believed that he may ask for the militia after hearing the evidence which Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief counsel for the defense, is prepared to offer Monday in support of a motion for a second change of venue.

Mr. Leibowitz has in his possession seven affidavits from private investigators listing the names and addresses of nearly 500 individuals who, he says, not knowing that they were to be quoted, expressed the opinion that the "Jew lawyers from New York" and their Negro clients should be lynched.

Affidavits to Be Presented.

It is his intention to offer the affidavits in court on Monday to support his contention that a fair trial for the Negroes accused of attacking Victoria Price on a freight car near Scottsboro almost three years ago, is impossible anywhere in Morgan County.

The cases were transferred to Morgan from Jackson County, where the alleged crime occurred, after the United States Supreme Court set aside the original verdicts of guilty and the sentences of death imposed by Judge A. E. Hawkins, on the ground that the first trials were unfair.

The Alabama statutes permit only one change of venue, but Mr. Leibowitz is planning to attack the constitutionality of the law on the ground that it deprives the defendants in the Scottsboro case of their right to a fair trial, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. He will attempt to show that there is more animosity toward him and his clients here than there ever was in Jackson County.

The New York attorney, who has been retained by the International Labor Defense, a Communist adjunct, to defend the Negroes, left home yesterday but he did not come to Decatur. He went instead to Birmingham, where he hopes to confer tomorrow with Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., the prosecutor, regarding protective measures which he holds necessary to safeguard the lives of the accused Negroes.

Pamphlet Attacks Defense.

Soon after his arrival in Birmingham Mr. Leibowitz obtained a copy of a fifty-four-page pamphlet which contains a suggestion of mob violence and which has been circulated widely throughout the State, according to report. The pamphlet, which purports to have been written by Woodford Mabry, attorney at Grove Hill, Ala., is entitled "A reply to Southern slanders in re the Negro question, lynch law, &c., being an invitation to the International Labor Defense and all other associations advocating political equality to get out of and to remain away from the State of Alabama."

"We regard your teachings as dangerous and a menace to our State," the pamphlet states.

Among the more inflammatory passages was the following:

"I have never been, am not now and never will be an advocate of mobs, but when a lot of outside Negroes and white people send lawyers into our State who set themselves up insolently and lawlessly to defeat the law and cheat justice, I believe then that within certain limitations the people who authorize court executions retain the power themselves to put down crime.

"Within those limitations all peoples enforce lynch law. Why does the law give you the right to expel trespassers with just such force as you find necessary? And to kill a man to prevent him from stealing your horse or burglarizing your house? Or to anticipate and slay the assailant who manifestly means to attack your life? It is because the law is too slow to save you.

Community Urged to 'Save Self.'

"You must save yourself. In like manner the law may be too slow and uncertain to save a menaced community because of outside lawyers and the unscrupulous methods employed by them. Then that community must exercise its inherent right to defend itself."

Notwithstanding the widespread talk of lynching members of this Tennessee River community minimize the danger of actual violence. Taxicab chauffeurs, store keepers, and public officials all are positive there will be no trouble. Negroes however, look frightened and give evasive answers when they are asked for an opinion about the case. The third trial of the twice convicted Patterson will not start for a week after his arraignment. A considerable part of the interim probably will be consumed by argument on the motion for a change of venue.

Attorney General Knight has requested subpoenas for all the witnesses who testified for the State at the last trial. In addition he ordered the issuance of a subpoena for Ruby Bates, the girl who testified that she was attacked along with Victoria Price at the Scottsboro trials and then, appearing as a surprise witness for the defense at the last trial, recanted and charged that the whole case was "a frame-up."

The Bates girl, however, has informed Mr. Leibowitz in a letter made public by him in New York a few days ago that she does not dare to return to repeat her testimony in Decatur. According to the defense counsel, she is beyond the process of the Alabama court in New York or New Jersey.

Of even more interest than the subpoena which Mr. Knight requested for the Bates girl was the Attorney General's request for a subpoena for Orville Gilley. Gilley, a white hobo, was on the freight car in which the alleged attack took place, and presumably saw all that happened.

Although held in jail until the trials at Scottsboro were ended, Gilley never, from the witness stand, told the story of the alleged crime. Since the last trial, according to Mr. Knight, he returned voluntarily to Alabama and swore to an affidavit supporting Victoria Price's charge of a mass assault upon her and Ruby Bates. Whether Mr. Knight will be able to produce Gilley in court, has not been revealed.

JUSTICE FOR ALL OR NONE

Judge Callahan in his charge to the jurors in the trial of Haywood Patterson in the famous Scottsboro case in Decatur, Alabama, on Thanksgiving Day stated the doctrine of the equality of all men, black and white, before the law in terms worthy of remembrance. Unfortunately the new verdict of guilty brought in by the Alabama jury after more than a day of deliberation will arouse a widespread wonder as to whether they heard him or acted upon the fundamental doctrine which he gave them. He said:

> Something has been said through this case in argument, about the defendant's being a Negro.
> I would be ashamed of you if that is to enter into your consideration for search for truth in this case. No man is worthy to be in a jury box that would reach the guilt or innocence of a man on any such contemptible grounds.
> Before the law of Alabama and before the law of this nation, men stand on equal rights, as far as the law is concerned. He is entitled to expect and receive the administration of the law in that manner and no other.
> Whenever it is administered in any other way, the law has failed, and when the law fails, eventually the government will fail.

No doctrine is more fundamental to our civilization than that all men regardless of creed or color or wealth or place are equal before the law. Once that doctrine is invaded to destroy the equality before the law of any men than the hope of all others to secure impartial justice in our courts is gravely threatened. Only tyranny or anarchy can prevail where all men are not granted equality in the quest for justice.

THE LAW'S DELAYS.

One of the reasons why there is so little resentment against lynchings in certain quarters is because of the slowness of the courts. If punishment for wrongdoing were certain and sure, there would be no cause for lynchings. It is when an outraged populace, feeling that the courts are powerless to act, take the law into their hands, that we have lynchings.

"For a third time," says The Record, "a death verdict has been returned against Heywood Patterson, 21-year-old negro for an alleged assault on a white woman, at Scottsboro, Ala., in 1931.

"Regardless of what the people of the country at large may think concerning the affair, few persons would argue that it should be necessary to try a case three times and then perhaps prolong the procedure by another appeal.

"The case has been submitted to three different juries and each time the verdict of guilty has been brought back.

"If a mob had taken the accused negroes out and hanged them following the alleged attack, the press of the land would have voiced the indignation of law-abiding citizens. We should stop to consider, now that a third verdict of guilty has been returned in the case, with further delays probable, that here is an instance upon which those guilty of mob violence justify their rash acts.

"Courts must be made to function with greater expedition if we are to stamp out the disposition of people to take the punishment of certain criminals into their own hands. It will do little good to denounce lynching unless we are able to convince the masses that the courts are dependable agencies in the meting out of justice through the imposition of proper penalties for capital crimes."

Lynchings of Old

Elijah P. Lovejoy, newspaper editor at Alton, Ill., was to his neighbors, a fiend of fiends. Lovejoy had sunk to the depravity of believing in the freeing of the negro slaves of that day. Openly he advocated this hideous heresy. His printing press was thrown into the Mississippi river by the outraged citizens of Alton. Finally, persisting in the error of his ways, Lovejoy was lynched.

It is not of record that the governor of Illinois of that day issued a proclamation of thanks to the splendid saviors of society of Alton who had shown the world what Illinois thought of abolitionists. There is no doubt at all that the members of the Alton citizenry who disposed of the terrible Lovejoy were highly satisfied with themselves.

In four years will fall the centenary of the murder of Elijah P. Lovejoy. There will be memorial programs, acts of reverence for a man long enrolled on his country's scroll of fame. The man the Alton mob mistook for an enemy to be stamped upon time has lifted to eminence as a martyr to a noble cause.

History carries another story, even more notable, of the work of a mob. Nowhere in all the world, we may suppose, not even in San Jose, Cal., have men felt surer they performed a great and noble killing than on a certain spring day almost exactly 1900 years ago. There was the form of a trial before Pilate, but the court was convinced of the innocence of the accused. The decree of guilt was issued under compulsion of a cleverly inflamed mob. There is no record that even Herod or Pilate issued a statement glorifying the chief priests and their associates for the crucifixion on Calvary. This did not interfere in the least, we may be sure, with the certainty of the mob and its leaders that in this act they had done a great and holy day's work.

Garrison, had a Boston mob had its way, would have joined Lovejoy in the ranks of martyrdom. The Boston mob of that day would have felt as virtuous as the San Jose mob does today. No kidnaper will ever emerge a martyr; but suppose one or the other of the alleged kidnapers was innocent? Which of us wants his guilt, when charged with crime, to be decided by a shrieking mob?

By slow stages, for thousands of years the human race has been learning that mob justice is not justice. Slowly institutions have been built to give effect to that fact. All human experience confirms the fact. And here in literate America we find ourselves forced to argue for this, the most elementary fact in the foundation of civilization!

The Decatur Verdict

Black Dispatch
Oklahoma City, Okla.

A laughing, grinning white jury in Alabama, following testimony of a depraved white prostitute, has again decided to "burn another nigger" in the electric chair. There need be no further query as to implications which spring from the Heywood Patterson conviction at Decatur. This trial exposes the brutal, savage, calloused depravity of southern conscience; this trial proves that the mob rules the courts in Dixie, and that in such courts of injustice the color of a human being's skin determines his guilt or innocence.

God knows, we felt the Patterson jury would hang. We told several persons with whom we talked during the past week, that this would be the outcome of the trial. We took this position for the reason we felt there would be at least one white person on that jury who had a conscience The decision reached by the Decatur jury must have come also as a shock to Judge Horton. He had admonished the talesmen that they were not trying the defendant because of his color, and yet the verdict shows that the mind of the jury was filled with the prejudice of hell. They recommend the hot seat for Heywood Patterson solely because he is black.

"If Victoria Price swore falsely on any material point, you cannot convict this defendant," said Judge Horton to the Decatur jury; and in the next breath the judge pointed out to the same jury material testimony given by Victoria Price regarding which she had been openly proved in court to be a perjurer. Southern justice and local self-government hung in the balances, while twelve white cringing cowards, who swore that they would render their decision based upon the evidence, bowed to prejudice and the mob spirit. The word of a scarlet woman, whose face is white, and who openly paraded her cheap jungle sex relationship to the court, was accepted by this white jury over and above the testimony of the innocent black defendant and his corroborated statement by white associates of Victoria Price.

There is not a white man one degree above the level of a brute who will not hang his head in shame when he learns of what actually happened at Decatur. The undisputed testimony shows that Heywood Patterson, at the time of his alleged rape of the person of Victoria Price, was suffering terribly from the ravages of social disease. The relationship could not have been physically possible. The evidence shows that neither Ruby Bates, her girl companion Victoria Price later suffered from these communicable disease germs as they unquestionably would have, had the alleged relationship occurred.

Added to this, the spineless, bigoted white jury reached their decision to burn Heywood Patterson, while before them was the testimony of Elmer Carter, white youth, and Ruby Bates, white girl, that the entire testimony given two years ago at Scottsboro, was framed. They had before them the straight-forward statement of the defendant The prosecution was not able to make Heywood Patterson waver one single instant in his testimony. It was evident that he told the truth when he told Attorney General Knight, "I did not see any girls on that train.'

But the worst approach to prejudice came when attorneys for the state sought to, and did influence the jury with appeals to hatred for the Jewish race. "Are you going to allow Alabama justice to be bought by Jew money from New York?" declaimed one of the prosecuting attorneys. Totally forgetting their flimsy evidence the sworn officers of the state resorted to abuse of Jewish integrity and honor. Fact and truth falling down, the would-be legal murderers sought to detract the mind of the natives with distorted insinuations about the Hebrew people. "Will you have faith in any witness who has been in the hands of the New York Jew, Brodsky?" echoed through the Decatur courtroom.

The Decatur case will, of course, be immediately appealed. No one with discourse to reason expected to secure justice in this hell hole of savagery. It is regrettable that the case in its evolution to the Supreme Court of the United States must tarry in the Alabama Supreme court, for there will be no justice there. This case, regardless of its outcome, will do a number of constructive things. It will serve to expose southern injustice to the world; it will cement Negroes and Jews into a closer relationship, and it will stiffen manhood and spirit into millions of black people who live below the Mason and Dixon Line—in the bowels of America's "Congo."

A SUGGESTION TO THE SOUTH

The News and Observer believes that the verdict at Decatur, Ala., on Sunday, in which a new death penalty was returned in the famous Scottsboro case, was an outrageous verdict.

The News and Observer also believes that there has been created in Alabama a sentiment which, as it now stands, jeopardizes the hope of ultimate justice in this famous case. This sentiment has grown not because there does not exist in the State of Alabama an enlightened view of justice in race relations. The admirable manner in which Judge Horton presided over the case, and his excellent charge to the jury indicates that in Alabama as elsewhere just men wish only justice.

Alabama, however, has seen its courts and its people, its attitudes, mistaken as they may be, held up to the scorn and derision of the world. Alabama is proud, and Alabama in dealing with this case was dealing with the emotionally overcharged question of the relations of whites and blacks in the South. This is no place to discuss the Negro question. This is the time to consider justice and the fate of men whom many people believe to be the victims of the false witness of false women. In that question of justice it does not matter that the women are white and the defendants are black.

Into this delicate Alabama situation there came men, whose motives were undoubtedly excellent, who gave to the Negro convicted on Sunday one of the finest legal defenses which America could provide. But they were not Southerners. They were city men from far away. They were—there is no use caviling—Jews. They represented radical labor. In fact, they represented all the things of which the simple men and women of Alabama are suspicious and distrustful.

As a result of all these factors of emotion and prejudice, justice in Alabama is involved in one of the most complex emotional tangles in the history of American criminal trials.

The News and Observer believes there is a way out, a way to the preservation of the honor of Alabama and a way to the determination of justice. No one interested in the securing of justice in Alabama can have anything but praise for the skill and the conviction with which the International Labor Defense and Samuel Leibowitz have conducted the defense. But The News and Observer believes that their usefulness has ended.

The News and Observer makes this suggestion:

That the International Labor Defense withdraw from the defense of the Negroes upon the condition that the lovers of justice in the South will secure the ablest Southern counsel, lawyers of the greatest eminence in the South, to go to Alabama and conduct the defense.

Such a plan, The News and Observer believes, will make the securing of justice possible in Alabama. And through such a course Southern justice, injured by the verdict at Decatur on Sunday, may be vindicated. In any way that it may, The News and Observer would like to join other Southern people and organizations interested in the vindication of Southern justice.

That is all this paper wants. That is all the International Labor Defense has been asking. That is the desire of the people of Alabama and the South. And only justice will satisfy any of them. This, The News and Observer believes, is the one road to the securing of justice.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASES

The state has just witnessed the end of a second trial of one of the Scottsboro negroes charged with assault on some white girls. This second trial resulted in a verdict of guilty with the death sentence, same as the first verdict.

There are some very unfortunate facts in connection with this last trial. The most regrettable is the race issue. The defense was in charge of one attorney Leibowitz, from New York, who undertook to make it appear that the prosecution was only a persecution of the defendant for being a negro.

After two or three weeks of a trial in which every character of criticism that a resourceful mind could formulate was aimed at the people of Alabama and their methods of administering justice, either directly or by clear inference, this visiting lawyer from New York issued a public statement following the verdict, the first paragraph of which, according to the press, reads as follows:

This brazen insult was hurled at a jury of twelve representative citizens of Morgan County, Alabama, who listened patiently to the testimony submitted at the trial and returned their verdict under oath.

At least indirectly it was aimed at the people of Alabama; and the most charitable comment that can be fairly made is that the prepetrator has forfeited any claim he may have had to the respect of thoughtful citizens of this state.

It is greatly to be hoped that the interests of the other defendants under the same charge will be in the hands of attorneys with some conception of the proprieties.

A SHOCKING VERDICT

In Decatur, Alabama, on the Sabbath Day a jury of southern white men, after 21 hours of deliberation brought in a second verdict of death in the famous Scottsboro case in which at the first trial two years ago seven negroes were sentenced to death. Only one negro was involved in the verdict yesterday, but in a sense he stood trial for all of them.

To depend upon only the facts stated in the jury's change to the jury, both of the white women involved in the case are "women of the underworld," and "at one time or another, both Ruby Bates and Victoria Price perjured themselves." Yet on the evidence of these women, one of whom took the stand in the second trial to admit that all she had testified against the negroes was a falsehood, and to charge that the testimony to her companion was also false, a negro faces the death penalty in the name of southern honor.

It is inconceivable that this verdict will be allowed to stand without appeal once more to the highest court of the land if necessary. And in this appeal the demand for justice in Alamaba will not be a cause furthered only by radicals. Upon the facts brought out at the present trial, upon the facts in the judges charge alone, men and women everywhere whose interest is only to see justice done can [illegible]

With the conviction of the first negro tried at Decatur in the Scottsboro crime and his penalty fixed at death in the electric chair, his Jew lawyer feels rather disconsolate. The New York Jew says there is no such thing as a fair trial in Alabama. It seems to this paper that it is about time he was told where to go and how long to stay. Alabama has always been fair in the trials of men charged with crime and the fact that men of the type of this negro and his companions, lustful beasts, were even given a trial is sufficient guarantee of the fairness of our people. This recent recruit from Russia is a poor sort of chap to try to blight the good name of Alabama. The fact that he was allowed to cast reflections on our people and get away with it, is another guarantee of our fairness.

THE SE[illegible]NAL VERDICT.

There is no denying the fact that sectionalism prevailed with the jury in the now odorous Scottsboro case, in which the verdict of guilty was once more rendered against a negro charged with attack on a white woman. In the first trial the public had reason to believe that there had been a case of brutal assault on two white women by a group of negroes hoboing a freight train, but an entirely new situation was developed at the second trial, when one of the alleged victims of the outrage admitted to perjury in her former testimony and denied that she had been attacked. It further developed that the two women defendants were by no means representative of Southern womanhood, the characters which they bore inviting forcible approach by their negro companions on the train. The jury was drawn from a population incensed by first reports of the alleged occurrences, and was influenced by the sentiment still surviving, and demanded the life of the negro in face of the new light that had been thrown on the case. Here we have one case in which the appeal process is eminently justified and the anticipation holds that the decision forthcoming from this appeal will right the situation.

Unjustified [illegible]

The first definite happening in the retrial of the grotesque Scottsboro, Alabama, case is represented in the conviction of the first of the seven negro defendants to be tried for an alleged attack on a pair of hobo girls following a fight with their white male companions. The verdict sustains the findings of the original jury that heard the evidence.

But the jury's verdict doesn't mean the end of the controversy in which the International labor defense has interested itself, on the assumption that racial hatred has put the negro defendants in an unfair position. Every court in the land that can be reached will hear the group of defense lawyers before a single execution is carried out.

The Herald is not disposed to debate the issue as to the guilt or innocence of the involved negroes. The crime charged, however, has been committed an almost untold number of times in all sections of the country which keeps it within an easy realm of possibility. As to one of the girl witnesses repudiating her original evidence no great importance need be attached. That too, has been done numerous times and without any apparent reason.

But we do resent the implication of un-southern legal interests that the defendants can't get an impartial trial because of their color and the setting. Nothing could possibly be further from the truth. As to the charge of bigotry and intolerance this is seldom found in the understanding mind.

Alabama, like all other southern states, knows the negro far better than his champions of the north and east, and understands him as those sections can never hope to. The law abiding negro knows this. He isn't the least afraid of his white friends in the south. It is them to whom he goes in sickness or when in financial difficulties and always with the assurance that help will be given.

The Scottsboro case will be decided on its merits as much as any other case. Mistakes, of course may be made, just as they always have been in the administration of the law. But this won't be because the defendants are negroes.

Alabama.

JUDGE HORTON'S "FAIRNESS" IS EXPOSED BY ATTORNEY BRODSKY IN FIRST, EXCLUSIVE INTERVIEW

Daily Worker 4-15-33

"Judge Horton More Dangerous Than Ranting Prosecutors," Says I.L.D. Lawyer

Brodsky Shows Judge Ignored Motions for Mistrials, Thus Aiding Prosecution

In an interview with a representative of the Daily Worker, Joseph R. Brodsky, chief counsel of the International Labor Defense, yesterday gave his views on the Scottsboro trial which closed in Decatur, Ala., on Sunday.

Brodsky was singled out for especial attack by the prosecution during the trial because of the courageous and energetic fight which he put up during the past two years as chief counsel for the I. L. D. He argued the Scottsboro case before the Alabama Supreme Court, which upheld the frame-up.

New York N.Y.

Brodsky's views on the Decatur trial and the verdict against Patterson follow:

What I want to specifically squelch once for all is the attempt of a part of the South, especially the bourgeois South, and the liberals here in the North, to place the Scottsboro issue on this basis: that it was not the inevitable result of the theory of "white supremacy" in the South arising out of the class struggle and the exploitation of the Negro as an oppressed national minority, but that it came as a result of some one particular individual who either lost his head or who happens to be as an individual actuated by prejudice against the North, against the Jew, against the Negroes.

JOSEPH R. BRODSKY

Judge Quiet, But More Dangerous

Take Judge Horton. Judge Horton is a very kind sort of an individual. He is fair, according to his lights, but those lights are the lights of a "Southern gentleman," which means that he accepts and takes for granted the class position of the Negroes, the necessity of white supremacy—and every one of his ruling was a ruling in the light of maintaining white supremacy in the South, even though the ruling was made in mild language, even though the ruling was kindly made, even though he didn't rant while he made it, like that blithering fool Wright, who more stupidly showed this boiling cauldron of prejudice. It needed somebody to stick a spike into it so that it could spout up full like a volcano. Whereas Judge Horton, more decent, but objectively more dangerous, was seeking to keep the lid clamped down.

For example, we raised the question of the denial of constitutional rights because Negroes were excluded from the grand jury and from the petty jury panel from which was to be drawn the jury that actually sat in judgment upon the boys.

How were we going to raise this question? We were going to prove first that there never was a Negro sitting upon a jury either in Jackson County, where the boys were indicted, or in Morgan County, where the present case was tried. We were going to show that there couldn't be a Negro on these juries because on the jury lists from which the respective juries were to be drawn there was not a single Negro. We were going to prove that there were Negroes who were eminently qualified to serv on juries. The first point we had to prove by calling in witnesses who are well acquainted with the practice in the counties involved.

We called in the editor of the "Progressive Age," a paper in Jackson County. We put him on the stand.

Q.—"How long have you visited courts in this county? A.—Thirty-five years.

Q.—"Have you ever seen a Negro sit on a jury?" A.—"No, I have not."

Q.—"Did you ever see a Negro who was qualified to serve? A.—"No."

Now, let us say, the statute says they must be over 21 and under 65. "Do you know Negroes who are over 21 and under 65?" "Yes."

The statute says they must not be afflicted with any disease that would make them incompetent. "Do you know Negroes that are not afflicted with any disease?" "Yes." The statute says they must never have been convicted of any crime. "Do you know Negroes that have not been convicted?" "Yes." The statute says they must be of sound judgment and esteemed in the community where they live. "Do you know Negroes who bear a reputation for truth and veracity?" "Yes."

"Well, what is it you will exclude them on?" "On the matter of sound judgment." In other words, there never was a Negro who has sound judgment to pass on the case! In other words, the theory of the white is that the Negro is not a human being, does not possess the quality of sound judgment!

Now, Judge Horton listens to our proof, that in spite of the fact that we bring people who for 35 years past had personal knowledge that no Negroes ever sat on a jury, they still refuse to admit two things: One, that the jury list had no Negroes on it, and, two, that they are excluded on the question of race or color. We are told we must prove both points. If the Judge did not know it from Jackson County, he certainly knew it from Morgan County. He heard the clerk, Mr. Green, testify that he has seen at least 2,500 jurors serve, and never to his knowledge was there a Negro. The judge knew that there never was, and necer could have been a Negro sitting on the jury.

They tell us to prove it. How are we going to prove it? If you refuse to concede that everyone on the jury roll is a white, we must subjoena the Negroes.

And right here, let me stop for a moment and say, that the real heroes in the Scottsboro case have not yet been recognized and given their due. They are the fifteen Negroes who came from Scottsboro, after being subpoenaed by the sheriff (which means that every last one of them was threatened before he came). The fifteen Negroes wo came into Court and for the first time in the South took the stand and said, "Here we are, listen to us; we will prove to you that we are qualified." After they set the pace, immediately, in Decatur, when we attacked the petty jury, 400 Negroes volunteered to come. These first 15 were the trail blazers. We offered to produce every last one of the 400 from Decatur.

Negroes Qualified

We had these fifteen Negroes on the stand. We asked them, "What is your name, where were you born? What are your educational qualifications? Do you read and write? Are you afflicted with a disease? Are you a householdler? Have you ever been convicted of a crime?" All these questions were answered favorably. Then we had Negro witnesses that were highly esteemed in the community for good character and sound judgment, as required by statute. Some were duly elected school trustees.

But Prosecutor Knight interrupts with: "You don't mean that you were elected by white people? You were elected only by colored peoplpe, isn't that so?" Then, he asked one of our witnesses, "Are you a member of the Communist Party?" The answer was "No." "Of what party are you a member?" "I have been a member of the Republican Party for forty years." "Are you a member of the section of lily-whites or of the black-and-tan?" In other words, he was putting the color line right there.

Now what does Judge Horton do? When he saw that we were forcing the issue, when we told him that we would use our legal right to ask a subpoena for every last mon of the 2,000 on the jury panel, that if the attorney general was not going to concede that which everybody knew, that we accepted the challenge; that we would stay here and prove it—then Judge Horton granted our request that subjoenas be issued.

Judge Changes His Mind

This was the last thing that happened before lunch period. We go home, and after the lunch period the first thing the Judge says is, "I have decided to deny this motion."

"But, your Honor, we want an opportunity to prove this. We want to subjoena all of these witnesses. You told us before lunch that we could do that."

"Motion denied." Very quietly, very politely, very "decently." ."Motion denied."

Now what does he do next? "This will give you some idea of the "fairness" of the judge. After denying the motion, Horton follows it with a speech as follows: "We here, and I as a Judge in this court, will see to it that the principles of the South will be carried out, there will be fair and even-handed justice to Jew and Gentile, black and white alike." This, five minutes after he denied the motion, which means justifying the exclusion of the Negroes!

Judge More Dangerous

He is a man who has been poisoned at the source. You cannot make a "fair" man out of him. He is honest according to his lights. But his lights are the lights of the Southern ruling class, oppressors of the Negro people.

The difference between Judge Horton and Wade Wright is the following: First, he is more dangerous than Wade Wright. That is primarily the difference from our point of view. Secondly, Wade Wright is vicious—subjectively and objectively—where the judge is objectively vicious. Personally he wouldn't "hurt anybody." As he said, later on in the case, "I am a tender man. I wouldn't hurt any human being. If it comes to a question of right and wrong, I have only one course to pursue."

He is "democratic" and "decent," but he has a water-tight compartment in his brain and can't see that this is merely language that covers the worst and most vicious type of unfairness. We at least shouldn't be blinded by that sort of thing. The South likes that. They have written editorial after editorial on it. "This is the fair South. This is the South that gives out justice even-handed."

But in that South lies all the prejudice which keeps the Negro as a super-exploited people under the damnable theory of white supremacy a theory which condemns the white worker to the same miserable status of the Negro, and keeps him from seeing that it is this very theory of white supremacy that sends him (as it did to the courtroom) starving, ragged hungry.

As to the question of the jury in Morgan County. Now in Morgan County it is the proud boast of every white man that there never was a Negro on the jury. We brought Negro after Negro who was born and raised there, who was 50 to 60 years old and they said, "No Negro in Jackson County had ever served on a jury." They knew this from their own knowledge.

Now the Judge could have avoided this huge farce. We produced witness after witness to prove this. We brought doctors, professionals, ministers, workers. Their answers were intelligent. Many of them were college graduates. Some of them are qualified to vote, and anybody who knows what it means for a Negro to be qualified to vote knows just what that means. Negroes are expected to recite from memory the Constitution of the U. S. in order to qualify as voters.

Now what does the judge do? We prove our point up to the hilt. Then he says, "Alright, you have proved your point, that there has been exclusion of juries, you have made out a prima facie case."

Yet, Judge Horton would not give us an opportunity to prove that the men on theh jury panel were all white. What does the District Attorney do? He calls one jury commissioner. He asks, "Have you considered any of these Negroes in preparing the jury rolls?" "Sure, we have considered some of these names." "And you excluded them. Did you exclude them because of race or color?" "No."

Now the point we made was this: You can't go inside of a man's head and see what his intentions are. We judge from facts. If over a period of 35 years Negroes have been excluded and it is conceded that 2,000 out of the 8,000 in Morgan County are qualified to serve on juries, then exclusion does exist!

"Motion denied," says the Judge. One jury commissioner against all other witnesses and the facts themselves. Did that stand in his way of following that up with a speech. "I am a tender man, I wouldn't hurt any human being." He means it perhaps, just as "honestly" and "sincerely" as he believes that the Negroes are inferior beings, that only a white man can do justice alike to black and white, but that the black cannot do justice either to the black or white. It is in that sense, that you must understand his "fairness."

Now I want to give you the climax to the "fairness" of the judge. Alabama had determined that the outside world should have the illusion o fairness. They had the militia ou to protect us. They knew that crosses were burnt for the first time in thre or four years in Alabama and in the town where Victoria Price came from. They knew that in Decatur a meeting of over 200 business men had bee held and that a march had actuall been started on the jail. They kno that Burleson, the captain of th militia, had said, "If there is a acquittal here, hell will break loose."

So Judge Horton made thes speeches "recognizing the danger tha was there." He heard Wade Wrigh make his outrageous attack, th blithering idiot, sitting there an frothing at the mouth, yelling at th top of his lungs so that everybod who was peeking in from the outsid could hear what he was saying. Yo could hear him across the Tennesse River. "You brought down Carte You should call him 'Carterinsky Brodsky puts a new suit of clothes o Carter's back. Send him back t New York. Alabama justice canno be bought and sold with Jew mone from New York."

Was this any worse what Solicito Barley said in a smooth, soft voice "This is an Anglo-Saxon country. W white men have brought this civilization to a high level. Free this ma and every white father who has daughter will tremble." Is this an less vicious than what Wright said

ButWright was picked out as th one to do it. Wright comes from Morgan county. Bailey comes from Scottsboro. But Wright knows every last man on the jury.

Objections are made by the defense.. Motions are made for a mistrial.

What does the judge do, "Moton deneld." And when these vicious speeches are all over, the judge takes a second in which to say. "Gentlemen of the jury, disregard what Mr. Wright said." That's fairness" for you!

It may be fairness to those who are seeking to hide the real situation, but it is not fairness to those who understand that this is the flower of southern prejudice, of southern oppression of he Negroee, that this fairness is cloaking the murder of the innocent Scottsboro boys.

ALABAMA FIGHT TO CENTER ON RACIAL BARS

Barring of the right of jury service to Negroes in the South is to be the basis of appeal to the United States Supreme Court in the case of Heywood Patterson first of the 9 Negroes convicted in the Scottsboro trial at Decatur Ala.

Samuel Leibowitz, New York attorney who conducted the Patterson defense, made that clear today in a statement to the Evening Journal outlining the reasons for the International Labor Defense Council sending a Northern lawyer to Decatur to defend the Negroes.

SEES NEW HOPE.

That statement said:

"The feeling against the Negro in the South is so bitter that irrespective of how innecent the evidence may show him to be, conviction is inevitable.

"The Negro's only hope lies in the hands of the Justices of the highest court in our land at Washington. We have opened the doors of that tribunal to them by absolute proof in the Decatur courtroom that the Negro has been systematically excluded from service upon any grand or petit jury in Alabama, in violation of the 14th Amendment to the United States Constitution.

"No Southern lawyer would have dared to raise that issue in any court in the State of Alabama. It would have meant for him the finish of his professional career, or posibly a lynching.

"Without this Federal question being threshed out the right of entrance to the United States Supreme Court would have been barred to these Scottsboro defendants.

"That is the service the North has rendered to these hapless prisoners. We have given them a lifetime which will undoubtedly tow them into the harbor of safety before this case is over. The Nogro for the first time is now beginning to lift his head from the gutter where the hobnailed heel of bigotry has been crushing him for these many years."

Meantime a petition signed by 167 Columbia University students condemming the Patterson death sentence and demanding a change of venue for the other defendants was in the hands of President Roosevelt today.

THE DECATUR, ALA., FARCE.

Law-abiding citizens of Alabama can pridefully point to one court official for having honorably and creditably acquitted himself during the trial of Haywood patterson at Decatur, Ala.—Judge James E. Horton who presided throughout the deliberations with fairness and impartiality. Amid an atmosphere surcharged with hatred, ignorance and bloodlust, he displayed rare courage, speaking from the bench against mob law and exhorting the jury to decide the case on its legal merits.

That his disinclination to cater to narrow sectional sentiment and to function as a rank partisan has not increased his popularity with the rabid element of home folk was sensed when he said to the jurors:

> "I have done what I thought to be right as judge of this court, no matter what the personal costs to me might be."

Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, who had charge of the prosecution, will have much to live down. His ungentlemanly demeanor and questionable methods of conducting the state's side of the case may make him a hero in the eyes of lynchers, but to the millions who have followed the proceedings in the newspapers he is pictured more as a persecuter than a prosecutor. So unethical were some of his actions that counsel for defense interposed objection and was sustained by the court. His last exhibition of "superiority" was in referring to Patterson as "that thing" while addressing the jury. If this aspiring Christian gentleman can make his way to the Governor's chair by convicting the Scottsboro defendants, although their guilt had not been proved beyond a reasonable doubt, he will gladly do so. What does human life mean to him when one's skin is black?

The ranting and raving of Wade Wright, circuit solicitor of Morgan County, in summing up for the state, in which he injected bigotry, race hatred and sectional pride, was typical of the average prosecuting officer in backward districts of the South. Wright was elected to office on speeches appealing to baser passions. It is doubtful if he could win a case strictly on its legal aspects. He has found it easier to cajole juries by arraying race against race than by relying on law and the evidence for victory. The circuit solicitor admits he "was only delivering his customary closing argument."

Even the official stenographer was unable to show that he does not suffer from his lowly environment. When told to repeat a question asked by counsel for the defendant, in which the terms "Negro" or "colored" were used, upon reading from his shorthand notes he would invariably say "nigger."

Samuel S. Leibowitz of New York, who acted as chief defense counsel without financial compensation, made an unanswerable statement when, after surveying the crowded courtroom and relating that he had been threatened with tar and feathers, with whipping and with gunpowder and lead for trying to save the lives of Haywood Patterson and his companions, replied to Wright's unprovoked verbal attack on him by saying:

> "Now, as for the Jew money from New York, let me say this: That when the hour of our country's need came there was no question of Jew or Gentile, or black or white—all, all together braved the smoke and flame of Flanders Fields. Now, I am not getting any fee in this case, and I'm not getting a penny expense for myself and my wife, who was here with me.
> "Mobs mean nothing to me. Let them hang me; I don't care. Life is only an incident in the Creator's scheme of things, but if I can contribute my little bit to see that justice is served, then my mission is fulfilled."

Brave words spoken by a truly brave man. It requires no pluck or heroism to look an opponent squarely in the eyes and express such sentiments. But to speak your mind in a community where lynch law reigns to those believing that might is right and who thirst for your blood, is an acid test of intrepidity. The biggest coward in all the world is the lyncher. He must go armed and in a crowd before putting to death the defenseless and often the innocent. The only time he fights single handed is when he knows other bullies can quickly come to his assistance.

The reign of terror in which Decatur, Ala., is helplessly mired is reflected in the presence of the militia at the trial to prevent lynchings. After the production of Ruby Bates as a defense witness, the mob spirit became so rife that a National Guardsman slept with Mr. Leibowitz while the sleeping quarters of other lawyers for the defense and visiting newspaper men was guarded. Any one who dared express an opinion in public advocating a square deal for Patterson laid himself liable to personal injury.

There are two Souths—the new and the old. Decatur, Ala., belongs to the latter, which clings tenaciously to traditions and concepts of yesteryear, observes one set of laws for whites and another for blacks, resentful of any gesture coming from the outside in the interest of justice and fair play, and which looks with hostile eyes toward the educated Negro who desires equality of opportunity and all the rights to which he is entitled under the Constitution of the United States.

Attorney General Knight knew the psychology of his jurors when he stirred animosities by pleading:

> "If you acquit this Negro, put a garland of roses around his neck, give him a supper and send him to New York City. There let Dr. Harry Fosdick dress him up in a high hat and morning coat, gray striped trousers and spats."

Of course in any really civilized community this would be considered pure claptrap, but in a God-forsaken spot where civilization is on a low ebb, it has the desired effect when appeals to reason and logic would utterly fail. In Decatur they don't reason with their minds but with their emotions.

The world-at-large is learning many valuable lessons from the Scottsboro case. Thanks to enterprising editors of large dailies in various sections of the country, staff correspondents were sent to Decatur to give impartial accounts of the trial. Usually the public has to depend on information furnished by local representatives of the Associated Press or some other news syndicate who are as narrow and one-sided as their fellow citizens and afraid to be non-partisan even if they desired.

Therefore, there was presented to readers throughout the United States and in other countries an accurate closeup of shocking conditions as they exist in sections of the South where the Civil War continues fresh and green in the people's memory, where law and order have broken down and where the fires of race hatred, bigotry and sectionalism burn with an intensity that arouses the inhabitants into a state of abnormal thinking and unrestrained fanaticism.

The Scottsboro defendants were accused of criminal assault by two young white women of questionable character on whose testimony they were convicted and sentenced to death. The United States Supreme Court refused to affirm the findings of the Alabama courts and ordered a retrial. The principal testimony adduced at the Patterson trial was from the lips of Victoria Price and Ruby Bates. One stuck to her original story, the other, her conscience pricking her, recanted and charged on the witness stand that the Negroes had been lied on and framed. One of the white males who was riding on the freight train at the time of the fight between white and colored boys corroborated the testimony given by Ruby Bates.

As to the credibility of the two female witnesses. Judge Horton said:

BULLETIN

NEW YORK.—A United Front Emergency Conference, with 253 delegates representing 65 Negro and white organizations, the Communist Party, the International Labor Defense, the Socialist Party, the Conference for Progressive Labor Action, and many clubs, lodges and churches, endorsed unanimously the Scottsboro March to Washington here yesterday, with the date for the March set as Friday, April 28.

(By Our Special Correspondent)

DECATUR, Ala., April 16.—Preparations are under way here today to proceed with two more moves, Monday, in the effort of the white southern ruling class to accomplish the legal lynching of the nine innocent Scottsboro Negro boys.

In a gala atmosphere of lynch-spirit and celebration, the Decatur court prepared to pass a murderous sentence of death against Haywood Patterson, first of the Scottsboro boys to be re-tried, and to open the trial of Charley Weems, second of the boys to face death a second time on framed charges of "rape" of two white women, one of whom has repudiated the accusation.

International Labor Defense attorneys will demand that the court set aside the lynch-verdict against Patterson, and postpone the trial of Charley Weems and the other seven boys until decision is made on the appeal which is being taken on the Patterson verdict to the State Supreme Court, and to the United States Supreme Court if the Alabama body refuses to reverse the verdict.

Charge Jury Tampering.

Charges that the state tampered with the jury during Patterson's trial in its desperate effort to obtain a death-verdict in the face of the overwhelming evidence of the innocence of the Scottsboro boys will be made in court by the I.L.D. attorneys, it was announced.

In the face of the tremendous tide of mass protest the world over, which finds its expression here in countless telegrams and resolutions demanding the freedom of the Scottsboro boys, from millions of workers in the United States and all over the world, the Alabama authorities are preparing to rush the sentence and the remaining re-trials, in an effort to cripple the defense of the boys. The telegrams and resolutions of protest, addressed to Judge James E. Horton, continue to pour in in a continuous flood, while the press dispatches indicate that a similar flood is pouring in on Governor B. M. Miller, at Montgomery, and on President Roosevelt at Washington, putting forward the same demands from black and white workers in increasing numbers.

The preparations being made here are this time almost solely confined to the local white population which whipped into a lynch-hysteria by the ruling class, is prepared to repeat the jubilations of two years ago in Scottsboro, where a band blared out the strains of "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," as each sentence was passed.

Monday's proceedings in court, besides the sentencing of Patterson, are expected to be taken up with argument on motions to quash the indictment against Charley Weems, and the venire called by Judge Horton to try him, on the ground that Negroes have been illegally excluded both from the Grand Jury that handed down the indictment, and from the venire, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment which guarantees the democratic rights of Negroes.

Judge Horton has already indicated that he would deny both motions, but Joseph R. Brodsky, chief counsel for the International Labor Defense, and General George W. Chamlee, of Chattanooga, chief of the Scottsboro legal defense corps, have announced they will fight for them in each case as it comes for trial.

Try to Subdue Publicity.

Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief trial attorney for the I.L.D. in the cases, is expected to arrive in Decatur, Tuesday morning for the opening of the trial itself.

Frightened by the unprecedented mass protest over the lynch-verdict against Haywood Patterson, the white capitalist newspapers have decided to "play down" the further trials, in an effort to stem the tide of mass resentment, and this decision is reflected in the absence of the elaborate preparations to "take care of the press" which marked the first re-trial.

At the same time the Birmingham "Post," [illegible] lynch-[illegible] carried only distorted accounts of the trial of Haywood Patterson, minimizing the absolute proofs of the innocence of the [illegible] and of the frame-up of the state's evidence, was forced to admit in an editorial Saturday that the boys are innocent.

"We believe a jury sworn to give the defendant the benefit of every reasonable doubt should not have convicted Heywood Patterson," the editorial says. "We feel that due weight should be given to the fact that a dozen responsible newspapermen, four of them representing Southern newspapers, felt there was a reasonable doubt of the Negroes' guilt."

Daily Worker

This last statement is in direct contradiction to the expression of the Southern newspapermen as expressed at the trial to your correspondent, and indicates the tremendous power of the mass protest against the lynch-verdict. The Southern newspapermen, and especially those from Birmingham, spent most of their time and energy during the trial trying to influence the Northern newspapermen to minimise the importance of defense testimony and to suppress the news of the activities of Ku Klux Klan mobs which were repeatedly formed to lynch the boys, their witnesses, and lawyers.

While Wade Wright, Morgan County solicitor, made his lynch-speech in court in place of a summation of the evidence, and called for a lynch-verdict or a lynching to show that "Alabama justice could not be bought with Jew money from New York," these correspondents referred to here sat in the court-room nodding vigorous approval to every word, while spectators, incited by the speech to lynch-hysteria answered fervidly "Yes!" or "No!" to Wright's demands.

Negro Students Hear Mrs. Patterson

NEW YORK.—Mrs. Janie Patterson, mother of Heywood Patterson and Dr. Kenneth Barnhart, ousted Sociology Professor of Birmingham Southern College, were the main speakers at Sunday's session of the Conference on Negro Students Problems held at International House.

Because he has been sympathetic with the defense of the innocent Scottsboro boys, and has refused to confine his teaching in the college to the spreading of the Southern ruling class myth of "white superiority" but has exposed the facts and economic basis of the oppression of the Negro people, Dr. Barnhart has been dropped from the staff of Birmingham Southern College.

Were it not for the well-known Negro-hating, New York-hating, Jew-hating, civilization-hating tendencies among many ignorant natives of the Southern hinterland, the verdict of guilty pronounced on the first of the Scottsboro Negroes would be amazing. To say that it ran counter to the evidence is to comment mildly. For it was based on nothing less than a Ku Klux Klan mentality among those who listened to the trial and no less among the twelve good men and true who, apparently, never once flinched from a preconceived determination to vindicate white bigotry. The jury saw fit to pretend to a belief in the testimony of Victoria Price, a confessed liar and prostitute, and reject the testimony of Ruby Bates, an erstwhile liar and woman of easy virtue who had shown praiseworthy ambition to mend her ways. However, examination of full reports from Decatur shows beyond all doubt that testimony on anybody's part had substantially nothing at all to do with the verdict. Probably the best that can be hoped for, in the long run, is a succession of trials for the remaining Negroes, up to the Supreme Court. Vol. XVI, no. 16,

One bright spot in this sad betrayal of justice is the brilliant work of Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of the defense lawyers, who gave his time and energy so unstintingly to this case without payment, and whose conduct of the proceedings, outside of a few minor slips, was characterized by remarkable ability. It must be stated, too, that Judge Horton, as indeed Mr. Leibowitz so gallantly conceded, performed his duty in a manner refreshingly free from the local passions surrounding him. We cannot go so far as to say that his conduct of the case was blameless, because at times he should, in our opinion, have overridden the prosecution's obvious attempt to inflame the jury and should have prevented the astounding statements of the prosecution instead of merely asking the jury to forget them. Nevertheless, Judge Horton was in a tight spot and perhaps could not wisely strain local and sectional pride too far.

Clearly a difficult, heart-breaking task lies ahead for the International Labor Defense and all friends of decency and justice. But it must be seen through to the end. Sectional and Caucasian prejudice cannot be allowed to triumph in this case as the conservative and nationalistic bigotry of Boston did with Sacco and Vanzetti.

On April 19, 1931, William Pickens field secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People writing to the DAILY WORKER, New York City, said:

"I have just seen a copy of the Daily Worker for April 1[illegible] and noted the fight which the workers are making through the International Labor Defense to prevent the judicial massacre of Negro Youth in Alabama.

"Enclosed is a small check for that cause. Please send it to the ILD in enclosed stamped envelope.

"The promptness with which the white workers have moved toward defending these helpless and innocent Negro boys, sons of black workers, is significant and prophetic. The only ultimate salvation for the Negro and white workers is in their united defense, one for the other. Other causes and movements may do a good work but all other causes are good only as preliminaries to that consummation. The one objective for final security is the absolute and unqualified unity and cooperation of ALL WORKERS, of all the exploited masses, across all race and color lines and all other lines.

"This is one occasion for every Negro who has intelligence enough to read to send aid to you and the ILD."

Mr. Pickens' statements are so true and reasonable that all we could say would only be by way of endorsement. yapsisa K..DN E's TAOIN SHRDL

Down in Alabama today while you and we are moving about in freedom, nine Negro youths ranging in age from 14 to 21 are being tried by a jury of all whites in a court room surrounded by armed guardsmen. And they say it will be a fair trial in an atmosphere which requires the calling out of U. S. guardsmen!

Although the trial is in progress, the cases having been remanded by the United States Supreme Court for retrial, there is great need for additional funds to pay the expenses of the defense. All who read these lines are requested to send their utmost to the Intrnational Labor Defense at its local headquarters, 245½ Alder street or to the national, 80 E. 11th St, Room 430, New York City.

VERDICT ASSAILED HERE.

Times 4-11-33

The verdict in the Scotsboro case was condemned sharply here yesterday as "worthy of Hitler," "lynch justice," "blind racial prejudice," "vicious" and as an obstacle in the way of interracial understanding, while plans were being made for two more meetings to protest against the outcome of the Alabama trial.

Norman Thomas, in a statement issued fro mthe headquarters of the Socialist party, declared that the verdict should be invalidated by higher courts and savored of Hitlerism.

"The Scottsboro verdict," he said in part, "following the kind of trial which was given to the Negro victims, is another terrible miscarriage of justice. A country which has rightfully protested the outrageous anti-Semitism now triumphant in Germany is proving once more that it does not come into court with clean hands. We ourselves practice worse discrimination against our own colored fellow citizens than those which now disgrace Germany.

"This is a case that involves not the right merely of the defendants but of their whole race of their brothers among the exploited workers of all races. The fight for justice must go on."

Deplore Communist Activity.

Following a meeting of the directors of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, a resolution adopted at the meeting condemning "racial prejudice which closed the eyes of the twelve jurors" and expressing the belief that a different verdict would have been obtained had not the Communist party entered the case was made public.

The board commended "the firmness and fairness in which Judge Horton conducted the trial," and said "other issues besides that of Patterson's guilt were on trial."

The most decisive factor in the determination of the verdict, the directors said, "was that communism was on trial as well."

Asserting that the Association for the Advancement of Colored People was the only organization that went to the aid of the Negroes in the first trial, and that after the trial the national office offered to put the full force of its entire organization behind the appeal, the directors said the defendants "rejected its offers of aid and chose to be defended by the International Labor Defense."

Fearing that the interjection of communism would gravely affect the interest of the defendants, the statement said, the association offered, in May, 1931, to cooperate with the International Labor Defense, and again in December, 1931, but both offers were rejected.

The statement said that the association contributed $1,000 toward the expense of appeal of the case to the United States Supreme Court, which ordered a new trial, and declared:

"It feels that the only remaining hope for the boys is to remove from the already overwhelming prejudices which militate against them the additional burden of communism."

It called for the organization of a "new defense committee," to which it promised full cooperation.

Blow to Interracial Understanding.

A statement issued by Eugene Kinckle Jones, executive secretary of the National Urban League, said that the verdict "indicates that justice for the Negro in certain types of cases is absolutely impossible in some sections of the South."

"As the trial progressed it seemed that the question of Patterson's guilt or innocence became secondary," Mr. Jones said, "and class, racial, sectional and religious issues took precedence. In this atmosphere the verdict of the jury was a foregone conclusion.

"The goal of interracial understanding in America is now further away."

A statement authorized by the directors of the American Civil Liberties Union and issued by Roger N. Baldwin, characterized the verdict as "lynch justice." "The jury reflected the ancient prejudices and race conflict which marks the treatment in the South of Negroes in and out of the courts," the statement said.

Announcing that the Civil Liberties Union had helped to raise money for the defense and that it would continue its activity on the Negroes' behalf, the statement concluded:

"No case involving justice to Negroes in our courts has symbolized more strikingly throughout the world the unfair character of trials of Negroes in our South. While we are convinced of the inocence of these boys, the question of their guilt or innocence is subordinate to that of impartial treals. Of course, the legality of excluding Negroes from jury panels is a question that will be taken to the United States Supreme Court."

Mass Meeting Called Tonight.

The International Labor Defense national office here announced that a mass demonstration of protest against "the lynch verdict" will be held tomorrow at 6 P. M. in Union Square. The speakers will include Joseph R. Brodsky of defense counsel at the trial and Dr. Joshua Kunitz, chairman of the national committee for the defense of political prisoners.

Another mass meeting will be held tonight in St. Luke's Church, 125 West 130th Street, the Labor Defense office also announced. The speakers will include Edward Sagarin, member of the National Students League, who was arrested at Decatur while attending the trial.

Open-air protest meetings were held in various parts of the city yesterday and telegrams condemning the verdict were sent to President Roosevelt and Governor Miller of Alabama.

A national signature campaign to a petition asking for a new trial for Haywood Patterson, adjournment of the other Scottsboro cases until a decision is reached by the Alabama Supreme Court on the Patterson case, and change of venue for the trials to Birmingham has been launched, William L. Patterson, secretary of the International Labor Defense, stated.

Rabbi A. M. Heller of the Flatbush Jewish Centre in Brooklyn, issued a statement, saying in part:

"A miscarriage of justice is possible in the most just of courts, but in the Scottsboro case the jury convicted before it had even listened to any evidence. The assumption of this type of jury must be that every colored person is potentially a criminal. Why wait until he actually commits a crime? Let us hang him before he has any chance to do it.

"The prosecuting attorney's injection of 'the Jew money' is damnable to say the least, as Jews are not concerned with the prejudice of the South."

PLAN NATIONAL AID AT NEGROES' TRIAL

CONFER WITH LEIBOWITZ

Defense Attorney Will Speak Tonight at Labor Defense Meeting in Union Square.

Nationally organized Negro defense of the nine Negroes involved in the Scottsboro case is being planned by New York leaders of the race.

Bill Robinson, Negro dancer, visited Samuel Leibowitz, counsel for the Scottsboro defendants yesterday and submitted a proposal that funds be raised with several benefit performances. Delegations representing various Negro organizations also called on the attorney.

"It now become apparent," Mr. Leibowitz said last night, "that irrespective of any small differences that may have arisen in the past between different organizations seeking to lead this fight, the race has reached the conclusion that this case marks a turning point in the life of the American Negro, who has been kept shackled by intolerance of the bigots. They are going through with the fight."

Mr. Leibowitz was announced as one of the principal speakers for a demonstration in Union Square at 8 o'clock tonight by the International Labor Defense. Mrs. Janie Patterson, mother of the Negro reconvicted in Decatur this week, is due in New York this afternoon and will attend the meeting.

Hays Listed as Speaker.

Others scheduled to speak are Joseph R. Brodsky, chief counsel for the International Labor Defense; John Haynes Holmes, Arthur Garfield Hays and Roger Baldwin.

The International Labor Defense, through William L. Patterson, its national secretary, assailed the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People yesterday for its statement of Monday to the effect that the injection of communism into the trial affected the verdict in the Patterson case.

"The directors of the N. A. A. C. P. have seen fit to gloat over the death verdict against Heywood Patterson," said the defense secretary. "They take the occasion of this verdict to bring forward a ridiculous claim that had they been in the case the verdict would have been different.

"They say that 'racial prejudice closed the eyes of the jurors' and at the same time that 'the injection of communism into the case brought about the death verdict.'

"Aside from the completely gratuitous confusion of the International Labor Defense, a non-partisan organization, with the Communist party, which is brought forward merely to hide the existence of a workers' organization of defense, this statement is in itself a contradiction.

Statement Declared Untrue.

"The statement that the N. A. A. C. P. has twice offered to cooperate with the International Labor Defense is a deliberate untruth. The statement that the N. A. A. C. P. went to the aid of the Scottsboro boys at the trial is another. The records prove this conclusively."

Harlem Negroes, led by several ministers of their race and by W. H. Davis, owner of The New Amsterdam, a Negro publication, plan to hold a number of mass meetings in Negro churches and at various outdoor points in Manhattan as well as in the other boroughs, Davis announced last night.

A. J. Muste, chairman of the conference for Progressive Labor Action, sent a letter yesterday to President Roosevelt asking that he use his influence to obtain a new trial for Patterson.

The conference, in a letter to The Amsterdam News, suggested yesterday that 50,000 Negroes be enlisted to march to Washington to protest against the Patterson verdict and that 50,000 white workers be asked to join the march.

Declaring the "Scottsboro [illegible] have [illegible] and are "innocent;" that "the whole world knows this, [illegible] that [illegible] acquitted and their lives safeguarded it will be because you have no power in your own State or do not wish to have it in this case," Anne C. Kennedy, in a telegram forwarded from New York to Gov. Miller and received yesterday, announced: "I have wired President Roosevelt whose wife is a friend of mine."

Dozens of messages and letters were received during the day from various sources, regarding the retrials at Decatur of the seven negroes convicted at Scottsboro more than two years ago, and condemned to death for criminally assaulting two young white women. References were frequently made in these communications to alleged threats to lynch the negroes, and to "lynch mobs." One referred to the defendants as "innocent children." Another declared that the "whole world watches." Repeated demands were made for transfer of the trials to Birmingham.

One of the most interesting telegrams received, came from San Francisco, signed with the names of Lincoln Steffens, Col. C. C. Erkins, Scott Wood, Upton Sinclair, and Orrick Johns, the last being secretary of the committee dispatching the message which said: "California committee of writers comprising 50 well known liberals demands immediate release of Scottsboro boys as result of Ruby Bates testimony and increased protection of their lives. Entire Nation will hold Alabama officials responsible if any violence is done."

Chinese Interested, Too

Chinese citizens of New York are also taking an active interest in the "Scottsboro boys," as evidenced by three different telegrams received. One stating: "We hold you responsible for safety of Scottsboro boys, defense attorneys and witnesses," was signed by Y. Young, secretary Chinese Anti-Imperialist Alliance, New York branch. Another signed by C. Chen, secretary, said: "In name of International Labor Defense Chinese branch here, we register against tolerance of lynching mobs in Decatur and demand guarantee of absolute safety for nine Scottsboro boys and defense attorneys." A third, signed by C. Yen, secretary Chinese Unemployed Alliance, stated: "We hold you responsible for the safety Scottsboro boys, defense attorneys witnesses."

The following message came from a group of "Southerners living in the North:" "May we as Southerners living in the North urge additional State troops to insure adequate protection of defendants, attorneys and witnesses at Decatur trial. We are concerned that the South be not further attacked for any possible lack of protection of defendants from mob violence or for failing to take every possible step to insure fair trial." It was signed by Dr. William H. Kilpatrick, Prof. George Mitchell and Prof. Hatcher Hughes, of Columbia University; Prof. Collis Stocking and Prof. Harry Zorbauch, of New York University, and Prof. William L. Nunn, of Dana College. The telegram was sent from New York.

Finally, concern for Ruby Bates was expressed in a telegram from William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense, New York, as follows: "Representing 160,000 members and affiliates demand change venue to Birmingham. Holding responsible freedom and safety Ruby Bats. Immediate unconditional release Scottsboro boys."

Jury To Resume Deliberations At Decatur Today

4-9-33

11-Hour Deadlock Ended When Judge Locks Up 12 Talesmen For Night

Severance Granted

Second Defendant Pleads 'Not Guilty' And Trial Is Set For April 17

Montgomery Ala. Advertiser

DECATUR, ALA., April 8.—(AP)—The jury weighing the evidence in the retrial of Heywood Patterson, of Chattanooga, first of the negroes indicted in the "Scottsboro attack case" tonight was ordered locked up by Judge James E. Horton at 11:30 p.m., after nearly 11 hours of consideration, and a verdict did not appear imminent. The jury was empaneled Friday, March 31, two days before testimony was begun.

Judge Horton instructed the jury he would receive a verdict tomorrow. He set 10 a.m. for court to reconvene tomorrow, precluding a verdict before that hour.

And this afternoon, while the jury was deliberating, attorneys for the negroes told Judge Horton "flaming crosses were burned in Huntsville and Scottsboro last night."

The statements were made as Joseph R. Brodsky, of New York, counsel for the negroes, moved for an indefinite continuance of the remainder of the cases while evidence to support a change of venue could be assembled.

"Since Solicitor Wade Wright made his speech in this courtroom against my race yesterday, I have received three threats against my life," Brodsky said. "We have remained silent during the trial of the first case, but the lives of myself and associates have been threatened."

Brodsky indicated the constiutional questions of the alleged absence of negroes from the venire would be raised in the trial of Charlie Weems, who, on his motion, was granted a severance, as was raised in the Patterson trial.

The defense refused to enter a plea for Weems until the court held such a plea must be entered, and an exception to the ruling was taken as a plea of "not guilty" was entered. Trial of Weems was set for April 17.

A week was consumed before the Patterson trial arguing the question of whether the defendant's constitutional rights had been violated because no negroes were included on the Grand Jury that indicted him, and then because no negroes were included in the venire for the trial. Both motions were overruled.

State Asked Severance

Asst. Solicitor Thomas S. Lawson had asked for a severance for Weems and Clarence Norris to try them together, as they were two years ago, when eight of the nine negroes accused of attacking two white women aboard a freight train were sentenced to death at Scottsboro.

Brodsky interposed with a motion for a severance for each of six negroes brought in for arraignment, and on it being granted, made his charge that his life was in danger.

As these charges were made, with Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of counsel for the negroes, joining with a statement that he had been told on authority he could not doubt "only intervention of the national guard prevented a mob of 200 from entering Decatur the other night," he also asserted "flaming crosses" were burned last night.

Judge Horton overruled the motion for an indefinite continuance, but granted severances for each of the other six negroes facing retrial here under a change of venue from Jackson County where they first were convicted.

Before the court ruled, Solicitor Wright said he had made only his customary "prosecution speech" and that in the seven years he had been prosecutor of the court, no one ever had been harmed "because of a speech I made." Wright added there was nothing personal in his remarks. The one to which Leibowitz objected was: "Are you going to let Jew money from New York buy justice in Alabama,"

All of the negroes in the case except Patterson, tonight were quietly removed to Birmingham under military escort, to remain until April 17, when Weems faces trial.

While the argument went on in the courtroom, and the venire was drawn for the Weems trial less than 20 feet away, behind closed doors the jury was weighing the evidence in the Patterson case which has attracted worldwide attention.

Less than a score of persons were present as Weems and the other five granted new trials with Patterson by the U. S. Supreme Court were brought in the courtroom.

After the severance, the other five, Clarence Norris, Andy Wright, Ozie Powell, Olen Montgomery and Willie Robertson were taken back to the jail.

Throughout the afternoon the jury which received the case at 12:45 p.m remained locked in the jury room, [illegible] Judge James E. Horton, presiding, explain[illegible] what portions of the [illegible] the trials two years ago had been admitted into evidence.

In [illegible] contrast with the crowds of the week, the courtroom was [illegible] deserted this afternoon, only lawyers, newspapermen, [illegible] attaches and a few scattered spectators standing within the building.

Telegrams, however, have continued to pour into Decatur to Atty. Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., protesting "attempts to lynch" Patterson, the other defendants, and attorneys defending them. Most of the telegrams also demand a change of venue to Birmingham, and "immediate and unconditional release" of the negroes.

The messages are in the same phraseology as thousands which have been received by Knight and Gov. B. M. Miller since April 9, 1931, when Patterson and seven of the negroes were sentenced to death in the electric chair.

In charging the jury today, Judge Horton for the first time made public the fact that he had been receiving telegraphic protests on the trials.

"The court has been vexed about a great many things," Judge Horton said in warning the jury against letting outside influence govern their verdict. "It may have been evident to you that a great many telegrams have come in here to me since I have been here, but, gentlemen, they do not affect me whatever. The great principle the court desires to see done, the great thing the jury desires to see done, is to see justice done in this case."

Judge Horton, in instructing the jury said two verdicts could be returned, an acquittal or a conviction, and, in the latter case, the jury must fix the punishment. Conviction carries with it a maximum penalty of death in the electric chair at Kilby Prison, or, in the discretion of the jury, a prison sentence of not less than 10 years.

Considerable attention was given by Judge Horton in his charge to the conflicting testimony of the two alleged victims of the attack aboard a freight train in Jackson County on March 25, 1931.

"One is Ruby Bates," said Judge Horton, "who sat on the witness stand and admitted she had perjured herself."

The appearance of the Bates girl Thursday just as the defense prepared to rest its case was one of the most dramatic incidents of the trial which has attracted world wide attention. She took the stand to deny her testimony in the previous trials so far as it related to her being attacked.

The judge told the jurors that it was for them to determine the credibility of the witnesses.

"The law has a stern duty to perform," he said. "Women of the underworld come before it, and the law says it is the duty of the jury to consider that fact, not that the law would trample them down."

Discusses Price Woman

Turning to the testimony of Victoria Price Judge Horton said evidence had been produced that "she is a woman of easy virtue. Evidence has been introduced to show that she made false statements. They claim she swore falsely about meeting Jack Tillery in a " 'jungle' at Huntsville."

"That becomes a question for you gentlemen to decide whether she has sworn falsely about material facts," he said.

Then, with an explanation of a "reasonable doubt," Judge Horton charged the jury that, if the State had not convinced them "beyond a reasonable doubt," an acquittal should be returned, but if the evidence showed all doubt had been removed, a verdict of conviction should be returned.

Attorneys for the State and for the defense hurled charges of "frame up" as they argued before the jury, the one for conviction and the extreme penalty, the other for an acquittal.

Leibowitz told the jury the defense did not want a compromise verdict, but wanted him freed.

Knight Asks Death Verdict

Knight, in closing for the State, asked for a verdict of guilty with a sentence of death.

Mention was made by Knight of the telegrams he had received as he argued the case.

"We aren't lynching people in Alabama, legally or illegally," he shouted. "But the name of the State of Alabama has been lynched."

Knight dwelt at length on defense testimony, particularly that of Ruby Bates, whom he said "has sold out lock, stock, and barrel.

"I told Ruby Bates, in a conference in Birmingham, that I did not want to burn this negro, or any other one, if he was not guilty and asked her to tell me the truth," Knight said. "And she reasserted that she had been attacked.

"Why didn't she come to me with her repudiation?"

Knight told the jury the State wanted no verdict, "based on racial or religious prejudice, race nor creed has no place in this case. It must be decided on evidence alone."

Like Knight and Judge Horton, Leibowitz mentioned the outside influences and once, in his four hours of argument, told the jury "you are deciding more than this case, you are deciding a world issue."

Leibowitz paused in his concluding argument to again comment on outside influences, declaring "I am not an I. L. D. (International Labor Defense). I am not a Communist. I don't belong to that bunch."

The New York attorney who has directed the defense in this trial, yesterday declared he was not receiving a penny for his services. He previously had said he entered the case at the invitation of the I. L. D.

Judge Orders Guardsmen to Shoot to Kill if Attempt Is Made to Lynch Negroes.

LEIBOWITZ IS PROTECTED

New York, N.Y.

Doctor Is Skeptical on the Medical Aspects of the State's Case.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, April 5.—A dramatic pronouncement from the bench interrupted the trial of Haywood Patterson toda yas he and five other Negroes testified before Judge James E. Horton that Victoria Price swore falsely that they attacked her on a freight train near Scottsboro two years ago.

Taking official notice of reports that a mob was plotting to lynch the nine Negro prisoners lodged in the rickety old jail and run Samuel S. Leibowitz, their chief counsel out of town, Judge Horton ordered the National Guardsmen on duty here to shoot at the first sign of trouble and to shoot to kill.

Despite the increasing impatience of residents of Jackson and Morgan Counties with the painstaking defense prepared for the Negroes by the International Labor Defense, a Communist adjunct, today's proceedings were not marked by the slightest demonstration, not even when Patterson charged that he was "framed" at his first trial in Scottsboro.

The crowd of countrymen in overalls and blue denim shirts listened attentively as Dr. E. E. Reisman, Chattanooga gynecologist, explained to the jury that the Price woman's story of the attack contained biological inconsistencies.

Skeptical of Woman's Evidence.

The medical testimony offered by the State against the nine defendants at Scottsboro and against Patterson here, said Dr. Reisman, was sufficient in itself to make a man of science skeptical about Mrs. Price's statement that she was attacked by six Negroes an hour and a half or two hours prior to her examination at Scottsboro.

The Negroes who denied their guilt today were Willie Robertson, Olen Montgomery, Ozie Powell, Andy Wright, Eugene Williams and Patterson. The first three denied that they had engaged in a fight with the white youths or had seen the girls on the train, while the last three denied seeing the girls but admitted participating in the fracas with the white youths.

Aside from the six accused Negroes and Dr. Reisman, the only other witness of the day was Percy Ricks, fireman of the freight train on which Mrs. Price said she was attacked. He testified that when the Negroes were taken off at Paint Rock by an armed posse, the two women seemed just as anxious to get away as the Negroes.

"I saw them both running up toward the engine," he said. "Some of the men with shotguns came around and headed them off. Then they turned and ran the other way until another batch of men came up from that direction and stopped them."

While the Negroes were testifying, Judge Horton, after a whispered consultation with Attorney General Knight and Captain Joseph Burleson, commanding the militia here, ordered the jury taken from the Court. He then delivered his warning in phrases that fell from his lips like the bullets he promised to lynchers.

"The court wishes to make an announcement," he began. "The audience generally has been orderly and has given respectful attention to the testimony for the most part. These prisoners were given protection at the trial in Scottsboro, and the Sheriff's force and the National Guardsmen are here to protect them now.

"The court also wants it known that it will protect any one else connected with this trial. Whether or not the reports of impending trouble have any foundation, the court does not know. Sometimes rumors occur that are without foundation, but sometimes they reach the point where notice must be taken of them.

"The court is conscious of this fact, that it is trying to arrive only at the truth in this case. If these defendants are guilty they should be punished. If they are not guilty, they should be acuitted. That is for the count and the jury to determine.

"Any one outside, who has not heard the testimony and who attempts to prejudice the case has no right to be heard. These prisoners are under the protection of the court. The court intends to protect them."

No Tolerance for Mob Spirit.

At this point Judge Horton raised his voice, and his face was stern as he continued:

"Any group of men, and I don't say that there are such, who attempt to take the law into their own hands, are unworthy of the protection of the State of Alabama. They are unfit to be citizens. Men who would join in anything that would cause the death of these Negroes not only are murderers, but cowardly murderers.

"The soldiers and the Sheriff's men are expected to defend these prisoners with their lives. Any man who defies them may expect to forfeit his life.

"I have no tolerance for mob spirit. Your very civilization depends upon the carrying out of your laws in an orderly manner.

"I am going to strengthen the guard if necessary, and remember you've got to kill these guards before you get these prisoners. The guards understand that. When it comes to a question of right and wrong there can be no compromise.

"If there are any meetings in this town where such matters are discussed the men who attend them should be ashamed of themselves."

From officers of the National Guard it was learned that a mass meeting, to which 200 young men of the community were invited by telephone, was held in a hall near the court house last night to "protest against the manner in which Mr. Leibowitz has examined the State's witnesses." There was talk there, the officers said, of riding the New York lawyer out of town and lynching the Negroes.

Upon learning of the meeting, Captain Burleson sent several of his men to the apartment hotel where Mr. Leibowitz is staying and doubled the guard around the jail.

Undercover men reported to Captain Burleson that the strategy of the lynchers, if they decide to flout the warning of the court, will be to start trouble at the apartment house to draw off the force at the jail.

Mrs. Leibowitz, who has been with her husband here, left for New York tonight.

"We'll be ready for them if they come," said Captain Burleson. "Just because my men and I are Southerners and these prisoners are Negroes need not lead any one to think we won't do our duty. So long as we have a piece of ammunition or a man alive, those prisoners will be protected."

Arrangements have been made with the local fire department to send an engine to the jail at the first sign of trouble. The cold water treatment will be used first, Captain Burleson said. If that does not disperse the mob, tear gas bombs will be thrown. Bayonets and bullets will be reserved as a last resort but if they are used it will be to kill, said the young National Guard officer.

John Thompson, solicitor of Jackson County who prosecuted the Negroes at their first trial, said feeling was even more intense in Scottsboro today than it was two years ago, but that he had heard nothing of a lynching mob forming there. Scottsboro is more than fifty miles away.

"There might be trouble though," he conceded, "if these Negroes are acquitted or if the trial lasts too long. The first trial cost the people of Jackson County about $3,000 and this one will cost double that amount.

Each of the Negroes who testified today was confronted by the record of his testimony at the previous trial. Attorney General Knight questioned them sharply on even the most minute discrepancies, causing frequent objections by Mr. Leibowitz and warning by the court to the Attorney General.

Troops Guard Leibowitz at Alabama Trial

By TOM CASSIDY.

(Staff Correspondent of The News)

DECATUR, Ala., March 31.—A chain guard of National Guardsmen tonight surrounded Samuel S. Leibowitz, defense attorney in the Scottsboro case, as the result of serious threats against his life made in powerful circles.

Leibowitz pugnaciously fought to enforce the Fifteenth Amendment, giving equal rights to whites and colored people, when an all-white jury was selected in picturesque Morgan County courthouse today. An Alabama moon washed the courthouse in its yellow sheen before Leibowitz ended his aggressive, belligerent grilling of the 100 white talesman.

Samuel S.
Leibowitz

He then went to his rooms in the Cornelian Apartments, where he is living with his wife, Mrs. Belle Leibowitz, and was surprised to find riflemen posted at the door to the quarters.

Only then Leibowitz learned his life had been threatened, for the threat was not made to him directly.

"The thing is serious," Capt. Joseph Burleson, in command of the National Guard platoon on duty at the courthouse in this history-making trial, told the Brooklyn lawyer defending Haywood Patterson, first of the seven Scottsboro colored youths to go on trial for their lives a second time for attacks on two white girl hoboes.

Won't Reveal Details.

Capt. Burleson declined to reveal the details of his information regarding the threats. The report is they were made by individuals who lead powerful local groups.

Leibowitz aroused the anger of courtroom spectators today by the way he questioned all of the twelve young white farmers and small merchants selected as jurors to try the colored men. Not a single colored man appeared in the venire from which the jurors was selected, and the Brooklyn lawyer harped on this fact as a violation of the Fifteenth Amendment.

Leibowitz capped the climax of his heated sallies by asking Judge James E. Horton to quash the entire venire because all colored citizens were excluded.

White Cultist Objects.

At this point Fred Morgan, a leader of the "All Day Singers," a fanatical religious sect, leaped to his feet in the courtroom and informed the bench he "never heard the like" of the way Leibowitz questioned white talesman. Judge Horton tried to ease the tension by saying:

"In our laws we know neither race nor color. Jew or Gentile, native born, nor foreigner. All persons are alike."

The twelve jurors picked were locked up in a local hotel until Monday, when the trial resumes.

TRUTH AT DECATUR, ALA.

Outspoken critics of the South's traditional paternalistic policy toward the Negro usually give credit to those opposed to treating colored Americans as full-fledged citizens for their naked frankness in giving expression to their views, however wrong they may be. But at the second trial of the defendants in the famous Scottsboro case held in Decatur, Alabama, instead of making unqualified statements as to their treatment of Negroes there has been much "ducking and dodging" on important issues.

Samuel Leibowitz of New York, who was induced to represent the defendants at the instance of the International Labor Denfense, raised the question of the right of the Negro to sit on juries in the state courts as provided by the Fourteenth Amendment. His attack of the illegal selective jury system in the South in which only white citizens are chosen as jurors, has occasioned considerable alarm and dismay throughout the Southland.

It is general knowledge that Negroes are excluded from juries in Alabama. But Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, Jr., refuses to admit that such rank discrimination exists. Mr. Leibowitz was told to prove his charge, which he proceeded to do adroitly and convincingly.

Arthur J. Tidwell, one of the county's three jury commissioners, was on the stand. Turning to Mr. Tidwell, sitting with the bulky jury roll propped up before him on a chair, Mr. Leibowitz continued his examination as follows:

"You and your fellow commissioners are required to place on that roll the names of all citizens who possess the qualifications prescribed by law—all citizens—isn't that true?"

Mr. Tidwell conceded that such was his understanding of the law.

"Now isn't it a fact," demanded the New York defense attorney, "that all the names written in that book are the names of white citizens"

"I don't know," said Mr. Tidwell.

"Do you mean that for an honest answer?" shouted Mr. Leibowitz.

Mr. Tidwell swung around in his chair and seemed about to rise. Several onlookers in the first row of spectators leaned forward.

"Do you mean to say that I would swear falsely?" demanded the jury commissioner, color rising in his cheeks.

"I don't mean to say anything, I'm asking you a question," snapped the defense attorney with a rising voice.

"Can you point to the name of any colored citizen on the page?" The defense lawyer's finger was pointing to the first sheet in the book.

Mr. Tidwell bent forward to study it better. "I don't know whether they are white, black or yellow," he insisted.

Despite Mr. Tidwell's flareup about his veracity, how many in court really felt that the witness was telling the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth?

At the beginning of the trial there were some white natives who, with accustomed naivete, spoke their minds even if what they said was a serious reflection on their mentality. Curiously enough, one was the editor of The Progressive Age—J. S. Benson by name. This "authority" stated on the witness stand that it would be well nigh impossible to convince him that anyone but a white man possessed the "sound judgment" and "training in law and justice," which he regarded as essential for a "fair and impartial verdict." In the opinion of the witness, "All Negroes steal."

This is the type of Southern white who is to be more pitied than censured. With him its a case of "Where ignorance is bliss its folly to be wise." He does not libel the Negro race, for no intelligent or liberal-minded person would take his wild and untruthful remarks seriously. The forward-thinking white people of Alabama must be proud of him and pridefully point to his lamentable ignorance about the Negro in this progressive age. He ought to change the name of his sheet.

There was a good reason for Jury Commissioner Tidwell giving the sort of testimony he did. Officials in Alabama and elsewhere have become convinced that the United States Supreme Court is to be called upon to determine without equivocation, whether the Negro is to enjoy full citizenship — whether the Fourteenth Amendment is enforceable in one section of the country and unenforceable in another section.

This issue might just as well be settled now once and for all.

Alabama on Trial

NOT SEVEN BLACK YOUTHS, ridiculously and falsely accused of attacking two white girls who have little to recommend them except their white skins, are on trial at Decatur, but the entire State of Alabama as represented by its more than one million white population. The charge against Alabama is not rape but attempted murder. The evidence against the state in what has come to be known as the Scottsboro case is irrefutable and conclusive, far more so than that to be presented against the seven of the nine youths Alabama seeks to condemn to death.

Age 4-5-33
New York N.Y.

IN HEARTLESS FASHION Alabama has got away for a long time with her crimes against the more than one million Negroes in her population who, though they live there, work there, pay taxes and die there, have been deprived of their rights as citizens of the state and of the nation by law and by extra-legal methods. And Alabama may get away with the Scottsboro case and send the seven boys on trial to their deaths; but not until after this state's own crime will have been exposed to the world for what it is. That much is certain.

ALABAMA has got away with her crimes against the Negro for so long that she has become ignorantly brazen of what she is doing and couldn't be fair in a case like the Scottsboro case even if she wanted to be fair. The fight over the exclusion of Negro citizens from her juries and grand juries, and the remarks of the judge who is to preside over the Scottsboro trials, illustrate how utterly hopeless, brazen and God-forsaken Alabama is in her crimes. While the president of the Morgan county jury board was disavowing the exclusion of Negro citizens from jury duty, during which he admitted that he did not know of one Negro in the county who could qualify as a juror, a white Alabaman in the courtroom was heard to remark: "We've never had niggers in our juries yet and we never will." His companion responded with: "If we told them they could, there isn't a nigger here who would dare try to sit on a jury." And this in the county and in the very courtroom in which the accused youths must hope to get a fair adjudication of the charges against them. Alabama carried her point.

The judge overruled the defense's motion to quash the indictments on the ground of jury exclusion. Alabama won her point, but in winning it was forced to give incriminating evidence against herself.

THE PRESIDING JUDGE knows Alabama is on trial and before proceeding, among other things, said:

> ". . . I have had occasion to preside at trials involving some who were very rich and prominent and some who were not so rich or prominent . . . but in all I have felt that true justice was meted out. . . .
> "So far as the law is concerned, it knows neither native nor alien, Jew or Gentile, black or white. This case is no different from any other. We have only our duty to do without fear or favor. It would be a blot on the men and women of this country, a blot on all of you, if you were to let any act of yours mar the course of justice in this or any other case. . . ."

ALABAMA KNOWS that she has excluded Negroes from her juries on the ground of color and contrary to the United States Constitution. She knows that there are Negroes in every one of her counties who are thoroughly competent to sit on juries. Her judges know that there is one law for whites and another for colored. In one breath she admits that all of these things are true and in the next disavows them and proceeds with her immediate plan to murder seven of the nine Scottsboro case defendants on trial and call it justice.

NEW YORK ATTACKED IN SCOTTSBORO TRIAL

Prosecutors Also Hint at Perjury in Its "Surprise Testimony."

MISTRIAL MOTION FAILS

New York.

But Judge Instructs Jurors to Ignore Remarks of County Solicitor at Decatur.

DEFENSE ARGUMENT OPENS

Leibowitz Will Conclude This Morning and Case Is Expected to Reach the Jury Today.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., April 7.—The issue of Alabama against New York City and the clothes, manners and customs of its people was brought up here today before Judge James E. Horton and the jury, which is trying Haywood Patterson, a Negro, for his life.

Summing up for the State at the close of the first of the new "Scottsboro trials," Wade Wright, circuit solicitor of Morgan County, made a frank appeal to local pride, sectionalism, race hatred and bigotry.

"Show them," he said—pointing at the counsel table at which were seated Samuel S. Leibowitz of New York, chief defense counsel, and Joseph Brodsky, counsel for the International Labor Defense, a Communist affiliate—"show them that Alabama justice cannot be bought and sold with Jew money from New York."

At this remark, Mr. Leibowitz arose and asked the judge to declare a mistrial.

"Conviction now, after what he has said, will not be worth a pinch of snuff," he asserted.

The court denied the motion and Mr. Wright continued along the same line, while Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, the chief prosecuting officer of the State, fidgeted in his chair.

When the circuit solicitor finished, Judge Horton told the jury to disregard Wright's statement about "Jew money from New York."

Mr. Leibowitz then began his appeal, urging the jurors to give the Negro defendant the benefit of the "reasonable doubts."

The New York attorney had not finished when the court declared a recess until tomorrow morning. Mr. Leibowitz will then conclude his final argument and Attorney General Knight will say the last word for the State. After that Judge Horton will charge the jurors, and they probably will begin deliberations by noon.

"New York Clothes" a Target.

Circuit Solicitor H. G. Bailey opened the State's argument. In his address there were several references to the "fancy New York clothes" which Lester Carter and Ruby Bates were wearing when they appeared as surprise witnesses for the defense, the girl repudiating her former story of an attack and the young white "hobo" charging Victoria Price, the other alleged victim, with a "frame-up."

His remarks were of such a nature, however, that Mr. Leibowitz took no exception to them. But when Mr. Wright, whose voice has raised him to pre-eminence among local all-day singers, began to speak all the hatred and prejudice that these cases have aroused bubbled to the surface.

Mr. Wright spoke of the reversal of the Supreme Court of Alabama by the United States Supreme Court after Communist sympathizers took up the cudgels for the nine Negro defendants, all but one of whom had been sentenced to die in the electric chair.

But it was New York City, "its sinister influence," and the Jews on which he dwelt and upon which he turned the full flower of his oratory.

"Did you ever hear of a more damnable effort to destroy and break down this girl? How did they do it.

"That man Carter is a new kind of a man to me. Did you watch his hands? If he had been with Brodsky another two weeks he would have been down here with a pack on his back a-trying to sell you goods. Are you going to countenance that sort of thing?"

From a front-row seat among the spectators there came a resonant "No!" uttered with the fervor of "Amen" in church.

"Don't you know these people, these defense witnesses are bought and paid for?

"May the Lord have mercy on the soul Ruby Bates!

"Now the question in this case is this:

"Is justice going to be bought and sold in Alabama with Jew money from New York?"

Mr. Leibowitz interposed here with mistrial motion and after it was denied Mr. Wright continued:

"It was Brodsky, too, who brought in Ruby Bates. The same Brodsky who put the fancy city clothes, New York clothes on Lester Carter, and I tell you gentlemen that Ruby Bates was guilty of perjury right here in this court room. And there is such a thing as subordination of perjury."

The Bates girl "couldn't tell you all the things that happened in New York because part of it was in the Jew language," he said.

Mr. Wright then attacked the testimony relative to Ruby Bates's presence in "hobo jungles".

He referred to Carter as "Mr. Carterinsky, as he is now" and Mr. Leibowitz again asked for a mistrial, this motion also being denied.

Mr. Wright concluded with the statement that a verdict of guilty in this case "will resound around the world as a victory for law enforcement."

When he had finished Judge Horton said:

"The court rules that the statement regarding Jew money from New York was simply improper and unjustified and the court asks you members of the jury to disregard it and put it out of your minds."

Leibowitz Asks Square Deal.

In opening his argument Mr. Leibowitz explained that "all New Yorkers do not have horns."

"The least said about sectionalism and prejudice the better," he declared.

"Now, I'm not going to assault your ears with any such ranting and raising the roof as you have been forced to hear from the gentleman seated over there. I shall appeal to your reason as logical, intelligent human beings, determined to give even this poor scrap of colored humanity a fair, square deal.

"What is the argument of the learned solicitor? Change the charge and you would hear the same stereotyped phrases. 'The fair State of Alabama, foreigners,' and all the rest of that claptrap.

"What is it but an appeal to prejudice, to sectionalism, to bigotry? What he is saying is, 'Come on, boys! We can lick this Jew from New York! Stick it into him! We're among our home folk.'

"It was the speech of a man taking an unfair advantage—a hangman's speech."

Mr. Leibowitz surveyed the court room crowd. He had been threatened with tar and feathers, with whipping and with gunpowder and lead.

"Now, as for the Jew money from New York, let me say this. That when the hour of our country's need came there was no question of Jew or gentile, of black or white—all, all together braved the smoke and flame of Flanders Fields.

"Now, I'm not getting any fee in this case and I'm not getting a penny of expenses for myself and my wife who was here with me.

"Mobs mean nothing to me. Let them hang me, I don't care. Life is only an incident in the Creator's scheme of things, but if I can contribute my little bit to see that justice is served then my mission is fulfilled."

Mr. Leibowitz said he was not here as a crusader nor to ask social equality for Negroes, "but to see that the law guaranteeing equal protection to all races in our courts is observed."

In rebuttal evidence Attorney General Knight sought to introduce the testimony of a white inmate of Kilby Prison, whose death sentence for murder has been commuted by the Governor to tell the jury that while Patterson was in the death house, he expressed the wish that he "had killed those girls." Judge Horton refused to allow the witness, Burtus Frost, to testify and the lifer left the courtroom with a prison guard.

The Bates girl was recalled but quickly excused by Mr. Knight after Judge Horton ruled that her cross-examination had been concluded and that if she were to testify at all it would be as the Attorney General's witness.

W. H. Hill, the station agent at Paint Rock, where an armed posse stopped the train on which the attacks are alleged to have taken place, Hill testified that the Bates girl, who declares now that she "only told what Victoria told," at the first trials, was the one who told him the Negroes had attacked her.

Wire Rosevelt of "Klan Mobs."

A statement that Ku Klux Klan mobs were being organized to lynch the Scottsboro defendants was telegraphed to President Roosevelt yesterday by William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense.

The message urged the President to "guarantee the safety of these people in Alabama, where law enforcement is non-existent, so far as protection to Negroes or any one interested in preventing murder of Negroes is concerned."

The International Labor Defense said that protest demonstrations will be held all over the country today under its auspices "against the attempts to lynch the Scottsboro boys."

The New York demonstration will start with a mobilization at 110th Street and Fifth Avenue at 2 P. M., followed by a march through Harlem, it was announced.

Holier Than Thou Text Preached to Scottsboro Jurors

DECATUR, Ala., April 2 (US).—The jury of three farmers and nine townsmen in the Scottsboro case heard a sermon today urging tolerance and understanding. The trial was not mentioned.

The jurors were taken to the Episcopal Church, in custody of bailiffs. The Rev. Peter Mack Dennis asked his parishioners not to sow the seed of hatred. Referring to the Manchurian situation, he said:

"We have criticized the Japanese for going into Manchuria, and yet, in Peiping, we have our Marines with bayonets and one of the largest wireless stations in the world. This is a typical 'holier-than-thou' attitude which is similar to that of the woman who leaves her neighbor's house and says, 'I observed some dust on the table,' when, at the same time, she had swept the dust in her own home under the linoleum."

This Tennessee River community remained unruffled today. The five alleged radical organizers who were arrested yesterday on charges of distributing propaganda for the defense in the Negro quarter were cited to appear before Circuit Judge James E. Horton tomorrow for contempt of court, but they were reported to have left town. Three white sympathizers from New York, one a woman, and two Birmingham Negroes, were picked up by local police and detained for several hours. Their literature was confiscated.

Testimony in the case of Haywood Patterson, first of the seven Scottsboro Negroes to be re-tried after the U. S. Supreme Court set aside their death sentences for criminal assault on two white women, will open tomorrow morning.

Defends Alabama

People's Editor:

Your editorial regarding the Scottsboro case betrays some common impressions on the race problem by one who never lived in those parts of the South where Negroes comprise half the population. A review of the facts of this crime should, it seems to me, result in commending the citizens of Alabama for forbearance in bringing the criminals to trial, rather than permitting direct action. However, some people, whose wives and daughters live at a safe distance from the black belt, get smug satisfaction in moralizing on southern justice.

Suppose a lynching had occurred. What an opportunity that would have been to moralize! They were tried before a white jury—so the trial must have been unfair. If half of the jury had been colored, and had returned the same verdict, I presume the editor would say: "The jurymen must have been intimidated!" But why reason about it? Let's wave the bloody shirt instead!

If Negroes, as a group, are as easily mistreated as the writer infers, why don't they come to Massachusetts where they can (but seldom do) serve on juries? Here's why: They are happier in Alabama, where they have a social position in the social structure and where every Negro of good character has his "white folks" who are his friends, even though they do not recognize him as an equal. In the East, on the other hand, the Negro occupys an anomalous position. He is equal before the law, perhaps, but is certainly not regarded as an equal socially, in business or in the arts. If you doubt this ask any Negro.

And by the way—why so much concern over a criminal case in another state? Wasn't the Sacco-Vanzetti affair in Massachusetts—and didn't the Traveler state that such cases should be settled in the state courts—not in newspapers or by outsiders?

I am not a southerner. I lived in Alabama. THINK IT OVER.

I.L.D. Compels Retraction from United Press on False Story About Defense Attorney

New York N.Y.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., March 23.—The newspapers of the South, as well as the capitalist press services, have been mobilized to assist the Alabama landlords and bosses in lynching, judicially or otherwise, the nine innocent Scottsboro Negro boys when they come up for their second trial in Decatur on March 27.

An instance is the false story spread over the country by the United Press, that Irving Schwab, International Labor Defense attorney, had been withdrawn from the case.

Chamlee Nails Lie.

In a statement issued today from Chattanooga, Gen. George W. Chamlee, chief of the Scottsboro legal defense corps, vigorously denied the announcement attributed to him that Schwab had been withdrawn.

Following a demand by William L. Patterson, national secretary of the I.L.D., that it retract the story, the United Press sent out the following item:

"Irving Schwab, attorney of the International Labor Defense is still one of the defense counsel for the eight Negro boys charged with attacking two white girls in the Scottsboro, Ala. case, according to William L. Patterson, national secretary of the I.L.D. 'Mr. Schwab is still associate counsel in the Scottsboro case and will remain so,' Patterson said in denying a report that the attorney had been withdrawn."

The I. L. D. has subpoenaed 23 Negroes in Jackson County, who are qualified to serve on juries, to support its first motion, and other witnesses from Morgan County, in which Decatur is situated, on the motion to dismiss the jury panel. Through these witnesses it will prove that Negroes have been illegally excluded from grand and petit juries for forty years.

Militia Threatened.

Knight was in Decatur today to confer with Sheriff Davis of Morgan County in their last-minute joint preparations to insure the murder of the Scottsboro boys. He has announced in advance that he will probably call the militia "to prevent the Scottsboro boys from escaping."

This, the I. L. D. charges, is direct lynch-incitement. There is no danger of the boys "escaping."

The I. L. D. has called on all workers and their organizations, Negro and white, throughout the world, to intensify their mass protest HATRED UNDER THE BAGNOLIA BLOSSOMS!

The hired pens of the International Labor Defense League, it seems to us, have taken to writing their little hymns of hate in faded violet ink.

Not that the paid hack writers are altogether lacking in imagination and sulphuric splutters. Nothing of the kind! They still show gifts for grinding out fiction and always they can repeat 'Legal Lynching', 'Legal Murder', and 'Boss Control', not to mention the other half-dozen words of the American Communist Party vocabulary.

But the dirty-collared, long-haired young men who sit in New York offices of the International Labor Defense League and write 'news' dispatches of what is happening in Scottsboro, Ala., have not been earning their daily bread. Or at least, they are failing to make good on a job which any mediocre hate-propagandist should succeed.

Unembarrassed by questions of truth, and unhampered by any prejudices in favor of facts, which they might feel if they actually were on the scene, it seems to us that these gentlemen at least should make the poison more painful than they have of late.

Now since these paid scrubs of journalism are trying to make a case and are not embarrassed by numerous flights of fancy, and are not concerned with justice in either direction, there is no complaint to make against the phrase, 'nine innocent Negro boys', and 'Attorney General Knight's legal lynch plans', which flower in nearly every piece of literature coming from the League's Hate-Hokum factory.

They make no pretense that they are not painting the prisoners lily-white in 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' fashion. And they make no pretense that they are not trying to picture the State of Alabama and its law enforcement agencies, its courts and its people as red-eyed monsters with bloodstained, spurred boots, horsewhips and noosed ropes, up to God knows what, plans for making existence more unbearable for pig-stuck Workers.

But former experiences with these literary gentlemen had taught us to expect more from them.

Take the following paragraphs which were culled from one of the latest 'ditpatches' manufactured in the I. L. D. workshop, mailed to newspapers, churches and not a few of the Oo-or-Die 'liberal' organizations.

It seems that the defenders of the Scottsboro rapists object to Decatur as a trial site. They write:

> Decatur, I. L. D. officials pointed out, is a town of 20,000 population, only about 50 miles from Scottsboro, and about the same distance from Huntsville, the center from which the organization of 'vigilance committee' to make sure of the lynching of the boys, has spread.
> It is also the center for gangs of criminals who infest the railway lines of Alabama, and make a special practice of terrorizing and beating Negroes. Described by Northern Alabamians as a 'big Saturday town', it is another Scottsboro on a larger scale. By the expression, it was explained, is meant that it is a town whose normal population is swelled on Saturdays, holidays, and court days, by a huge influx of white farmers, who come in armed and ready for a lynching or any other form of excitement that might present itself.
> The population being about nine times that of Scottsboro, and of much the same composition, Decatur on court day would present much the same aspect as Scottsboro did on the April, 1931, day when a band played 'There'll Be A Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight' as the lynch - verdicts were handed down against the Negro boys.

Decatur, the quiet but kindly little North Alabama town, doubtless is surprised to learn of its lawlessness. The citizens of Decatur do not care to stage the Scottsboro trial in their city. And if the trial is held there, they will endure it as an expensive duty just as Scottsboro did. (And Scottsboro, a victim of geopraphical circumstances, is downright sick of the mess.)

But we should like to help the weary hate-hacks.

Why not go the whole hog and spread some real hatred toward Alabama and Alabamians?

We submit to them that:

There is an unwritten law in this State that every male white Boss in Alabama must practice bird hunting first on the down trodden white and Negro workers, before reaching the age of twelve years.

The police departments of all Alabama towns have been ordered to remove corpses of Workers from the streets every 24 hours except on 'court days'.

And on 'court days' as all good I. L. D. public relations advisers know, the entire Boss population appears in spangled uniform to serenade jurors who have promised before hand to send a batch of innocent Workers to the electric chair.

But by far the greatest gala occasion in Alabama is the mid-winter festival at which the wealthy Boss class, (of which nine-tenths of Alabamians are members) gather in the court rooms of their respective counties to enjoy the wholesale scalping of the children of the Worker classes.

But why go further? We extend a personal invitation to the New York typewriter-snipers as sportsman to sportsman to visit Alabama and take part in the Anti-Worker Field Day, marking the beginning of the annual open season on the proletarians.

No guns are necessary in this sport as the State Government furnishes specially-trained native Alabama jaguars and laughing hyenas (abundant in this State) with which to track down innocent Workers.

NEGROES ON JURIES

FIRST, in the Herndon case and now in the Scottsboro trial, we are having brought forcibly to our attention the barring of Negroes from jury service in the South and [illegible] parts of the North, and what it means to colored people. It has already been indicated by the highest tribunal in the land that where Negroes are being tried there should be some Negroes on the jury. Even if this insistence had not come from such a high source, Negroes would be no less [illegible] its truth.

It is especially necessary in the South that Negroes should serve on juries to insure that no injustice be done. All too often the judicial system in many parts of Dixie resolves itself into a machinery for legal lynching. Moreover, to bar Negroes from jury service is to deny them their rights as citizens, and they have far too few left, even though conditions have admittedly improved in the past fifteen years.

Today Alabama is more disturbed about the bringing up of this question than the guilt or innocence of the Scottsboro boys, because it strikes at the very roots of the system of exploitation and persecution that keeps the Negroes suppressed and docile, to the economic and social advantage of the white planters, storekeepers, bankers and industrialists. Attorney Leibowitz, retained by the International Labor Defense, has wrought well. He has given white Alabama a bigger scare than any since the Civil War.

MOVE THE SCOTTSBORO TRIAL TO BIRMINGHAM!

3-23-33
New York, N.Y.

The fight for a change of venue to Birmingham becomes ow one of the most important points of struggle in the Scottsoro case. The legal lynchers regard Decatur as equally suited for their [illegible] as Scottsboro. They are saying openly: "The niggers got a fair trial in Scottsboro. They will get the ame kind of a trial here." Only in Birmingham are there ossibilities of securing protection for the innocent boys on rial. Only there will those Negroes, whose testimony will show the systematic denial of the constitutional rights of Negroes to act as jurors, feel more free to speak. This is the estimony that paves the way to the return to the United States Supreme Court, if necessary. Yesterday the names of hese proposed witnesses were given to the subpoena clerk of he Decatur court. Already reports are arriving that thy are eing intimidated. The trial must be held in Birmingham.

Only the mobilization of a protest movement of infinitely greater power than that which forced a reversal of the lynch verdict in the Supreme Court, can realize this. Yesterday it was the vigorous protest of European workers that largely influenced a reversal in the Scottsboro case. During the long struggle for freedom of these innocent boys, a tremendous movement for their defense developed in Europe. On November 7, 1931, International Scotsboro Day, seven workers, protesting before the American Consulate in Germany against the legal lynching of the Scottsboro boys, were shot down in cold blood.

Today the burden of the struggle rests upon the Negro and white workers and intellectuals of America.

The struggle to change the place of venue must be intensified. Resolutions and telegrams of protest must be immediately forwarded to the Governor of Alabama.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., March 20. —For the third time in a major case involving frame-up of Negroes, the International Labor Defense will go into court next week to challenge the right of the white ruling class of the south to exclude Negroes from juries.

When the Scottsboro case is called, whether on March 27 in the lynch town of Decatur, or in Birmingham, as the defense is demanding, witnesses will be called to support a motion to quash the indictment against the nine innocent Negro boys on the ground that Negroes were illegally excluded from the grand jury which handed down the indictments, and are systematically excluded from all juries in Alabama.

On similar grounds, the Euel Lee (Orphan Jones) lynch verdict was reversed by the State Supreme Court of Maryland, when the jury system of that state was challenged by the I. L. D.

Similar basis for dismissing the case of Angelo Herndon was brought forward in a writ of habeas corpus last December, and though defeated in a technicality, the raising of the issue forced the court to lower Herndon's bail from $25,000 to $2,500, permitting his release pending trial. The I.L.D. is continuing its fight to reverse his conviction on this as well as other grounds.

No Negro Witnesses

Twenty Negro residents of Alabama, qualified for service on the Grand Jury, will be subpoenaed by the I.L.D. to prove its contention in the Scottsboro case, and one white man, formerly a resident of Jackson cou[illegible] now living in Chattanooga, Te[illegible] [illegible]ify that [illegible] his knowledg[illegible] [illegible]es have [illegible] been called [illegible] any ju[illegible] in Jackson cou[illegible]

A[illegible] [illegible]eral [illegible]homas E. Kni[illegible] [illegible]abama will fight to the [illegible] against any move to force the calling of Negro jurors, he has announced. His contention will be, according to statements he has made to newspapermen, that Negroes are not excluded because of their color, but because they are not "persons of sound judgment."

Responding to Plea

NEW YORK.—Working class organizations all over the country are responding to the call of William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense, to rouse mass action of millions of workers in defense of the Scottsboro boys, and to demand a change of venue from the lynch-town of Decatur to Birmingham.

In response to his telegram of Saturday, dozens of organizations Saturday night and Sunday sent wires to Governor B. M. Miller, at Montgomery, voicing this demand. Among those who reported sending wires and protests are the Workers' Ex-Servicemen's League, the International Workers' Order, the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners, and the John Reed Clubs of the country. Additional hundreds of wires were sent from the Paris-Commune-Scottsboro meetings held all over the country Saturday night, and from the branch meetings of the I. L. D. which have been held during the past week.

Letters are pouring in to the offices of the Scottsboro New Trial Emergency Fund, in response to letters enclosing sheets of Scottsboro stamps, and asking for protest wires and letters. Many of these come from individuals who have never before been involved in any working class activity.

The Scottsboro Farce

The entire country has been watching with interest the trial of the Scottsboro cases. Haywood Patterson, who was given a death sentence for alleged rape in the first trial and whose conviction was reversed by the United States Supreme Court has again been found guilty by a "cracker" jury composed of men whose intelligence is far below the average American. Of course this case goes right back to the Supreme Court of Alabama and if necessary to the United States Supreme Court.

The farce at Scottsboro has turned the light on the judicial system of the South. It has proved that there are two distinct brands of justice in the South and that even the word of a discredited public prostitute like Vic Price, if she is white, can send nine men to death if they are black. It also proves that in the South, an illiterate, half witted, lazy, no account, rabid, nondescript if he is a white man, is more acceptable as a juror than a cultured, high class college graduate if he wears a black skin.

For the benefit of our Northern readers we wish to say that the same thing is true in the main right here in Tennessee and every other Southern state.

Jackson, Tenn.

Some people have sharply criticised the editor of this paper because he lined up with the Communists to see that these boys got a fair trial. To all critics we say we are proud to be lined up with anybody who fights for a square deal for the under-dog and we have no apologies to offer. Had it not been for the Communists these boys would have been rottening in their graves today. Yes, we salute Comrades Liebowitz and Brodsky, gentlemen lawyers, who are turning the light on the rotten judicial system of Alabama and if that means the editor is a Red or Communist, then make the most of it. The Nashville Tennessean of April 12 had this to say editorially of the affair:

"The trial has shown the South that until it has won a reputation for dealing justice to its citizens without regard to their race, its courts will not have the confidence of other sections of the nation.

"Heywood Patterson, the first of the nine Negroes indicted in the alleged assault upon two white girls of doubtful morality to have a new trial, was found guilty by a jury Sunday, the verdict carrying the death penalty.

"Patterson's second trial, like the first one, has been held under most distressing conditions. It has seemed at times that the issue at stake was the right of outsiders to go into Alabama to defend the Negro before the court rather than the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. In spite of the apparent efforts of Judge James E. Horton of the Morgan Circuit Court to give the defendants a fair trial, the many threats which were made kept the community in a constant state of racial excitement, a state which tends to relegate justice to a secondary place.

"The fact that one of the girls, who at the first trial testified she had been assaulted, testified at the new trial that her first story was false, was not, apparently, considered sufficient by the jurors to doubt whether there had been an attack at all.

"Regardless of the fate of the accused Negroes, the Scottsboro case has turned the clock back on interracial relations in the South. The remedy however, lies with the South. When the several states have proved that a Negro can count on obtaining justice in courts there will be no excuse for outside intereference."

T. H. Alexander, the Columnist for the great white daily papers of the South also spoke in no uncertain terms when he said:

"When the case of the Scottsboro Negroes was first tried, I hailed it as a great triumph for Southern justice, a sure sign that the South can conquer mob rule if it has the will.

"Now the truth is beginning to appear in the malodorous case. It appears now to have been a frameup, pure and simple, on some ignorant and innocent Negreos by white women of bad character. Those Negroes should be promplty set free. They owe their lives to the liberal opinion of the world which has held them guiltless from the first."

Every right thinking white man and Negro in this country should rally to the standards in this case with a determination not to quit, whatever the cost until every right guaranteed every man by the Federal Constitution is assured that justice shall not be strangled to death in her own temples.

PALM SUNDAY IN DECATUR

Two of our brilliant young men covered the Scottsboro case in Decatur, Alabama, several weeks ago. William N. Jones of the Baltimore-Afro, and P. Bernard Young, Jr., of the Norfolk Journal Guide stopped by Nashville en route home after the trial. We had an opportunity to get some first-hand information from these two representatives of the Cooperative Publishers. Here is Mr. Young's description of Palm Sunday in Decatur:

National Baptist Voice

It was the Sabbath before Easter. Bright, clear, balmy day. The people were on their way to church to sing Hosannas to the King—Christ, Twelve men, good and true, believers in the Christ, were pondering over testimony and charges alleged against nine black boys, age 13 to 22.

One woman accuser, stricken of conscience, had gone to a minister and asked for guidance. He told her to go back to court and tell the truth. She went back and told the judge and the jury that she was a perjurer. That she had lied when she said two years ago the boys attacked her. She admitted that she had promiscuous sex relations with men of her race.

The other woman, whom witnesses testified was of "easy virtue," swore again th[illegible] was mistreated. She contradicted muc[illegible] previous testimony.

Fiery crosses burned on th[illegible]round Decatur. Open threats of physical violence and death were hurled at the men of Jewish religion that defended the black boys. Alabama's soldiers with automatic guns held back a determined mob, who wanted the lives of these black boys upon the words of these women of the underworld.

The 12 men pondered for 21 hours. Then as Christians went to church, they decided which one of the women of the underworld to believe. They decided to believe the one that wanted to send nine boys to their death at the hands of Alabama. And, then, like Pilate of old, they washed their hands.

If you should investigate the church membership of these 12 jurors you would find that they are all members of some respected Fundamentalist churches, sound in the doctrine and "safe." Of course on Palm Sunday the good pastor painted the picture of a lonely Jesus dying on a cross two thousand years ago! The jurymen heard the story, felt sorry, perhaps shed tears, and then returned to the court room and voted to send the poor helpless black boys to death at the hands of Alabama.

Now turn your eyes to New York and look at another preacher. Conscience stricken Ruby Bates turned to a great Baptist preacher for guidance. Here was a woman with a spark of conscience left in her life; who had already admitted she had promiscuous sex relations with the men of her race, seeking help from a spiritual leader. Nine lives were at stake. Preachers stand in their pulpits each week mouthing platitudes about saving souls when in reality they would not lift a finger to save a human life at the cost of a little popularity.

We know what Jesus said to the woman of Samaria. We would like so much to know the contents of the conversation Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick had with Ruby Bates. It took uncommon courage to do what the Riverside Church pastor did. He wrote a letter to the Episcopal Bishop of Birmingham, Alabama, requesting that he arrange safe transportation for the woman accuser to Decatur, and advised Ruby Bates to return to the Alabama court and tell the truth. The girl did that.

We ostracized Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick long ago for his liberal views and advanced theology. You may write this down in your notebook: IF THIS WORLD IS TO BE MADE BETTER, ARE THE LIBERALS GOING TO MAKE IT SO? With all their bad theology, they are at least courageous.

A Millstone

THE time has come when the International Labor Defense must give up its ambition to make international propaganda out of the Scottsboro case. It must free the ignorant Negro defendants from its selfish grip and give them and Alabama a chance to see that Justice is done without any further disgusting propagandizing.

Judge James Horton quite properly indefinitely postponed further trials of the defendants yesterday, because Chief Defense Counsel Samuel Liebowitz had, on his return to New York, launched a vituperatic speaking campaign against Alabama juries: "those creatures, those bigots, whose mouths are slits in their faces." Defending Liebowitz, who was absent, his associate in the defense of the Negroes, Joseph R. Brodsky, declared that he didn't believe Liebowitz was correctly quoted, and continued: "Liebowitz's view is that in Decatur and the South the white workers are imbued with the idea of white supremacy, and that only in union of Negro and white workers warring against the ruling class can they gain their ends."

It is quite obvious that Mr. Liebowitz is more fanatically devoted to "warring on the ruling class" than he is on defending seven ignorant Negroes accused of assault. The I. L. D. has made a radical holiday at the expense of the Negroes ever since taking charge. It crowded out the true friends of the Negroes, members of their own race who sought to provide for them an adequate defense. We happen to know that the service of the leading criminal lawyer of Birmingham was offered to the Negroes, but the I. L. D. had taken out its mortgage on their lives.

The mother of one of the Negroes was shunted around over Europe, being expelled from one country after another, spreading propaganda and picturing Alabama as a tyrannical place where innocent people were lynched by the courts.

The I. L. D. made no concessions to Alabama pride. It made no use of capable Southern lawyers, students of Southern psychology, who would have pitched the defense on actual evidence instead of radical propaganda.

From the start, the I. L. D. built up the case as a cause celebre, soliciting funds from Northern sources. It was really a trial of Negroes for rape, but the I. L. D. lost sight of the nature of the case entirely, and purposely made it appear that innocent people were being rescued from biased, unfair Southern courts, and that the Negroes were being lynched by America's perverted social conscience.

The result of the entire affair has been to create an emotional atmosphere which made postponements of the trials highly advisable.

We believe that if the I. L. D. continues in charge of the defense it will eventually be able to use the electrocution of one or more of the Negroes as international propaganda.

We believe, further, that a verdict of acquittal would be a cruel disappointment to the I. L. D., which thrives on the prejudices and propaganda it is able to make out of the case.

If Mr. Liebowitz cared a straw about the defense in this case he would not have so unjustly held Alabama up to scorn and derision by his billingsgate in Brooklyn, with his talk of "those bigots whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs, whose chins drip tobacco juice."

Judge Horton, himself, is proof enough to New Yorkers and others that the Southern courts are not presided over by the type of people described by the I. L. D. His conduct in this crisis seems to us altogether admirable. It must be remembered that one of the Prosecuting Attorneys was as extreme in his appeal to prejudice as was Mr. Liebowitz. The entire case had become bound up with prejudice, hatred, appeals to the basest side of man.

We call upon the International abor Defense to withdraw from he case. It has over-reached itself nd exposed its callous indifference o the real issues. We believe that labama will provide adequate, fair ounsel for the Negroes and that a new atmosphere, the trials may roceed.

We do not believe that the comlex emotional atmosphere of prejlice and propaganda, created by e I. L. D. will permit the trial to roceed so long as the I. L. D. has ything to do with the case.

All that we desire is Justice. If e had lynching in our hearts, we ould urge the I. L. D. to continue ith its course, because we believe at is one way to lynch the Neroes—to lynch them in order to eate a cause celebre for the Interational Labor Defense.

But we desire that Alabama be further harrassed by these grosque propagandists from other ctions; that Alabama be permitted to conduct her trials fairly and without radical interference.

That, we believe, is the surest way to Justice in this case.

The next step, however, should be the withdrawal—voluntarily or forced—of the I. L. D. lawyers from the case.

Judge Horton summed the matter up when he declares that the "Negroes' lawyers have become a millstone around their necks."

Justice is a mockery if trials are permitted to proceed when everyone knows that the lawyers for the defense are a handicap to the defense—a millstone around their necks.

Democrats Protest Scottsboro 'Justice'

The Scottsboro verdict was condemned as a travesty on justice by the Queens County Colored Democracy at a meeting at the clubhouse, 164-30 South street, South Jamaica.

The organization is circulating petitions demanding a new trial in another county, Paul Bolin announced.

Hartwell Sollinger of the War Veterans Association was the principal speaker. Renold B. Lighton spoke briefly on the charity work of the club. C. Hutchley Riley presided.

JUSTICE BUTLER QUOTED

In reply to Samuel S. Leibowitz of the defense counsel for the "Scottsboro Negroes," who characterized the jurors in the case as "bewhiskered bigots," former residents of Alabama now living in New York, point to the dissenting opinion of Justice Butler of the United States Supreme Court when the case was appealed to that court.

Justice Butler insisted that a fair trial had been held and declared that three of the defendants had implicated their associates.

When the cases of the seven Negroes, now pending with one exception at Decatur, were before the Supreme Court on appeal after their conviction at Scottsboro, the justices were divided.

In the opinion of Justices Butler and McReynolds, the following extract under the title "Powell vs. Alabama," appears:

> And three defendants each, while asserting his own innocence, testified that he saw others accused commit the crime charged.

Montgomery Ala.

Publication by The Literary Digest of a group picture of the jury in the recent Decatur trial should go far to reverse the impression created by the derogatory comment of Mr. Leibowitz regarding that jury.

The fact is that it was not a commonplace jury at all.

All of the 12 were well-dressed, well-appearing men and it is said that they were jurors of unusual intelligence and fitness.

They are not in fact the type of men that Leibowitz pictured them as being.

CIVIC BODY TO AID SCOTTSBORO BOYS' DEFENSE

Deanwood Citizens to Hold Mass Meeting Early Next Month

A mass meeting for the purpose of raising funds to aid in the Scottsboro case was planned by the Deanwood Civic Association meeting Monday night at the Deanwood School.

The body discussed the Alabama case and named H. H. Turner, chairman of a committee to arrange for the meeting to be held early next month.

A letter from the District Engineer Commissioner was read before the body and pointed out that trees could not be planted along the streets in that section until further improvements were made.

The body went on record urging the paving of the streets, including sidewalks, so as to get trees to beautify the community. A petition in regards to the matter will be sen the Commissioners.

The body scored the blocking of the streets between Kenilworth and Deanwood by railroad trains which in a way endanger the lives of school children, who in many instances crawl under the cars to keep from being late for school. A communication will be sent to the railroad officials asking that the matter be taken up.

The association announced that its spring clean-up campaign would get under way May 1. Announcement was also made that a housewives' league had been organized in the community for the purpose of [illegible] houses of the Deanwood section. Miss Green, of the C.M.A. Stores, was present and made brief remarks. M. T. Tolliver, president of the body, presided.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE.

To the Editor of the Times; Sir.—This letter is to commend you on your splendid editorial on the Scottsboro case. The article was so clear and to the point that any clear-thinking person reading it could readily see the fact that those poor unfortunate boys are being railroaded. The so-called Alabama justice has made a disgrace of the whole affair. Every colored citizen who has read your editorial comment has nothing but praise for your fair and unbiased opinion on that terrible, judicial lynching. So here's hoping that every organization, club and church of colored people in Montclair will do all in their power to raise funds to help in the defense of those poor boys in Alabama who have been the victims of that terrible miscarriage of justice.

BLACK FOR INNOCENCE

We wonder if it struck newspaper readers that the chief argument of defense counsel at Decatur was that the defendants in the Scottsboro Case are innocent because they are negroes. Or that, if they are not precisely innocent, they should be liberated because they are negroes.

That is the way the Patterson case impressed us. Leibowitz, the New York Jew who was chosen by the International Labor Defense to plead the case, lost not a moment's time in injecting the race issue, on which he harped incessantly throughout the long week of the trial.

It seems clear enough, too, that Leibowitz was not trying this case before the Alabama jury but before the Supreme Court of the United States. There is good reason to believe that he sought to goad opposing counsel into making indiscreet or prejudicial remarks. It even seems that Solicitor Wright fell into this trap when he alluded to the "Jew money" which he thought had had its contaminating influence. There were good grounds for this charge, although the charge itself, made before the jury, was held by the Court to be prejudicial. Ruby Bates, formerly an important State witness, had disappeared, but at the last minute of the trial she made a theatrical entrance upon the scene with some new clothes, some new money, and some new testimony. After perjuring herself, she admitted that she had been in New York, where she had seen Dr. Fosdick and presumably certain members of the I. L. D. It is a question whether her about-face strengthened or weakened the case against the seven negroes. Her tale that she had "borrowed" $50 from a New York woman whose last name she professed to have forgotten doesn't ring true of New York and its money ways.

Leibowitz may be reputed to be a good lawyer in The Metropolis but he would, if he didn't improve on the Decatur showing, starve to death in Alabama. He opened the case by moving to quash the indictment on the grounds that no negroes had sat on the Grand Jury and that none were drawn for Petit Jury service. He had the jury box brought into court and the list of names read off in an effort to show that the names of negroes were systematically excluded. The defendant, he said, was thus deprived of his constitutional rights. And while he probably knew that this was poor strategy in so far as immediate results were concerned, he evidently believes that this point alone will weigh heavily in his favor when the case reaches the Supreme Court.

Of the New York attorney's conduct after the trial nothing complimentary, certainly, can be said. During the trial he resorted to a cheap sort of flattery which he tried to use on Judge Garner, and on more than one occasion to let Attorney General Knight get his goat. But it was after the trial, in his comment on the jury, that he reached his climax. "The verdict," he said, "is an act of bigots, spitting upon the tomb of Abraham Lincoln."

The International Labor Defense by whom Leibowitz was employed or commissioned (he says he didn't get any money out of the case) incidentally is one of the most radical organizations in America. This organization is not only opposed to "Jimcrowism" in all its phases, but is opposed to pretty much everything else that is customary in this country. The I. L. D. has won few converts in the South in the past, and, considering the manner in which it has acted in this notorious case, it will win still less here in the future.

The next of these seven cases it set for April 17, but the propaganda of the uplifters, few of whom have any accurate knowledge of the evidence, will continue, it is anticipated, with increasing fury.

Whether these negroes are guilty or innocent—and if they are guilty these radical organizations take the position that it doesn't matter much, anyhow—they should be liberated at once, so the argument goes, largely because they are members of an "oppressed race."

Decision at Decatur

The first of the re-trials in the Scottsboro case, ordered by the Supreme Court, was concluded last week with a verdict of guilty, the penalty of death being affixed. In this instance there cannot be complaint of inadequate preparation on the part of the lawyers for the defense; since the negro's counsel, able men from New York and Chattanooga, had ample time to prepare their case. Unqualified praise must be given, moreover, to Judge Horton, who presided, for his firm suppression of tendencies toward lawlessness and for his markedly fair charge to the jury. One detail of the trial, however, is to be condemned—the effort of the prosecuting attorney to prejudice the jurymen against two of the lawyers for the defense by his derogatory references to the fact that they were Jews and hailed from New York.

THE SCOTTSBORO "TRIAL"

The verdict in the case of Patterson, the negro tried a second time in Scottsboro Alabama, may have been a just one, but from the evidence published we doubt it we think, in other words, it was based more largely upon race prejudice than upon incriminatory testimony. Here were two white women who belonged confessedly to the under world, hoboing their way from Tennessee on a freight train. They were joined on the same train by eight colored men and a colored boy whom they charged on first trial with outraging them. One of these women has repudiated her testimony given at the first trial, and declares if the other was abused she does not know anything of it; in this hopeless jumble of the testimony the jury brought in a verdict of guilty and condemned Patterson to die. It is safe to say the other seven grown men will be convicted. The judge trying the case endeavored to be and was perfectly fair in his instructions, but the fact that the negroes are to be tried under the eye of a National Guard, and that the sign of the Ku Klux Klan was seen during the trial indicates that the jury must have been intimidated.

Making every allowance for the fact that these cases are being heard at a considerable distance from where this paper is published, we are frank to say that it bores us to know that in the far south, at least, race prejudice is so great that any person regardless of race cannot go to trial with the same assurance of fairness that another enjoys. We insist that all persons stand equal before the law, and while we have very little patience with the organization in the North that makes a practice of sending counsel to defend persons in the South who are charged with crime, as in the case of Euell Lee which occurred just over the Maryland line, about whose crime there was no doubt, we must insist that the best method of pushing such an organization out of commission is to render its existence unnecessary.

The great Civil War has been over sixty eight years, and that is ample time for sobriety of thought to have reinstated itself and for race prejudice to have disappeared

No higher court would sustain the verdict of guilty pronounced against a Negro convicted at Decatur, Alabama, in connection with the now famous or infamous "Scottsboro case." Even the meagre newspaper reports we read were enough to convince anybody that the trial was in some respects farsical. When an attorney for the state was permitted to stand up in open court and declare that a witness for the defense was "bought with Jew money" without rebuke from the bench one can well imagine the hostile atmosphere in which this particular case was tried. We have never seen an instance of more pronounced prejudice which was divided between the prisoner at the bar and his counsel who happened to be a Jew and from a northern state.

Those who are familiar with this case are amazed that such a prejudiced state of popular feeling could possibly exist anywhere in this enlightened country. That two white women of any standing or no standing at all, like those who figured as principals in this case, could be criminally attacked in the manner described by a group of Negroes in broad daylight is in the first place highly improbable, especially when there were white men in the immediate vicinity. But when one of the alleged victims returns to the stand and testifies she lied in her original statement it seems that that would be sufficient to create "reasonable doubt" in the minds of the jury.

But that jury took on the color of its surroundings and was unable to render a fair and impartial verdict. They were burning fiery crosses on the Alabama hills or seeking to form mobs to march on Decatur to wreak summary vengeance. The jury may not have known the details, but they sensed from the tense atmosphere of the court room what was going on beyond its precincts. The mob demanded the life of this black man and although the might of the law protected him it did not quench the thirst but heightened it. The jury did not dare to acquit the culprit or soften its verdict and go back home in safety for the fury of the mob would have been upon their heads. This case has arrived at the point where the good name of Alabama, not that of a gang of worthless black hoodlums, is on trial.

The Scottsboro Case

It would be almost impossible in the United States to surround a criminal trial with circumstances tending more surely to obscure the ends of justice than those that enveloped the second trial of one of the Negro youths involved in the notorious Scottsboro case in Alabama—a trial which has resulted in a verdict of guilty with sentence to death. These circumstances are such, indeed, that no man—however familiar he may be with actual conditions and reactions in the Deep South—can say with certainty that the verdict was just or unjust.

The verdict and sentence in the first trial were set aside by the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that the accused had not had a fair trial, by reason of the openly hostile and violent atmosphere amid which they were tried. This time, the accused was tried at Decatur, which is something like 100 miles away from the scene of the first trial, so that local feeling was not so strong against the accused youths as it had been.

Nevertheless, it is fairly certain that antagonism prevailed throughout the state. Judge Horton, who presided, performed his full duty and more: he made every proper effort to dissipate the cloud of prejudice and hostility that hovered over the court room. Whether he succeeded or not, whether the verdict was or was not justified by testimony given in the presence of the accused—and testimony read by the far-distant public is not at all the same thing as that very testimony given in open court—the rest of the country probably will never know.

It is unfortunate that the convicted youth had for leading counsel a man whom the jury and the whole vicinage doubtless looked upon as a foreigner and whom they suspected of being representative of Communism and Bolshevism and all the rest and who, they were satisfied, looked upon them, in turn, as barbarians who must be prevented from working their will upon the innocent. Almost certainly, the jury and the vicinage regarded leading counsel for the defense as a "nigger-lover," to use the hideous phrase still often heard in the Deep South, and a professional baiter of the whites of the South. It is more than unfortunate that the attorney for the commonwealth lost his temper and lashed out at counsel for the defense and his backers.

With the careful reservation that those at a distance from a criminal trial cannot, in the nature of things, speak with anything approaching authority, the Ledger-Dispatch is forced very gravely to doubt the justice of the verdict.

ALABAMA, THE NEGRO AND LAW

This Southern "Negro problem," one hears so much about exists for most part in the minds of those who have never visited the South, or who for other reasons know nothing of conditions here.

The Southern white man and the Southern Negro are fully aware of racial differences. But nine times out of ten neither is troubled by those differences, neither makes a "problem" of conditions until some outsider declares that such a problem exists.

Just so long as there are blacks and whites in the South, the two races will continue to live as they live now—two distinctive peoples moving unmolested in their own respective spheres, each more or less economically dependent on the other, just as every individual is dependent on all other individuals.

There is no question in the minds of the Southern white and the Southern Negro of the relationship each bears toward the other. It is never questioned by either.

The raising of such a question could bring only trouble, and both white men and black men know it. The will to maintain the present status of the races is mutual here in Alabama as in other sections of the South.

Now Alabama wants its laws respected

It wants black men to respect them.

It wants white men to respect them.

And the State of Alabama, through its people and its courts insists that all men abide by the State laws.

It so happens that in this State it is against the law to commit rape. (And we believe most other States, indeed, most semi-civilized peoples have laws against rape.)

Two years ago nine Negro men boarded a freight train near Scottsboro, Ala., threw several men from a box car and kept two white girls in the car with them.

When the train arrived at Scottsboro, the girls told officers that each of the nine Negroes had attacked them.

In court each of the Negroes accused his eight companions of attacking the girls but denied that he had taken part in the mass rape.

Alabama tried and convicted the men for rape.

The State made no race question of the case. It was a trial for a capital offense.

Selfish radical groups seized an opportunity to flood the nation, and the world, with their own propaganda, using the case as an excuse to exploit themselves and promote their interests.

A surprisingly large number of Eastern newspapers, many otherwise intelligent and enlightened journals, swallowed the stuff broadcast by the radicals and immediately made a "race problem" of a case that should be judged only as a criminal trial.

Alabama is concerned only with the guilt or innocence of these men.

The New York Herald Tribune, which assumes that the first trial was unfair says:

> The case is, of course, Alabama's affair, and expressions of outside advice will only stir more deeply the passions which have been sufficiently aroused by the radicals who took over the defense, and, while winning the new trial, used the affair for the selfish ends of their own propaganda. It is to be hoped, however, that Alabama men and women will themselves see that the only way to triumph over the propagandists is to insist that this second trial shall in fact be absolutely above the slightest suspicion of partiality, haste, or prejudice. That is the only victory to be won by any one in this distressing affair.

But the "outside" advice is not resented nearly so much as the outside interference in a case which Alabamians consider only as a court matter, the trial of which should have no other purpose than to prove the innocence or guilt of the men charged with a felony

POSSIBLE RESULT

The Scottsboro case, with all its ramifications, possibly has accomplished one thing: the setting back of the South, and particularly Alabama, a score of years in the matter of lynchings.

This is a horrible implication, and we have seen no hint of it in any Alabama newspaper. But it is what the people are saying.

Let alone, Alabama would have disposed of these defendants fairly and quickly, but so many different elements have thrust themselves into the case, with the resultant villifications of the State from various foreign and irresponsible sources, that the people have become quite thoroughly disgusted.

The Negroes yet will get a fair and orderly trial, for Alabama is determined to keep a cool head despite the heated and baneful criticism from various parts of the North and East, and especially from the New York demagogue who is masquerading in the role of chief defense counsel.

But The Eagle ventures to state frankly in print what thousands of citizens are repeating orally: 'These damnyankees and crack-brained Communists won't have cause to meddle in the next case of this calibre.

If this be 'prejudice' and 'biotry' of the sort that the indecent Leibowitz has hurled against the people of Alabama, then he has little to blame but himself, and let him wallow in Harlem and make the most of it.

The white race is both superior and supreme in Alabama, and fully intends to remain so.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE

This case of nine young Negroes who are charged with criminally attacking two white girls on a freight train moving through Tennessee and Alabama, has aroused interest in all part of this country. These men were tried in Alabama about two years ago and convicted and the penalty in Alabama for this offense is death.

The case was carried to the United States Supreme Court and the verdict was set aside because this court held that the Negroes had not been adequately represented. Haywood Patterson, one of the nine has recently been tried again in the Alabama court at Decatur and again convicted; this time defended by Mr. Samuel S. Leibowitz, of New York, counsel furnished by the International Labor Defense. We have no sympathy whatever with the criticism that these men were, convicted because they black. The evidence as we have read it, indicate that atleast some of them were guilty. Ke know the State of Virginia would not want to convict and sentence to death an innocent Negro and we do not believe the courts of Alabama would. The State of Alabama had its Attorney-General Assistant Attorney-General and two of its county prosecuting attorneys present in this case, to see that the laws of the state were enforced and that the honor of the state upheld. and unusual array of State and County prosecuting attorneys for any case.

We think it exceedingly unfortunate for the State of Alabama and for these nine young men that the International Labor Defense interfered in the case at all, further than to get the new trial. There is little question; but that the defense attorney, furnished by them, was a mill stone around the necks of the defendant, as evidenced by the following staement by Mr. Leibowitz issued after the verdict: "This is a black page in the history of American civilization. An occasion where once more twelve citizens of Alabama, swayed by bigotry and prejudice and hearkening to the yelps of a bombastic Ku Klux, who hurled mud at the Jew and the people of the great State of New York to sympathetic ears in the court room crowded with lantern-jawed morons and lynchers, brought in a verdict that is a mockery of justice."

After returning to New York, he made such a scatting criticism of the jury and people of Alabama and some of the prosecuting attorneys, that Judge Horton postponed the trial of one of the other Negroes for the reason that he could not get a fair trial in the face of such statements from Mr. Liebowitz. There is a movement on foot to furnish these men counsel from among the attorneys in the South.

The Southern people will not stand for this criticism and interference

MIXED JURIES ADVOCATED

An echo of the Scottsboro trial at Decatur, Ala., was heard Thursday when the Commission on Interracial Co-operation announced that a resolution had been adopted stating:

"The commission recites its conviction that the cause of justice can be furthered by selection of jurors without regard to race and solely on the basis of fitness of service."

Defense in the case of Haywood Patterson, first of the negroes to be retried for criminal assault, raised the point that no negroes had been allowed on the list of eligible jurors.

A committee was named at the commission's meeting Wednesday to inquire whether the commission can be of service in the Scottsboro case, adding its "deep interest in the case, its sincere desire to have it disposed of with justice to all concerned and its willingness to render any service to that end that may be found possible.

Senator Wagner Named Head of Levee Probe Committee

Nye (Repub.) of North Dakota and Stephens (Dem.) of Mississippi, Other Members; Appropriation Inadequate but May Be Increased

Senator Robert W. Wagner (Democrat), New York, was named chairman of the special Senate committee to investigate labor conditions in the Mississippi River levee camps by Vice President Garner last Friday. Other members of the committee are Senator Gerald P. Nye, Republican, of North Dakota, and Senator Hubert D. Stephens, Democrat, of Mississippi.

The resolution authorizing the committee which was introduced by Senator Wagner was passed in the closing days of the last Congress, but the appointments were held up until the new session opened.

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and its branches throughout the country pressed for a Senate investigation after a report made to it last summer by Miss Helen Boardman, who was sent down into the camps by the national office.

She charged that wages for Negroes were about ten cents an hour; that work days were 12 and 14 hours in length; that sanitary conditions were bad; that brutality was practiced in some of the camps; and that camp commissaries overcharged the men as much as 500 per cent on some articles; and that foremen loaned money to workers at 25 per cent interest rates.

N.A.A.C.P. Has Faith in Wagner

The Negro citizens of the country can be assured that the Senate committee named to investigate conditions in the levee camps will examine fairly into all evidences of alleged virtual slavery, is the assurance of officials of the N.A.A.C.P.

The association, which has made two investigations into the camps in the Delta and which asked Senator Wagner to introduce a resolution for a Senate investigation, pointed out that Senator Wagner has long been an outspoken, fearless advocate of fairness to the Negro. He was the only Senator who dared to speak plainly on the Judge Parker nomination in 1930, bringing the color question, the real issue in the Parker fight, out on the Senate floor.

Senator Nye is one of the band of liberals in the Senate and is known to be open-minded and inclined to sympathize with minority groups. He is a foe of wage slavery and exploitation.

Senator Stephens's Attitude

Senator Stephens has not expressed himself on the levee situation, but it is believed that he is desirious of getting at the truth of the conditions particularly in his home state, since a decent wage for the thousands of Negroes employed on the levees would mean more money spent with Mississippi merchants in the cities and towns along the river.

No date has been set for the taking of testimony. The last congress authorized only $1,000 for the expenses of the probe, although Senator Wagner had asked for $10,000. Efforts are being made to get the Senate committee on audits and control to raise the appropriation. The N.A.A.C.P. is ready to present colored and white witnesses to testify as to conditions in the camps.

LEGAL LYNCHING IN THE SOUTH

Alabama is on record with a second attempt to lynch legally several Negro boys, the youths being those involved in the now famous "Scottsboro case" in which the Negroes are accused of attacking two white girl hoboes. It was necessary for the United States Supreme Court to intervene to save these boys from death at the time of the first trials. It or some other court probably will have to do the same thing again.

The highest court ordered a retrial of the boys, saying they had been deprived of their constitutional rights through the mistrial of the original case, but that apparently made no impression upon the "hard-boiled," Negro-hating jury that tried Haywood Patterson, first of the defendants, the other day, since in the face of evidence that could not possibly be considered strong enough for a conviction the jurors voted to send Patterson to the electric chair. His crime apparently is that he has a black skin.

One of the girls who had testified in the earlier trial that she had been attacked by the Negroes, journeyed all the way from New York to Alabama to repudiate her first story and to assert that her girl companion was not harmed by the boys but had "framed" them.

The lawyers for the prosecution made their principal attack upon the defense lawyers and charged in the hearing of the jury that the defense was conducted by means of "Jew money" raised in New York, thus stirring up a second phase of racial hatred.

It is to the credit of the presiding judge that he did his best to see to it that a fair trial was had and in his instructions told the jury to ignore all appeals to race or religious prejudice.

The day is not yet at hand in certain parts of the South when a Negro accused of crime has a chance with the law provided his accuser is white.

They First Convicted Alabama

In New York, some 1,200 or 1,500 miles from Alabama, the conviction of the "Scottsboro boy" is being denounced by divers persons as a "lynch verdict." These persons are not representative of the people of New York. Nine in ten of the New Yorkers, perhaps a greater proportion, are men of common sense and the South has nothing to fear from the Northern people. Our people should be careful lest they mistakenly interpret the wild and whirling words of professional "liberals", communists and their like as speaking Northern opinion. We are in constant association with Northerners and we observe no disposition on their part to interfere with the South and the Southern courts.

"A peaceful meeting of Negroes in Union Square, called to protest the verdict in the Scottsboro case, developed into a running fight along Broadway for miles with policemen thrown to the ground and trampled and Negroes becoming acquainted with scores of night sticks before it was over." So The New York Times, last Tuesday, reports. Negroes were warned by the police not to parade without permission. They insisted upon parading. So there was "a running fight for miles along Broadway." As many as 3,000 negroes were congregated at one place. No one was trying to "lynch" negroes in New York. Why was this running fight for miles along Broadway? What is "lynch law"? What is a parade in defiance of law with thousands participating in it, with accompaniments of assaults on the police and counter-assaults by the police?

In Alabama have been threats of lynching. Undoubtedly. No one has been lynched. No one has been hurt. No policemen have been "kicked in the mouth" and "trampled," no negroes clubbed. The judge in an Alabama court is commended for his fairness. A lawful jury convicts a man. Thereupon, negroes in New York disobey the police, parade, trample the police and are clubbed.

To the present moment, the lawlessness, the outbreaks, have been in the streets of New York, not in Scottsboro, not in Decatur.

In Decatur, a prosecuting attorney referred to the use of "Jew money" by the defense. That was nasty. That was inexcusable. Worst of all, it was the talk of a fool. Unfortunately, in the criminal courts of this glorious country, from one end of it to another, in New York and in South Carolina, outrageous behavior is often characteristic of lawyers. Whether money was contributed to the defense by Jews or Christians or heathens or atheists has nothing to do with the case—and just as the lawyer was trying to make capital by the expression his use of it is now magnified by equally foolish agitators in New York.

As for the matter of negroes on juries, they will not be placed on juries in Alabama. Not yet. Not for many a long year if ever. Not in any future year near enough to interest us. There will be a lot of foolish talk, but the subjugation of Alabama will not be undertaken. There is no disposition among Northern people, outside of a few small and excited circles, to make war upon the Southerners.

This "negro question" is full of complexities. Decent, honorable white men and women in the South are trying to deal with it practically, justly. They know, we know, that mixed racial juries are not to be permitted generally in the South. Nor does one assert that white juries are always what they ought to be. Unjust verdicts are sometimes found by them—against white people as well as against negroes.

We Southerners are doing the best that we can. We are trying to put an end to lynching. In that campaign The News and Courier has been unceasingly engaged the last sixty years. Putting negroes on juries would not end it. That would undo the good work of years by civilized white men and bring on anarchy again. It is not to be thought of.

Alabama may sometimes blunder, may do worse than blunder. But the Alabamians will have to be trusted. They can be. On the whole they will do justice to the negroes, for they, the white Alabamians, are not inhuman people—they are about like other white people from Seattle to Miami.

What would have happened if these outsiders had not interfered in the Scottsboro case, if it had been left wholly to the Alabamian white people? Possibly the men would have been convicted. Possibly one or two of them would have been executed. We doubt it. At most, seven of the nine would have been sent to prison, their lives saved. In time some of the sentences would have been commuted. If a condition in which even-handed, impartial justice has been embarrassed has been created, part of the explanation of it is that the presence of negroes in the South in great masses has clothed the crime with which the Scottsboro men were charged with a peculiar nature—as in South Africa—as anywhere these conditions exist. Still, we Southerners are making rational progress in this matter. We are slowly putting an end to lynching. But, if an unjust verdict has been brought in, which we are far from saying, the main responsibility is on the interferers, the infatuated strangers who tried and convicted the white people of Alabama before the negroes came to trial and now acquit the negroes.

If for the last two hundred and fifty years the Southern courts and the people, generally, had not treated the Southern negroes with humanity and justice, there would be no negroes here. They would have been driven out, exterminated. Yes, individual cases of injustice are numerous, we know that and regret it, but the saying that negroes cannot and do not receive justice tempered with mercy in our courts is a lie—a mere lie.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., Jan. 5—(AP)—Freedom of Roy Wright, 15, one of nine negroes indicted in the Scottsboro attack case, today was asked in a habeas corpus petition filed in Jefferson Circuit Court.

Judge John R. McCoy, before whom the petition was filed, set the case for hearing Monday, Jan. 16.

The petition, filed by Irving Schwob, of New York, one of five attorneys retained by the International Labor Defense, alleged that Wright was illegally held and should be turned over to juneyile authorities.

Montgomery, Ala.

Wright was one of nine negroes arrested at Paint Rock, Ala., March 25 1931, charged with attacking two young white girls aboard a freight train passing through Jackson County.

The young negro has been held in jail here without bond since a jury failed to agree in his case at Scottsboro in April, 1931.

George Chamlee, of Chattanooga, chief counsel for the negroes, announced two weeks ago that similar action would be taken in Montgomery Circuit Court in behalf of Eugene Williams, whose death sentence was reversed by the Alabama Supreme Court on the grounds that he was a juvenile.

Williams is held in Kilby Prison, at Montgomery with seven other negroes who face retrial on the charges as the result of the U. S. Supreme Court setting aside their death sentences.

2-1-33

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., Jan. 31 (AP) In two words, "writ denied," Judge J. P. McCoy in Jefferson circuit court Tuesday dashed the hopes of Roy Wright, youngest of nine Negroes under indictment in the "Scottsboro case," for at least temporary freedom on bond.

Macon, Ga.

The defendant, now more than 15 years old, sat quietly at the counsel table as George W. Chamlee, of Chattanooga, and Irving Schwab (attorneys employed by the International Labor Defense), argued he was illegally held and was entitled to freedom at least on bail.

When Judge McCoy announced his ruling the Negro apparently was unperturbed, and a few moments later after counsel had conferred with him, he was taken back to jail where he has remained since April 1931, when a jury failed to agree in his case.

The other eight were convicted and sentenced to death in Jackson circuit court of attacking two white girls. The Alabama Supreme court reversed the sentence of one, Eugene Williams, on the ground that he was a juvenile, and the United States Supreme court set aside the sentences of the other seven and remanded them for new trials.

Judge A. E. Hawkins, trial judge, has announced that the cases of all nine will be called in the regular term of court in March. Chamlee and Schwab both said Tuesday that they would seek a change of venue, probably to Birmingham.

CALL ISSUED FOR FEBRUARY 19 IN CAMBRIDGE

Including several well known persons in the city a provisional committee of the Scottsboro-Mooney Defense Conference will hold a meeting at 2 Central Square, Cambridge, on February 19. 2-4-33

The call which has been issued reads:

Boston, Mass.

"During the past two years, conferences and meetings were necessary to bring the Scottsboro frame-up to the attention of millions of workers throughout the world. It was the mass protest of these millions, co-operating with the International Labor Defense that resulted in the U. S. Supreme Court, ordering a new trnial and has saved the lives of the Scotsboro boys so far. Similar methods saved Mooney's life sixteen years ago and kept the Mooney-Billings case a living issue until at the present time the demand for their release has reached a new high level. Our conference on February 19th will be one of many being held all over the country in a great campaign which alone will free our class-brothers. We urge your organization to elect two delegates to take part in this conference."

Mrs. Mary E. Moore is secretary of the committee. Others of the committee are: Jessica Henderson, Rev D. S. Klugh, Rev. S. L. Laviscount, Rev Phillip F Mayer, Charles J Shepherd, M Cravath Simpson, William M Trotter, Rev. Samuel O. Weems and Eugene Gordon.

"The God's Truth"

Black Dispatch

Just how the state of Alabama is going to justify its further persecution of the nine Scottsboro boys charged with the crime of rape, is hard to comprehend or understand. Ruby Bates, one of the white girls alleged to have been criminally assaulted by these defenseless black youths, has written a letter to Alabama officials in which she makes a complete confession that she lied, and that not one of the accused youths violated her person.

This letter has been in th hands of supposed-to-be responsible officers of the Alabama court for several months, but suppressed until recently when these officials were forced to bring this letter into court and admit its authorship. Even then these Alabama officials fought to prevent the letter from getting out of their hands. The missive, however, has been impounded, and it is doubtful whether a method can be devised to prevent this important revelation becoming a part of the case made.

Oklahoma City, Okla.

If Ruby Bates is now to be believed, the only assault made upon her honor was made by the brutish, hate-crazed white men who forced her to lie with threats of jail, and lodging other spurious charges against her.

Let it be said to the credit and the honor of Ruby Bates that her keen sense of justice, her unwillingness to be a party to murder, even though it be in the name of the state, would not allow her to suppress the truth. This young white girl has a conscience. Doubtless she spent sleepless nights shuddering at the thought of the blood which would be dashed upon her hands were she not to tell the truth. Hers was a battle between selfishness and unselfishness. Unselfishness won.

Regardless to the outcome of this infamous trial; regardless of whether the nine black boys die and the state of Alabama stands exposed savage, bloody and brutal before the world, the God's truth is now revealed. Ruby Bates has honor and integrity, and the only assault made upon her virtue and womanhood, has been made by craven pale-faced cowards—members of her own race.

A new development through which the defense hopes the Scottsboro boys may be cleared and discharged will be revealed by Joseph R. Brodsky, chief counsel of the International Labor Defense in the famous Alabama case, at a meeting this evening at Abyssinian Baptist Church, 132 West 138th street.

New York [illegible]

Mr. Brodsky, who will be the principal speaker, will tell of a letter written by Ruby Bates, one of the white hobo girls the Scottsboro boys are accused of attacking in 1931, to a friend. The letter absolves the boys. Mr. Brodsky contends that the letter was suppressed by Alabama authorities. The Labor Defense has obtained a court order forcing the state to turn over a photostatic copy of the letter.

Other speakers at the meeting will be Roger N. Baldwin, director of the American Civil Liberties Union; Countee Cullen, the poet; William M. Kelley, editor of The Amsterdam News, and Miss Louise Thompson, assistant secretary of the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners.

The Eva Jessye Choir will offer a program of choral music. James H. Hubert, executive secretary of the New York Urban League, will preside.

The meeting is one of a series planned by the Scottsboro Unity Defense Committee. The Baptist Ministers' Conference and the Interdenominational Ministers' Alliance have set aside February 19 as Scottsboro Sunday. The Rev. E. A. P. Cheek, head of the Baptist group, and the Rev. D. Ward Nichols, president of the alliance, said appeals would be made in the churches for the boys in Alabama.

On Sunday Grace Lumpkin, Southern novelist who wrote "To Make My Bread," will speak at the Y. M. C. A. Forum on "Prisoners of Emancipation," linking the Scottsboro case with the general plight of the Negro in the South.

The race relations committee of St. Philip's Church will sponsor a Scottsboro meeting at the church February 23, John Spivak, author of "Georgia Nigger," and William L. Patterson, secretary of the Labor Defense, will speak.

SCOTTSBORO CASE DEVELOPMENTS

NOT only murder but many other things "will out" in time. The truth about the Scottsboro case is no exception. When the future looked darkest the revealing letter of Ruby Bates to her sweetheart clears the way to retrial and possible acquittal of the boys.

But we must not rejoice too soon. Epochal cases of this sort are not won by rejoicing, but through mobilization of moral and financial resources. Even then they are sometimes lost. Tom Mooney is still in San Quentin, although his innocence has been established to the satisfaction of everybody. Sacco and Vanzetti were executed despite overwhelming evidence of their innocence. The Scottsboro boys will be executed or left to rot for life in an Alabama prison unless the most skilful tactics are used to free them.

The International Labor Defense has wrought well. Negroes should aid the every effort of the organization in its fight to free these innocent Scottsboro boys. While the tactics of the I. L. D. are very frequently questionable, to put it mildly, it deserves wide support in its efforts to win the Scottsboro case.

Nation-Wide Demonstrations on Paris Commune Day March 18th; February 25, 26 Tag Days

NEW YORK.—Urgent directives for intensifying the campaign for the freedom of the Scottsboro boys, in preparation for the trials scheduled for March, have been sent by the International Labor Defense to its 18 districts and hundreds of branches. The directives call on the I. L. D. districts and branches to give the fullest support to the Scottsboro United Front Conferences, called in many cities by Provisional Committees of Negro and white delegates from many mass organizations.

Broad Defense Committees.

In many cities, the broadest defense committees are being organized, linking up the Scottsboro case with local struggles, and with the defense of Angelo Herndon, the Atlanta Six, Tom Mooney and the Tampa Prisoners.

Special meetings are called for in every city, to bring forward the pressing problem of broadening out the mass defense, drawing in all elements willing to fight for the freedom of the Scottsboro boys.

Feb. 25, 26 Tag Days.

Funds must be raised immediately for the successful carrying out of the legal and mass defense. National Tag Days will be held Feb. 25 and 26.

Education outlines have been sent out, giving the history of the Scottsboro frame-up and the world-wide mass defense to free these innocent victims of capitalist justice.

March 18 Actions.

The directives call for the organizing of local mass demonstrations and for nation-wide demonstrations on March 18, Paris Commune Day, to carry forward the fight for the freedom of the boys. The Scottsboro issue will also be brought to the fore on International Unemployed Day, March 4; International Women's Day, March 8, and Marx's Anniversary, March 14.

Lynching Feared as Defense Prepares for Struggle

Defender 2-25-33

Chicago, Ill.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., Feb. 24.—The new trial of the nine Scottsboro boys has been set for March 6 in Scottsboro, before Judge Alfred W. Hawkins, who presided over the original lynch hearing which resulted in death penalties for eight of them, it was learned last week.

On that day General George W. Chamlee, Samuel S. Leibowitz, Joseph Brodsky and Irving Schwab, International Labor Defense attorneys, and, if they can be spared from the defense of Angelo Herndon and the Atlanta "Six," John H. Geer and Benjamin J. Davis Jr., Race attorneys of Atlanta, Ga., will appear in the court to demand a change of venue from the town in which the local band played "There'll Be a Hot Time" while the jury handed down its hideous lynch verdicts of death against the innocent boys in April, 1931, to Jefferson county, which is the city of Birmingham, Ala.

The change of venue will be demanded on the grounds that in a large city like Birmingham it will be more difficult to organize gangs to lynch the boys and on the ground also that the landlords in Jackson county, through their organ, the Jackson County Sentinel, have so conspired to rouse lynch hysteria in Scottsboro that no trial there could be anything but the same legal mockery intended to precede a legal lynching, as in the first trial.

The Ruby Bates letter, made public last week, which categorically denies all the charges this star state witness made on the stand in the original Scottsboro lynch hearing, is but one link in a powerful chain of evidence of the innocence of the Scottsboro boys which the I. L. D. lawyers will present at the new trial, it was announced.

LYNCHING FEARED

NEW YORK, Feb. 24.—Plans for the lynching of the Scottsboro boys in the event they are acquitted by the court are under way in an organized manner in Alabama, the International Labor Defense says it learned last week. A "vigilance" organization, with ramifications through several counties, has been formed for this purpose, according to information which has been received from reliable sources, William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense, anounced.

This organization, according to the information received by Mr. Patterson, stems directly from an editorial printed in the Huntsville Times, immediately following the Nov. 7 decision of the United States supreme court, which granted the innocent boys a new trial, and reprinted in the Jackson County Sentinel. The editorial called for the immediate organization of a vigilance committee in Huntsville for two announced purposes.

The first announced purpose was to see that Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, state's star witnesses in the case—one of whom has retracted her testimony of "rape" in a letter published last week—were well taken care of, fed, clothed and housed, until the trial. The obvious purpose of this was to intimidate the two girls and bribe them so that they should not dare to tell the truth when they are called to the new trial.

The second announced purpose was to "keep Communists out of Huntsville" supposing the change of venue brought the trial to that city. Since for purposes of hiding the existence of the International Labor Defense, a broad, nonpartisan working class defense organization, the press constantly refers to it as "the Communists," Mr. Patterson pointed out, this purpose of the "vigilance" committee was obviously an attempt to intimate the legal defenders of the Scottsboro boys.

Norfolk, Va.

SEEK CHANGE OF VENUE

Pressure Being Put On Ruby Bates To Repudiate Letter

(Special to Journal and Guide)

SCOTTSBORO, Ala. — Monday, March 6, has been set for the new trial of the nine Scottsboro boys in this same feverish little backwoods town, and before the same Judge, Alfred W. Hawkins, who presided over the original trial in April, 1931, when the Lily-white Scottsboro Band played "There Will be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," and when death penalties were handed out to eight of the youths.

On that day General George W. Chamlee, Samuel S. Leibowitz, Joseph Brodsky, and Irving Schwab, International Labor Defense attorneys and, if they can be spared from the defense of Angelo Herndon and the Atlanta "Six," John H. Geer and Benjamin J. Davis, Jr., of Atlanta, Ga., will appear in the court to make a motion for a change of venue to Jefferson County, which is the city of Birmingham, Ala.

The change of venue will be demanded on the grounds that in a large city like Birmingham, with a large Negro and white working class population, it will be more difficult for mobs to organize or for hysteria to develop beyond police control.

First Trial Mockery

The first trial here has been termed a mockery of the law, and the atmosphere engendered was held to be such that no local jury would dare to decide contrary to the dictates of the crowd. Already the county papers here have been writing the kind of stuff that has set local whites organizing for "what we'll do if those n...are acquitted."

The Ruby Bates letter, made public last week, is but one link in the evidence which will be produced to show the innocence of the nine young men who now face the electric chair. In the meantime reports have it that [illegible] in Huntsville local [illegible] are "chaperoning" Ruby and providing for her as one way to influence her in testifying "right" whenever she is called to tell the court what she dared to write in repudiating the attack of the now condemned youths.

NEW YORK—William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense, urged all organizations to support the plans for the National Scottsboro Tag Days, February 25 and 26 in a statement issued this week. The statement points out the urgent need of funds to carry on the legal defense activities of the I. L. D. in preparation for the new Scottsboro trials on March 6.

Lynch Plot Unearthed

NEW YORK—Plans for a gang lynching of the Scottsboro boys in event the courts find it impossible to carry out the legal lynching are under way in an organized manner in Alabama, the International Labor Defense learned this week. A "vigilance" organization, with ramifications in several counties, has been formed for this purpose, according to information received from reliable sources, William L. Patterson, national secretary of the I. L. D., announces.

The first steps in organizing this "vigilance" committee were taken directly following the decision from the U. S. Supreme Court granting the boys a new trial. The formation of "vigilance" committees was sponsored by an editorial in the Huntsville Times. The editorial was immediately reprinted in the Jackson County Sentinel of Scottsboro.

The first annonced purpose was to see that Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, State's star witnesses in the case—one of whom has retracted her lying testimony of "rape" in a letter published last week—were well taken care of, fed, clothed and housed until the new trial. The obvious intention of this is to intimidate the girls, and bribe them, so they would stick to their perjured testimony at the new trials, called for March 6.

The second announced purpose is to "keep Communists out of Huntsville," supposing the change of venue brought the trial to that city. By Communists is meant not only members of the Communist Party but all representatives of the I. L. D., and all militant workers and poor farmers rallying throughout Alabama to the defense of the framed-up Scottsboro boys. It was the Huntsville police who seized the letter of Ruby Bates in an effort to prevent it falling into the hands of the I. L. D., which is defending the boys.

9 NEGROES MAY BE TRIED IN JEFFERSON

Montgomery, Ala

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., March 3—(AP)—Retrial of the nine negroes indicted in the Scottsboro attack case in Jefferson Circuit Court was regarded as probable in court circles today.

One of the criminal court judges here has been asked by the Atty. Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., to be ready to try the cases, if motion for a change of venue to Jefferson County is granted.

The cases have been set on the docket of Jackson Circuit Court for hearing Monday, and George W. Chamlee of Chattanooga, Tenn., has announced a motion for a change of venue will be entered.

While Judge A. E. Hawkins, presiding over Jackson Circuit Court, has not indicated what action he would take on such a motion, since the state will interpose no objections, it was considered probable that the change of venue would be granted.

One question of the change has been raised that is whether the defense would waive drawing of a capital venire since the law provides that defendants in capital cases shall be present when the capital venire is drawn. The capital venire for the current term of Jefferson Circuit Court was drawn last week.

The negroes, now in Kilby Prison, are not expected to be taken to Scottsboro for the hearing Monday, but if the change of venue is granted to Jefferson County, will be brought here.

Only seven of the nine negroes indicted for an alleged attack on two Huntsville white girls as they "hoboed" their way home from Chattanooga aboard a Southern Railway freight train on March 25, 1931, will be tried in Jefferson Circuit Court. The other two, Roy Wright and Eugene Williams, have been adjudged juveniles, and will be given hearings before juvenile authorities before trial in higher courts.

The seven negroes to be tried once were under death sentences but after the Alabama Supreme Court had confirmed the sentences the United States Supreme Court reversed them and remanded the cases for retrial.

Cases of seven negroes convicted at Scottsboro of criminally assaulting two young wh[illegible] were later granted new trials under decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, will be called in the Jackson Circuit Court at Scottsboro Monday morning, Atty. Gen. Knight has been advised.

Immediately after the calling of these cases, it is expected that counsel for the negroes will make application for a change of venue, as it has been indicated such action will be taken by the defense. The Attorney General, who said last night he will go to Scottsboro Sunday to be in attendance at court the following day, restated his position in the event change of venue is granted.

"I will not attempt to suggest to the court where the defendants are to be tried," he said, "and I will not oppose their trial anywhere in Alabama that the trial judge may see fit and proper to designate." Mr. Knight has already stated he will prosecute all of the cases on their second trial. In submission of appeals to the Supreme Court of Alabama, and later to the U. S. Supreme Court, from the original judgments, he personally represented the State.

The negroes whose cases will be called Monday are Haywood Patterson, Charles Weems, Clarence Norris, Ozie Powell, Willie Roberson, Andy Wright and Olin Montgomery. Following their original conviction each was sentenced to death. All are now confined at Kilby Prison.

SCOTTSBORO, ALA., March 5.—(AP)—In the same little [illegible] brick court house [illegible] to death, a new fight for [illegible] seven negroes charged with an alleged attack on two young white girls, tomorrow will be launched.

As the first step in their new fight for the negroes who were taken from a freight train at Paint Rock on March 25, 1931, counsel employed by the International Labor Defense will enter a motion for a change of venue to Birmingham.

George W. Chamlee, of Chattanooga, Tenn., chief of counsel, for the negroes has announced that he will make the motion, and Thomas E. Knight Jr., attorney general directing the prosecution, said he would interpose no objection.

Judge A. E. Hawkins, presiding, who denied a similar motion when the negroes first were tried in April 1931, and who passed the death sentences upon them, has not indicated what action he will take.

It was indicated by preparations made in Birmingham to try the negroes, however, that he was expected to grant the removal to Birmingham. Denial of a change of venue was one of the grounds on which the United States Supreme Court reversed the death sentences.

The negroes, Olin Montgomery, Ozie Powell, Charles Weems, Andy Wright, Heywood Patterson, Clarence Norris, and Willie Roberson, have been held in Kilby Prison at Montgomery since they were sentenced here in April 1931.

SCOTTSBORO LABOR JURY TO BE NAMED AT MARCH 4 MEETINGS

Daily Worker 3-4-33
New York

NEW YORK.—In a move to further intensify the struggle for the unconditional release of the nine innocent Scottsboro Boys, and to raise funds needed for their defense, the International Labor Defense has presented a program to the National Committees of all fraternal mass organizations of the working class, calling upon them to activise every member for this task,

Strenuous efforts are being made by the National Committees to carry out this program. Delegates to a labor jury, which will go to Scottsboro as representatives of the masses of workers in every section of the United States to listen to and observe the trial proceedings and report to the workers a real worker's version of the trial. They will be elected fro the principal cities of the country during the National March 4 demonstrations against starvation and for immediate relief and social insurance.

The following jurors will be elected: from New York, a Negro worker; Cleveland, a steel worker; Chicago a white woman worker; Pittsburgh a miner; Atlanta, one white worker and one Negro worker; from Birmingham, a Negro worker and a white worker; Baltimore a Negro worker and from Detroit, a white auto worker.

Members of the various organizations are being mobilized for the March 18th Mass Meetings, in celebration of the Paris Commune and to intensify the campaign for the release of the Scottsboro Boys. Prominent speakers will address the respective memberships of these organizations, stressing their special tasks, calling on them to support the struggle for absolute political, economic and social equality of Negroes and for the defense of the Scottsboro Boys.

In a letter to the mass organizations, William Patterson, National Secretary of the International Labor Defense, urging them to, rally and support the defense, states in part:

"In the struggle for defense of the Scottsboro Boys, your organization has played a conspicuous part. The present situation, menacing the lives of the Scottsboro Boys, more fiercely than ever, places immediate, pressing tasks before us. Now comes the crucial test, the fierce struggle, which must complete the victory won and bring life and freedom for the nine innocent boys."

Every worker and workers' organization is urged to take active part in this mass program! Not a moment is to be lost! The toiling masses have proclaimed a verdict of freedom and life for the Scottsboro Boys! Now we must win the verdict! Send letters and telegrams demanding the release and safeguard of the Scottsboro Boys, to Gov. Miller, Montgomery, [illegible]!

Scottsboro's Skaggs Case

Journal & Guide
3-4-33
Norfolk Va

THE notorious Norfolk Skaggs-Harper case is unpleasantly remembered and is recalled by the latest development in the more notorious Scottsboro (Ala.) case. In the former, one man was catapulted into the shadow of the electric chair by the perjury of a woman, and saved only by accidental circumstances. In the latter case there are strong indications that nine youths are now on the verge of a legal lynching because of the perjury of two women. Indeed, had it not been for the intervention of the United States Supreme Court, through the efforts of the despised Communists' International Labor Defense machinery, the boys would long since have "burned."

The latest development in the Scottsboro case is a letter from the chief complainant, who swore that she was raped by the nine defendants, repudiating her testimony and declaring that the police made her lie and that the boys are innocent. This letter came into the possession of the police, who kept its contents secret for a year, and who were finally compelled by legal processes to furnish the defense with photostatic copies of it. The letter, with certain words deleted follows:

i want to make a statement too you Mary Sanders is a goddamn lie about those Negroes * * * (deleted) those policeman made me tell a lie that is my statement because i want too clear myself that is all too if you want to believe me ok. if not that is ok. you will be sorry some day if you had too stay in jail with Seight Negroes you will tell a lie two those Negroes did not touch me or those white boys. i hope you will believe me the law dont. i love you better than Mary does ore any body else in the world that is why i am telling you of this thing i was drunk at the time and did not know what i was doing i know it was wrong to let those Negroes die on account of me i hope you will believe my statement Because it is the gods truth i hope you believe me i was * * * (deleted) but those white boys * * * (deleted) me. i wish those Negroes are not burnt on account of me it is these white boys fault that is my statement and that is all i know i hope you tell the law hope you will answer

RUBY BATES

There are certain elements in the Scottsboro case that closely resemble the Norfolk Skaggs fiasco. White people, who sickened at the spectacle of an ignorant Negro being railroaded to the electric chair for a crime he did not commit, furnished the evidence that finally freed Harper, although Virginia justice let the perjuress go scot free. A former lover of Ruby Bates, the woman who swore, at the instigation of Alabama police officers, that she was raped by nine boys while hoboing on a freight train with both white and Negro youths, furnished the police with her letter revealing her as a self-confessed perjurer. In both cases the police did its utmost to the very last to sustain the perjurers. Our guess is that when on March 6th the Scottsboro boys are retried Ruby Bates will go on the stand—at the instigation of the police—and say that she never wrote that letter. And that will be that. The eight boys will be convicted again, and resentenced to die.

A strange thing about the Scottsboro case is that the Montgomery Advertiser, a newspaper whose editor, Grover C. Hall, was awarded a Pulitzer prize for fighting the Ku Klux Klan, has been one of the chief incubators of public opinion—mob sentiment—for the execution of the Scottsboro victims. It seems that the Advertiser wants to vindicat[illegible] snap judgment of a court of its state. Attempted Murder

2-1-33
New York, N.Y.

UP TO NOW we have been satisfied to base our plea for the Scottsboro boys on the fact that they were not tried in a manner consistent with the Constitution of the United States. It was this fact which moved the United States Supreme Court to reverse the decisions and order new trials for the seven whose cases were brought before it.

THE INTERNATIONAL LABOR DEFENSE, which is in charge of the defense of the boys, all along has insisted that the whole thing is a frame-up and that the boys are not guilty of the charges brought against them. To substantiate this contention the organization on Monday released verbatim copies of a letter written in January of 1932, by one of the white girls the boys are accused of attacking, to a former sweetheart, in which she unqualifiedly repudiates the testimony she gave in the Scottsboro courtroom when the boys were tried. It is this testimony on which they were convicted.

THE HUNTSVILLE, ALA., CHIEF OF POLICE, into whose hands the letter fell, did not voluntarily surrender the letter or copies made from it to the defense attorneys. On the contrary, court action had to be resorted to before it was made available to them. Needless to say, the letter is a most damning document. The woman does not stop with refuting her testimony; she asserts that "those policemen made me tell a lie," confesses that "I know it was wrong to let those Negroes die on account of me" and closes with "I hope you tell the law."

NO WONDER THE POLICE CHIEF REFUSED, until he was forced, to disclose the contents of the letter. Ironically enough, the "law" this white woman asked her former sweetheart to tell about the innocence of the boys is the same "law" which still seeks to send them to their deaths. It is the same "law" which the International Labor Defense contended and is now in position to prove framed the whole case, and the same "law" before which the defendants are to be tried again. In the light of this letter, the Scottsboro case is more than a frame-up. IT IS ATTEMPTED MURDER.

THE International Labor [illegible] deserves the commendation of all people for its efforts to insure a fair trial for the Scottsboro boys.

In order that the success of this fight may not be handicapped by lack of sufficient funds, every necessary dollar should be contributed to the proper authorities for disbursement. Cases of this kind carry with them certain necessary expenses. There are lawyers' fees for investigations and even propaganda must be paid for.

However, those who contribute to the Scottsboro Defense Fund desire to have their money spent for the exact purpose for which it was given. As laudable as the Scottsboro defense is, the raising of funds in connection therewith is becoming a racket. Under the guise of protecting those innocent boys, there are vultures raising money in the name of this holy cause for their own use. The Scottsboro Defense Fund has not seen the money and never will.

Because of the service rendered by the I. L. D. in thihs case, THE TRIBUNE desires to see that organization free itself from all false accusations and rumors. It, therefore, suggests that the I. L. D. make an accounting of all expenses in connection with this case as well as the funds obtained. At the same time, the loose manner of collecting money should be stopped. Only the responsible officers of the organization should handle the money. Under the wave of hysteria, poor people are giving of their substance. This is as it should be. However, grafters and chiselers should not be permitted to pocket the dimes of the poor people.

If something is not done to stop this unwise method of raising money, when another noble cause arises, it will be so shot through with suspicion that it will be impossible to obtain the funds necessary for its successful prosecution. The public has the right to know how its money is spent. An accounting is required. I. L. D., let us have it for your own protection.

President ANGELL of Yale, speaking a few nights ago in behalf of Fisk University, an institution in Nashville, Tenn., for the higher education of the Negro, said in its support:

If history has taught us one thing more conclusively than any other, it is that one cannot permit any segment of a population to be snubbed, ill-treated and deprived of opportunity, without having the bill come back home to be paid a thousandfold, at the hands of the group which indulges in that kind of ungenerous treatment.

What he said of that institution to whose excellence Dr. KIRKLAND, Chancellor of Vanderbilt University in the same city, bears witness, may be given a wider application.

There are 21,000 Negro college graduates in America today. They are employed in much higher ratio than those who have had no college training and are contributing to better living among their people. As to Fisk education, it is not one "adjusted" to the Negro, nor one provided "instead" of a good education somewhere else. It is an education of the highest type provided where the Negro is economically best able to avail himself of it, and where he can exert the most direct influence to raise the standards of other schools.

The Negro population is nearly one-tenth of the total population of the United States, and more than one-half of it is urban. At no place is the strain on democracy greater, to quote President ANGELL further, "than at those points where races "of different color and divergent "cultural antecedents live side by "side." But such an institution as Fisk University, standing near Vanderbilt University, both supported largely by private philanthropy, is an evidence of the determination to meet this responsibility of democracy. Next door to the Fisk campus is the new plant of the Meharry School, so that these two institutions "duplicate on a worthy scale" the plant of Vanderbilt University, located two miles distant.

RACIAL HATREDS

"We are a white and a Negro race here together—we are here to live together. The world at this time and in many lands is showing intolerance and showing hate. It seems some times that love has almost deserted the human bosom. It seems that hate has taken its place. It is only for a time, gentlemen, because in the great things in life no matter what they are, it is God's great principles, matters of eternal right—that alone live. Wrong dies and truth forever lasts, and we should have faith in that."

It was an Alabama judge who said that, a white man, a gentlemen of the oldest American stock. Judge Horton, in charging the jury, was speaking only of the exhibitions of race prejudice in the course of the trial of the unfortunate Negroes who were convicted of assaulting two white women at Scottsboro, but he might have been speaking for and to all the world.

Not in many years perhaps not in centuries, have there been such violent outbreaks of racial hatreds as have been manifesting themselves in these troublous times. In Germany the Nazi Government has proclaimed its hatred of the Jews to the point of barring them from almost every phase of the national life. Between the Germans and the Poles hatred is so intense that when the shadow of a German flag, on the Polish border, fell upon Polish soil, there was an indignant protest by the Polish government. The Italian people are developing a new national pride which has racial intolerance as its foundation. And we do not need to point to the racial hatreds which have barred the Orientals from Australia and the United States.

We do not by any means advocate opening the doors to all sorts and conditions of men, but we do believe that these racial hatreds are a step backward and not forward in the world's progress. We believe that it is possible for all the peoples of the world to get along amicably, since we are all in the world and can't get out of it. If it proves impossible, because of the stirring up of racial hatreds by prejudiced or malicious interests, then we can see nothing ahead but a complete collapse of civilization as we know it and a return to the Dark Ages when every man's hand was turned against his brother.

In my opinion, the comments and insinuations recently made by Mr. Heywood Broun in the case of the negro charged with rape who was convicted a few days ago at Decatur, Ala., were not fortunate. They were partial, misleading and tended to create an erroneous impression wherever they were read. They were particularly objectionable to people of southern rearing and environment, and who have been confronted with great difficulties. Sympathetic treatment on the part of Mr. Broun was not asked for or expected, but fair and understanding treatment was, of a matter which had more than a local significance, involving as it did so much out of which passion and prejudice might spring.

Mr. Broun is clearly entitled to his opinion that the verdict of conviction in the negro's case was wrong.

I may have the same opinion, but neither his opinion or mine would necessarily imply a reflection upon the jury that heard all the facts, saw the witnesses face to face, and were instructed by an impartial judge how to weigh the testimony and apply the law.

In this case, owing to the grave nature of the charge, the fact that the accuser of the prisoner was a white woman and the accused was a negro, together with other elements of an unusual nature which entered into the trial, it should be noted that the presiding judge was most careful and scrupulous in telling the jury not to let any other consideration enter into its deliberations save the one of the guilt or innocence of the defendant irrespective of his color. While in a way the charge of the court was approved by Mr. Broun, his comments were in fact a challenge to the judge to put in practice his statement by seeing to it that the convicted man was not punished, and the inference was that if he did not intervene to set aside the verdict this would prove his inconsistency and lack of courage.

This was so far fetched and fantastic that it needs only to be stated to carry its own refutation and reveal its absurdity. Then Mr. Broun makes much of the fact that one of the attorneys for the prosecution said in his argument that no "Jew money in New York could buy justice in Alabama." This remark, made no doubt in the heat of argument, was prejudicial, uncalled for and unjustified. The trial judge so ruled and promptly told the jury not to consider it.

The state's attorney also repudiated the remark of his associate, but he, too, was pilloried by Mr. Broun for saying that if the negro was acquitted that he might go to New York, where he could meet Dr. Fosdick and be dressed in fine clothes, as did one of the women involved, who made a visit there and on her return repudiated her former testimony. From what I read of the facts, while this, too, may be a matter of criticism, on the other hand it may not be; but to condemn a jury's verdict, the whole trial of the case, the people of Morgan County and the State of Alabama for an ill-considered remark by a lawyer in a contested criminal law suit, is more of a reflection upon the good judgment and fairness of Mr. Broun himself. Had it been a white man and not a negro involved, the chances are that Mr. Broun would not have noticed the remarks. Then this writer, not content to select here and there instances in the trial of which he did not approve, not only sneers at what he calls Alabama justice, but inferentially the good faith the intelligence and humanity of the entire south in its treatment of the negro.

He attempts to soften this by saying that while the negro is oppressed in the south, he has tuberculosis in the north, which I suppose he considers as an equitable offset. Mr. Broun also draws the picture of a slave ship and how its shadow yet rests upon the land as it once did upon the sea, and speaks of New York as still shuddering at the thought.

If Mr. Broun had the proper understanding and perspective of his subject instead of indulging in such fancies, he would have found satisfaction in the fact that the negro was convicted after an orderly trial in a regular court of justice, that he was defended by able counsel from New York, who had been employed in his behalf, who were accorded every opportunity to conduct the defense of the prisoner and who made every objection possible from the way the panel of jurors was selected down to the smallest detail of the testimony offered. The case was fully argued and no attempt was made to curtail its presentation. The leading attorney for the defense said while he did not approve the finding of the jury, which few lawyers ever do when it is against their contentions, that he would say that the judge who tried the case was eminently fair in his rulings and his charge.

Such a tribute should not have passed unnoticed by Mr. Broun.

Then the writer should not have mentioned a slave ship. This had less to do with any thing pertinent to the trial than the intemperate remarks of the lawyers for the prosecution. It served only to recall something no longer existent and excite feeling among the unthinking. Mr. Broun should know that the chances were that the slave ship of which he speaks belonged to some New England owner, also that slaves were first introduced in this country by England when it was still a colony of England, that slave capture and traffic became afterwards largely a northern enterprise, that the reason slavery became more common in the south than in the north was due to the fact of a warmer climate and peculiar agricultural conditions. The time never was and if it ever existed it has long since passed, when the south should be upbraided for an institution, however wrong, once approved and recognized by the laws and constitution of the country.

It presents a very incongruous situation and one I suspect that is wholly imaginary for New York to shudder at the shadow of a slave ship which sailed the seas 200 years ago, when it complacently accepts the fact that the selfish money power of the metropolis has been busy forging the chains of an industrial slavery more widespread, hateful and destructive than African slavery ever was at the zenith of its existence.

Mr. Broun should know that while racial antagonism exists in some quarters, that it is also deplored by the south, and he should further know that a negro in the south on the whole is better treated than in the north. He should realize that the problem of the white and black races living together is a serious one, requiring reasonableness, forbearance and patient effort to solve on the part of both. He should further understand that mob violence is fast becoming obsolete as a method of punishment in the south, that more and more the negro is being accorded an orderly trial in the courts of justice when charged even with atrocious crimes, as witness the trial of the negro in Decatur.

This is as it should be. My hope is, and it is that of the great majority of southern men, that the day will soon come when lynch law will be only a hideous memory.

In the meantime this will be accelerated by the will and moral consciousness of the southern people uninfluenced by Mr. Broun's article.

SCOTTSBORO NEGROES WELL FED, THEY STATE

Constitution

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., June 19.—(AP)—Reporters of the Birmingham Age-Herald today, after an investigation of the treatment and food given the nine negro defendants in the Scottsboro case, declared unfounded statements that they were ill-fed and flogged.

The investigation was made after a statement had been issued in New York by the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners stating that the negroes were ill-fed and flogged daily.

Andy Wright, one of the negroes, told the three men that he got plenty of food and felt all right, but that he had lost 20 pounds during his two years' incarceration. Wright said he weighed 19[illegible] pounds when arrested. Jail officials said he had not been weighed at all.

Charlie Weems, another of the negroes, told newspapermen he was feeling well and had been treated all right. Roy Wright, in an adjoining cell, refused to talk.

The Nation And The Scottsboro Cases

[illegible]

To the Editor of the Tribune:—

America how can you claim to be
A Christian land
Sending the gospel of the Christ
To every heathen strand?
While within your very borders,
Oh horrors to relate,
Your dark skinned sons are tortured
And burned upon the stake
[illegible] black mothers bear in anguish
Sons to be thus sacrificed
To white men's evil passions?
Must their manhood be denied?
Oh poor black boys of Scottsboro,
Does the nation bid you die
Victims for your color's sake?
Her love, is it a lie?
Stand forth oh mighty nation,
Indeed to conquer sin,
Not only in far distant lands
But here at home within.

Legal Lynching.

The prosecution in the "Scottsboro case" has been dealt another blow by Ruby Bates' repudiation of her testimony in the trials which resulted in the conviction of eight negroes on charges of attacking two white girls two years ago. The negro boys were at that time sentenced to hang on the evidence of this girl and her companion against them. The Supreme Court subsequently found the trial unfair because the defendants were not provided with adequate counsel and ordered the trial now in progress.

If this new development does not completely exonerate the defendants, certainly it so impeaches the credibility of the previous testimony of the Bates girl as to make her earlier charges insufficient basis for putting eight men to death. Even if the Scottsboro negroes do escape the fate that was prepared for them, however, the unusual publicity focused upon their trial has awakened the country to the strange eccentricities of southern justice. Whatever satisfaction may be derived, if and when the earlier sentence is lifted, will be dimmed by the apprehension that the nation has been privileged to see a sample of justice characteristic of many parts of the country.

If many have been appalled by the illegal lynchings that have come to public light more might be shocked by legal murder performed under the cloak of justice. The first Scottsboro trial undoubtedly has had its parallel in times without number. Hapless negroes have been given the form but not the substance of legal protection and have been lynched as truly as if they had been yielded up to a mob instead of entrusted to the hardly less tender mercies of sham justice.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE

The verdict rendered by the jury in the famous Scottsboro case, over in our sister state of Alabama, was in strict accordance with the law and the evidence.

High-priced lawyers hired by the National Association for the Protection of Colored People, a moronic and utterly needless organization, have hurried home to collect their fees they didn't earn.

Big time newspaper correspondents sent down from the North to write the story failed miserably. There was nothing to write about—just a common, ordinary trial in a country town that fell far short of the space it occupied. The big time boys couldn't find even a remote resemblance to race prejudice in Scottsboro.

Scottsboro Case Travesty on Justice

ALABAMA, no doubt, will remain firm in her attitude toward the colored race regardless of the storm of indignation created by inflicting the death penalty on a group of Negro boys, charged with attacking white women while beating their way in a freight car.

The people of the United States generally, desiring justice alike to white men and black, believe the flimsy evidence introduced at the trial of the Scottsboro defendants was insufficient to have warranted conviction in any other state in the Union.

IT should be said in all fairness that the intolerance exhibited in the case in question by certain people of Alabama is not representative of true Southerners. It will be remembered that Alabama and other states of the South were invaded by swarms of carpet-baggers during the post-Civil War period of reconstruction. Their descendants are not less bigoted in antagonism toward the colored race than they, themselves, were grasping and corrupt.

The higher courts are still to speak, the fight for the lives of the convicted youths to be continued. The infliction of the death penalty on the accused youths without presentation of more convincing evidence of guilt than so far has been introduced will give Alabama a black mark from which she will not readily recover.

PRESS COMMENT ON THE SCOTTSBORO CASE

To the Editor The News:

First reaction to a perusal of the symposium "National Press Comment on the Scottsboro Case," published in Sunday's News-Age-Herald, is a realization of the infinite number of different angles or points of view from which may be considered an event of so popularly engrossing interest as the one under discussion. But far and away the best and sanest summary of the enlightened Southerner's position is the one so admirably set forth by John Temple Graves in his column in Friday's Age-Herald. As this seems eminently worthy of republication in this column for the benefit of those who may have missed it in The Age-Herald, a copy is herewith included for that purpose:

> Worth pasting permanently in every Southerner's felt and every Northerner's derby is Judge James E. Horton's charge to the jury in the Scottsboro case retrial last Saturday. It was rebuke enough to Solicitor Wade Wright's unpardonably crude appeal to racial and sectional feeling and to the International Labor Defense's equally unpardonable appeal to class feeling. It spoke for a justice honorably and perfectly blind to all such influences and for a South which can be loved without either fearing or hating any other section. It introduced a refreshing note of nobility into one of the most completely ignoble pictures Alabama has ever had to look at.
> Walter Lippman paid this column the compliment last Tuesday of wiring from New York for its opinion of the Scottsboro case and asking "what, if anything, I could helpfully say?" It seems to us that the most helpful thing Mr. Lippmann could say is that enlightened Alabamians—and there are thousands of them—have their fingers crossed, that they want with all their hearts to be fair, that they believe the death penalty a social necessity in the South for the crime of which the Negroes are accused, but that they are by no means certain of guilt in this instance and that even if there is guilt the circumstances seem to call for executive modification of sentence. And that they have no more patience with Solicitor Wright than they have with the International Labor Defense. And that they do not believe in lynching—by hand or by telegram.

One phase of the trial which has failed to elicit the comment to which it would seem to be entitled is the flouting, seemingly with impunity, of the state's laws against perjury. At least two of the witnesses testifying in the latest trial are convicted of legal perjury, as of the record. Are they to be allowed to get away with this? If so, the perjury laws may just as well be erased from the state's books.

Mr. E. P. Lacy, in Friday's News, cites Lincoln's position, expressed more than two years before the opening of the Civil War, that "he was not then nor ever had been in favor of bringing about in any way the social and political equality of the white and black races" and that he "was not then nor ever had been in favor of making voters or jurors of Negroes." There can, of course, never be, in the purview of the white Southerner, any question as to social equality. That is simply unthinkable. On the political side Lincoln's position was undoubtedly correct as to the whole body of Negroes at that time and perhaps still holds good as to the majority, but much water has gone over the dam in the intervening 74 years and simple justice seems to require recognition of the fact that many members of the Negro race in the South are at this time fully equipped for the suffrage and for jury duty.

In conclusion, in connection with consideration of all the problems posed by the Scottsboro case, it may be found not unprofitable to ponder carefully the dictum of Justice Fuller recently cited in this column: "The finger of the Almighty has written on the everlasting tablets of the universe that no nation can endure and prosper into which, and through which, does not run the golden thread of equal, exact and universal justice."

Alabama and the Country

In postponing the second of the Scottsboro retrials Judge Horton has acted with great propriety and with an evident desire to serve the true ends of justice. After Mr. Leibowitz's unprofessional outburst had been published in Decatur, to proceed would have been a travesty of justice. A fair trial in that jurisdiction clearly became impossible, and through Judge Horton the State of Alabama has now recognized the fact. It may, indeed, have been Mr. Leibowitz's intention to produce exactly that result; if so, the matter is immaterial. The Scottsboro cases have now taken on an importance which transcends the importance of Mr. Leibowitz. of the Communists, the Negroes and the Decatur jurymen put together. They present a clear test of whether the American system of criminal law is capable of guaranteeing a genuinely fair trial to accused persons even when the bitterest of passions and prejudices have been stirred up deliberately, not only by the prosecution but by the defense as well.

To attain some sort of perspective it is necessary to review the development of the cases. The eight Negroes were arrested, put through an obviously hasty and careless form of trial and unfairly condemned to death. That the trial was unfair is the verdict of the United States Supreme Court; it constitutes a black mark against Alabama justice, and the fact stands that only through the intervention of Communists and "New York Jews" was the State of Alabama prevented from unjustly taking those eight lives.

Remembering that there have been similar miscarriages of justice in our own and probably every other state of the Union, this much, nevertheless, must be recognized: Alabama justice was originally at fault; and it was this fault which gave the Communist International Labor Defense its opportunity. The opportunity was ruthlessly and shamelessly exploited, not in the interests of the defendants but in the interests of political propaganda. Mr. Leibowitz is not a Communist; his method of conducting the case, however, when he finally took it over, was such as unavoidably to inflame the passions already aroused. To make good the grounds for appeal, he felt it necessary to raise the question of the exclusion of Negroes from jury service; but this also made it virtually impossible for a Southern jury to acquit. The fate of the defendants was thus linked to a vast social and political issue in which their individual rights and interests were bound to be swallowed up.

After the reversal in the Supreme Court, Alabama opinion in any event would have been under a powerful temptation to "justify" the original conviction by a second one, whether it was just or not. The Communist intervention, with all its attendant propaganda and publicity, operated to exaggerate the temptation a thousandfold. Many statements of the Attorney General prosecuting the retrial, the indefensible address of the solicitor referring to "Jew money" from New York, and finally the verdict—apparently against all the weight of evidence, and now condemned as "outrageous" even by Southern newspapers which excoriate the defense tactics—make it only too apparent that this motive has utterly vitiated the first retrial and will inevitably vitiate the others unless this tragic history can be halted.

The central fact in the whole case is that the eight defendants have become simply pawns amid forces which threaten to grind them to dust without regard for the actual merits of the evidence against them. That is an impossible situation, for Alabama and for the country at large, and instinct with dangerous possibilities for the future. There is, however, one straight road through it. That is for Alabama opinion itself to make a new start, for upright and public-spirited Alabamans—such as Judge Horton himself—to take the case into their own hands, to exclude alike Communists, political lawyers, courtroom orators and mob ignorance, and insist that the facts as they have been established be sifted in fair trial with a sole eye to ascertaining what happened. Every man and woman in the country now has an interest in this case and has the right to ask of Alabama that she enlist her best brains, her ablest and most public-spirited leaders, to guarantee that whatever be the outcome of the case it may be accepted as a fair one. That, after all, is the one thing that matters, the one test of justice, the one way in which the state may emerge from an unhappy and tragic affair with nothing but honor to itself and its courts. Alabama cannot be coerced by others, but the decent opinion of the United States has the right to ask this much of her.

Pendulum Thinking In The Scottsboro Case

Much of the intelligent and devoted work in the interest of harmony between the white people and the Negroes in the South has been frustrated by the flaring passions focussed upon Decatur during the last ten days. The consecrated life of Dr. Booker T. Washington and that of his worthy successor at Tuskegee Institute have been partially nullified by this fresh outbreak of brutal hatred. What has been done by such responsible and sincere organizations as the Commission on Interracial Cooperation and a committee composed of men like Dr. Howard W. Odum and Mr. George Fort Milton, for the study and discouragement of lynching has suffered a needless setback.

This newspaper is in no position to pass judgment upon any of the official acts of the court at Decatur. As a Southern institution, however, it is deeply concerned in serving the best interests of the South. The welfare of this section depends upon good will between the white and the black races. Any person, be he a Southerner or a Northerner, who deliberately exercises an influence calculated to injure that good will is not a friend of the South. As The News has already attempted to point out, there are men in Alabama who by nature are capable of thinking of the Scottsboro case in terms of legal and moral integrity. Judge James E. Horton, for instance, is one of those men. In the face of the most taxing circumstances, he proved a consecration to truth and duty which was almost superhuman. When difficulties of the case became actually insurmountable, he courageously closed the doors of the courthouse in order to avoid making a mockery of the justice which he has sworn to uphold. The state of Alabama should see to it that men with Judge Horton's brand of honor are its representatives in future trials of the Scottsboro case.

Much pendulum thinking has been done on both sides of this case. That is to say, there has been a tendency for individuals, organizations and sometimes for newspapers to fly to extreme conclusions. The steadying and conservative influences have been all too few in comparison with the radical and irresponsible factors. It goes without saying that the connection of the International Labor Defense with the case is extremely unfortunate for both sides. If it is true, as many persons have averred, that the I. L. D. wishes to make martyrs of these Negro defendants, that it wishes to insure their execution in order to add incendiary force to its world-wide communistic propaganda, then it certainly does not behoove the prosecution to run headlong into such a trap.

Southerners should realize that the wildly radical International Labor Defense is no more respectable in the North than it is in this part of the country. It is erroneous for us, as Southerners, to leap to the conclusion that representatives of the I. L. D. are men who embody the characteristically Northern view on the Negro question. As a matter of fact, conservative and balanced attitudes on the Negro in the North are not very different from views on a corresponding plane in the South. Although it is frankly seeking the best interests of the Negro, the American Association for the Advancement of Colored People is almost aristocratic as contrasted with the unruly, chaotic and anarchistic International Labor Defense. The one compares with the other about as the extremely radical I. W. W. organizations have compared with the American Federation of Labor.

In reality, the Scottsboro case is not a grand fight to the finish between the state of Alabama and the rest of the world. It has developed into an important test involving the legal situation of the Negro in the United States. The South is profoundly interested in a fair and equitable settlement of that question. In placing a man like Judge Horton on the bench, the state of Alabama has gone a long way toward establishing its good faith. Now if the legal counsel on both sides at the next trial can be composed of men capable of seeing the larger issues at stake, the whole matter of racial attitudes in the United States will be advanced as much as that cause would be hindered by a further display of single-tracked rancor and malice.

To the Editor The News:

Your thoughtful generosity in reprinting several columns of national editorial comment on the Scottsboro case for the information of your readers should and doubtless will be highly appreciated by your host of readers. Personally, I very much appreciate it, since I have wanted to know what the feeling of the nation is in this connection.

I am sure the majority of informed Alabamians have their own ideas about the merits of the verdict in that case. I am equally sure that practically every person living in our state wanted a verdict of justice handed down, and not only in the case already tried, but the others to follow as well. Most of us read everything we could find in connection with this case, the evidence submitted, etc., and contrary to some of the communist editorials found in these reprints, fail to find where a miscarriage of justice is in evidence.

It is entirely beyond my imagination how any justice-loving man or woman can place the slightest credibility in the story of a woman of the type represented to us in the person of Ruby Bates. Had I been a member of the jury trying the case, and knew no more about the case than has been published, I should have been obliged to eliminate all consideration of her testimony. A woman of her character is as much apt to tell the truth in the first instance as the second, and more so, as I see it, for the fact stands out that she had been tampered with and was all dressed up in glad rags of questionable origin on her second appearance on the stand, a striking contrast to the first. If the brilliant defense attorney believed the queer story that two white women conspired to get money out of a bunch of ragged, hungry, loafing Negro hoboes, that any reasonable man would wager didn't have a dollar among the whole crowd, I confess he is in a class by himself. The story itself is the most ridiculous and laughable of any I have ever heard and no one believes it, not even the defense attorneys. Her boy companion, who likewise suddenly found much prosperity in the midst of this history-making panic, changed his common attire for one of costly apparel, and his mode of travel from the side-door Pullman to the luxurious comforts of the side glass windows. Quite a difference, if you ask me. It typifies a story seldom found in real life, and strange as it may seem, for a hobo. Believe his story if you want to. I reserve the same right.

The character of these women has nothing to do with the trial verdict. If the accused are innocent every honest person in Alabama, and there are millions, Leibowitz's insinuations to the contrary, want them freed, and on the other hand, if they are guilty of assaulting even the most lewd white woman, we want their lifeblood as the penalty—nothing short will suffice.

The assault made on the trial jury, the people of Alabama as a whole and the state government itself by the great lawyer of the defense is resented, and rightly so, by every honest, loyal Alabamian, and but for his stupidity and nonsensical way of handling the case, no military protection would have been necessary for him or anyone else. A Southern lawyer under similar circumstances in the North would have it just as he did here. From his acts and words we are conclusively reminded that his chief concern was acquittal for those darkies, regardless of the evidence, or their guilt or innocence. We of Alabama don't want that; death if guilty, freedom if innocent, is our motto in an assault charge.

To the defense attorney and his communist backers will go the credit of turning back our state 50 years in the solution of our race problem. It's such a pity that the freedom of our country permits such men to scatter their poison wherever they go. Here is hoping that the new deal will put an end to that.

JUDGE HORTON'S ACTION TO BE COMMENDED

JUDGE JAMES E. HORTON by his act in postponing indefinitely the Scottsboro cases because of a bitter criticism of Alabama juries attributed to Samuel Leibowitz, of defense counsel, proved that Alabamans do have a sense of justice and fairness. The New York Herald-Tribune quoted Leibowitz as follows concerning the jury that convicted the first of the Negroes facing retrial on charges of assaulting two white girls:

"If you ever saw those creatures, those bigots whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs, whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy, you would ask how they could do it."

Whether Leibowitz made such a statement or not makes, as Judge Horton said, little difference. Its publication would influence any jury against the man who was alleged to have uttered it. Leibowitz had cause for bitterness, but such an attack as is attributed to him in the New York newspaper goes beyond all bounds of decency and good sportsmanship.

Judge Horton realized that such a statement would likely prejudice any jury against its author and those whom he represented, and he is to be commended for his action in postponing the cases.

N. Y. EVENING POST

Letters From Post Readers

THE PLAIN TRUTH ABOUT THE "SCOTTSBORO CASES"

To the Editor of the Evening Post:

Sir—Your comment that the injection of Communism into the "Scottsboro case" was as prejudicial to the defense as racial prejudice is an understatement. The verdict of guilty appears logical, if not inevitable, to one who watched with dismay the antics of the defense. The result culminated in Decatur, but it was fomented way beyond the confines of Alabama by misguided "friends" of the defendants. These "friends" attacked the State and its system and customs, and sought to intimidate its officials. They should have directed their zeal to an intelligent defense. They reaped precisely what they sowed. They introduced false and extraneous issues and now wail because of the presence of those issues. The defendant ought to have been acquitted, and probably would have been had the defense not been so tactless.

From the outset the defendants were handicapped by their color and by the accusation of a serious offense against white girls. The problem was to overcome these barriers. Adding fuel to the flames may serve as an emotional outlet, but it is not a rational way to cope with flames. The International Labor Defense, whether justifiably or unjustifiably, is anathema to Alabama. Its agitation did irreparable harm. You can't eradicate custom and thought by hullabaloo. You can't ram social or racial equality down the throats of Alabamians any more than you can foist them upon New Yorkers. You can't browbeat people into treating you fairly or denounce them into accepting you as equal.

Whether or not the exclusion of Negroes from the jury is a pernicious system or violative of our democracy is not the crux of the case. How often is a Negro seen on a New York jury? What percentage of Negroes here serve on juries? Has a Negro the same chance before a New York jury as a white person? Even if Negroes had been on the jury panel, the State, as is its right, would have challenged them. The result, therefore, would have been the same—a Negroless trial jury. Attacking the custom of excluding Negroes from jury service was a misconceived trick to divert attention and create atmosphere. It had the effect of offending those from whom an acquittal was sought. It is not valid to retort that what is demanded is "justice" and that "justice" is a right and not a favor. No literate lawyer deliberately insults judge or jury. Southern Negroes do not aspire to jury service, nor do they indorse the performance of the labor defense organization.

Let us face actualities and not to be too idealistic or academic. It was folly for a Jewish lawyer from New York to defend a Negro before a rural Alabama jury, just as it would be folly for a New York City lawyer, Jew or Gentile, to appear as counsel before a rustic New York jury. The wisdom of engaging local counsel does not lie in custom alone; it has an advantage which no litigant or lawyer interested in the result ignores or minimizes.

That there should have been no prejudice against the defendant because of his race goes without saying. And that there was prejudice is undeniable. But conditions must be coped with as they are, not as they should be. Practical problems cannot be solved by "hiring a hall." There is no such thing as abstract justice. "Justice" depends upon its administration, and its adminstrators are humans. Hence, human factors cannot be disregarded. Everywhere—yes, even in free New York—justice is affected and influenced by external forces. And any jury lawyer worthy of his salt strives to meet these forces. Bringing one's head into violent contact with a brick wall may constitute an exhibition of courage, but it only produces harm to the owner's head.

The wild observation of the prosecutor concerning "Jew money from New York" was inexcusably stupid. But Alabama officials hold no monopoly on stupidity. Examine the reviews of New York cases and see how many reversals are ordered because of improper remarks by judges as well as prosecutors. And unless my memory does me a disservice, the chief counsel for the defense has challenged the third-degree methods of officials in 100 per cent civilized New York.

In all this crusading its paramount aim should not be allowed to escape. If the objective is to sacrifice these boys for the greater cause of forcing equal recognition of civic rights, the "friends" of the defendants may be ranting along the right path. And if the agitation is designed to supply notoriety for the agitators, the methods pursued are effective. But if the lives of these boys be the sole stake, then let the blundering engineers of the defense withdraw and intrust it to those who will conduct the case as a legal trial and not as a bombastic publicity campaign for "principles." The boast has been made that no Alabama lawyer would essay to challenge the policy of excluding Negroes from jury service. Perhaps. The course has not seemed expedient or necessary. But many Alabama lawyers would have obtained an acquittal here solely on the shallowness and unworthiness of the prosecution's evidence.

The "mob spirit" does not pervade the duly constituted authorities of Alabama, but the mischievous "friends" of the accused. If these boys are being "lynched" the rope is being woven not by the Alabama courts but by the Negroes' "friends."

I am not unmindful that the "friends" caused the case to be carried to the Supreme Court, where a reversal was ordered. But the price they are exacting for this service is too great. More, the Supreme Court's decision was upon the merits; it was not forced by agitation. And what good are reversals if the conduct of these "friends" continues to produce convictions?

Lest the writer be arraigned as anti-Semitic, allow him to say that he is, unshamedly, a Jew.

Playing With Fire

The parallel drawn in New York by apologists for the Scottsboro negroes of the treatment of negroes in the South and of the Jews by the Nazis in Germany is manifestly and grossly absurd. It slanders the Jews.

In Germany are 65,000,000 people. The Jews in the whole world number about 15,000,000. In all Germany are not more than 3,000,000, perhaps not more than a million and a half, Jews. In these Southern states are some eight or nine million negroes in a total population of perhaps 26,000,000 or 30,000,000. Hence, existing in the South is a racial question. Jews are German, Spanish, English, Russian, of all nationalities, and they are white people like the rest of us. "Jew" is a religious, not a racial term, whatever the popular ignorance to the contrary. White Southerners believe that mixed racial government is impossible, that it would lead to anarchy. Negro government had its trial between 1867 and 1877. It failed. It was anarchy. If the Jews in Germany numbered 25,000,000 they would take care of themselves. There is no doubt about that. There would not be a Jewish persecution.

The weapon of the Nazis is the boycott. The boycott is a synonym for starvation, extermination. In the hands of a powerful majority it is the most destructive weapon conceivable.

Fancy the white people of the South boycotting the negroes, refusing to employ them, refusing to lease lands and homes to them. What would happen? The poor negroes would starve unless in a body they left the South and threw themselves upon the charity of the North. About two million and a half of them are now in the North. There is no Northern community in which they are numerous that does not discriminate against their labor in favor of white labor.

The Southern white people are contributing the only possibile solution to the so-called negro question. They are giving the negroes work. In proportion to numbers there are ten negroes out of employment in Chicago and New York this day to one in South Carolina.

Mr. Norman Thomas speaks of the "industrial exploitation of the negroes in the South." What could be more opposed to the ruth? Where is the Southern employer of negro labor who is not burdened with debt, not trembling on the verge of bankruptcy?

Where is one who does not yearly risk his ill to keep his negroes alive? We are not saying that he does this out of benevolence. The circumstances compel him. Nevertheless, his management, his leadership, his capital stand between the negro and chaos.

Remove the white men from the South and who shall say that the confusion of Haiti will not follow? Always, when the negroes were slaves and when the negroes were free, they have had to be cared for by the Southern white men.

This Leibowitz, the lawyer, returns from Decatur to New York to be carried on the shoulders of negroes who proceed in thousands to disobey the police and fight them, trample them. We quote from The New York Herald Tribune: "Mr. Leibowitz was bitter about the trial." He denounced the jury in terms so bitter and coarse that we do not quote them.

"It has become," he declared, "a question of the bigoted whites of the South against the 14,000,000 negroes of the nation." We do not think so. If the lawyer be correct in his analysis war against the State of Alabama and destruction of it is what he preaches.

That war has been fought once. Alabama finally survived and is strong, and why? Because the white public opinion of the United States, forty-eight states, supports Alabama.

There are white ruffians in the South and fools, plenty of them. There seem to be white and black ruffians in New York city. This man Leibowitz and his associates, whatever their good intentions, are inciters and encouragers of ruffianism.

They are the agents of mob law. They are denouncing the courts of law.

The Southern negroes need friends and have them. The News and Courier is their friend, for sixty years, day in and out, it has denounced lynching for any cause, for all causes.

What can we do for the poor negroes while Leibowitz and his party pour upon us Southerners vituperation through the conduit of the Northern press?

We write of these things not in anger, but in sorrow. We speak for millions of poor negroes. They have our sympathy. They have always had it.

We know few white Southerners who will not divide a crust of bread with them in the time of depression.

We know, too, of the white ruffians and their wrath.

We have got to have white civilization, or none, in these Southern states. That means white juries

JUDGE HORTON'S ACTION SHOULD BE RECOGNIZED

If any one in the north doubted for a moment that the Courts of Alabama stand ready to see that a fair trial is given all comers, be they white or black, they can now be convinced, by the action of Judge Horton at Decatur Monday. When he brought an abrupt end to the court session because of alleged inflamatory remarks of counsel for defense in the celebrated Scottsboro case, made in New York City, Judge Horton was protecting the interests of the other negro defendant who was about to be brought to trial.

Imagine the feeling of the average Alabama white man when he read accounts in the newspapers of the alleged New York meeting addressed by Attorney Leibowitz. It can be well understood how hard it would be at the moment for that man to be strictly impartial and unbiased. His judgment would be pitted against an inflamed passion caused by an unnecessary attack made in fertile and foreign fields. Down it, he probably could, but it would be very hard, under the circumstances. And there might even unconsciously crop out at the fringes bits of animosity which would work against a fair and impartial trial. Judge Horton acted wisely—and cautiously.

We trust the defense attorney will take note of this movement for impartiality in meting out justice. If he is fair, he will recant, apologize and express his thanks to Judge Horton. It is hard enough to deal with an alleged rapist. To do so justly under such aggravating circumstances as was created by Attorney Leibowitz is almost beyond most of us.

LAUD LEIBOWITZ AT MEETING HERE

O'Brien and McCooey Speak as Funds Are Raised to Appeal Scottsboro Case.

Racial, religious and political lines were erased when 7,000, the majority colored, filled Arcadia Hall, Halsey st. and Broadway, at a meeting planned to raise funds with which to appeal the decision in the Scottsboro case and to welcome home Samuel Leibowitz, defense counsel.

One of the surprises was the appearance on the speakers' rostrum of Mayor O'Brien a few seconds after the Rev. Dr. Thomas F. Harten, chairman, had announced the Mayor had been invited but that it was understood a previous engagement precluded his presence.

Hardly had Dr. Harten made the announcement than the Mayor was seen slipping silently up the centre aisle to the stage. As he was recognized the crowd burst into applause which lasted five minutes and was ended only when the Mayor held up his hand for silence. He spoke briefly, saying he was happy to lend his presence and aid to such a cause. He praised Leibowitz for his work, which he termed determined and valiant.

"We will do the best we can," the Mayor said. "Anything we may do we shall not be sorry for."

From his own experience as a judge, he said, he knew how disheartening it was to sit on the bench and have juries bring in unjust verdicts, but the only way this situation could be improved was by changing the hearts of the men in the jury box.

"Have faith in the country's institutions and in its leaders, and justice will eventually triumph," the Mayor said. "Let us hope that we will soon round the corner to prosperity."

A few minutes after he had closed, William Patterson, Communist candidate for Mayor last fall, who had been sitting almost next to the Mayor, was introduced.

The meeting was held under the auspices of the National Afro Protective League, of which Dr. Harten is president. He is pastor of the Holy Trinity Baptist Church, one of the largest colored congregations in the borough, and is a national leader among his race.

Among the speakers were Democratic National Committeeman John H. McCooey, Register Aaron L. Jacoby, Magistrates David I. Malbin and Sylvester Sabbatino, Tax Commissioner John R. Crews, a Republican; State Transfer Tax Appraised David Soden, Edward F. Cadley, Democratic leader of the 17th A. D., and Dr. Alexander Lyons, of the Eighth Ave. Temple.

THE SCOTTSBORO NEGROES

In the trial of the Scottsboro negroes, according to press reports, the Attorney General at one point actually applauded the statement of a witness testifying for the state. In arguing the case to the jury one of the prosecuting attorneys made the statement that defense witnesses had been bought with Jew money.

Why the necessity of 'lugging' such stuff to a trial when the eyes of the whole world were looking for the slightest evidence of unfairness or race prejudice? Such conduct and such a statement on the part of the prosecuting officials were uncalled for. They were not warranted by the record and were not necessary to secure a conviction. Probably they did not affect the jury in the slightest, but when the whole defense is based upon the theory of projudice all such claptrap merely adds to it when presented to the United States Supreme Court.

And why should the Attorney General see fit to go around over the state and take charge of the prosecution in sensational cases? Especially in cases where there are no complicated legal questions involved and where nothing is to be done other than a simple presentation of the facts. And especially where the regular solicitor is probably a more effective prosecuting attorney than the Attorney General? And more especially where the defendant is an ignorant negro without a friends in the state?

One may wonder if the Attorney General's office is actuated by a desire to get into the limelight. The practice seems to have become prevalent first during the term of Hon. Charley McCall and it looked like he made a mess of things every time he undertook to get a little court notoriety. Notably Geneva and Columbiana.

We are not criticising the official act of the Attorney General in going into different counties and taking charge of the prosecution of criminal cases, but we doubt the wisdom of the practice, especially when it adds to the sensational aspects of the case.

Scottsboro Defense Fund

Ministers of the city rendered a mighty fine service to the race when in the Ministerial Alliance an agreement was reached with the N. A. A. C. P. to raise money in the various churches last Sunday. In a pouring down rain few communicants entered the church doors Sunday, and yet their collective mite represents $46.77. It can easily be seen that if the regular church congregations had been on hand fully $100 could have been raised. It is perhaps asking too much to go right back into the same churches for an additional contribution, but the Scottsboro cases are going to be long drawn out legal actions. The last Sunday contribution shows what can be done through and by concerted effort. Six months from now the N. A. A. C. P. will seek again to bolster up the Scottsboro Fund and the local branch can borrow the same key they used Sunday to unlatch the pocketbooks of the populace.

The Black Dispatch believes that in every community in Oklahoma where there is a church, the Negroes should attempt to raise their mite for this cause. There are hundreds of small communities where if no more than $1 is raised in a collection, it will go far to create the very sizeable fund which must be raised if this now famous court action is to be prosecuted with vigor.

The First Baptist church and the A. M. E. church at Red Bird have this week forwarded to this office $1.54. Another church at Drumright sends $2.31. The sender of the latter contribution did not include the name of the church and that is the reason for our not announcing it.

On the front page of this issue we have started a Scottsboro Defense Fund. The regularly organized N. A. A. C. P. branches over the state will, of course ,send their special contributions direct to the New York office. The Black Dispatch, however, desires to compile data covering what is done along this line in Oklahoma and we use this method of determining same. Ask for a church collection Sunday and forward same to this publication. We will publish the name of the individual or the church making the contributions.

Once again we want to repeat: it is the ministers of the race who have the most direct influence over the masses. If the doors of the church were opened to the Scottsboro Defense Fund, all over America, the necessary money could be collected in one week-end rally.

—From Resolution of the Communist International on the Negro Question in the U[illegible] States, Oct. 19[illegible]. Reprinted from "The ([illegible] the N[illegible] Question, (25c), Workers' Library Publishers, P. O. Box [illegible]8, Station D, New York City.

IT is only a Yankee bourgeois lie to say that the yoke of Negro slavery has been lifted in the United States. Formally it has been abolished, but in practice the great [illegible] of the Negro masses in the South are living in slavery in the literal sense of the word. Formally, they are "free" as "tenant farmers" or "contract laborers" on the big plantations of the white landowners, [illegible] they are completely in the power of their exploiters; they [illegible] not permitted, or else it [illegible] made impossible for them to leave their exploiters; if they do leave the plantations, they are brought back and in many cases whipped; many of them are simply taken prisoner under various pretexts and, bound together with long chains, they have to do compulsory labor on the roads. All through the South, the Negroes are not only deprived of all rights, and subjected to the arbitrary will of the white exploiters, but they are also socially ostracized, that is, they are treated in general not as human beings, but as cattle. But this ostracism regarding Negroes is not limited to the South. Not only in the South but throughout the United States, the lynching of Negroes is permitted to go unpunished. Everywhere the American bourgeoisie surrounds the Negroes with an atmosphere of social ostracism . . .

IN the struggle for equal rights for the Negroes, however, it is the duty of the white workers to march at the head of this struggle. They must everywhere make a breach in the walls of segregation and "Jim-Crowism" which have been set up by bourgeois slave-market morality. They must most ruthlessly unmask and condemn the hypocritical reformists and bourgeois "friends of Negroes" who, in reality, are only interested in strengthening the power of the enemies of the Negroes. They, the white workers, must boldly jump at the throat of the 100 per cent bandits who strike a Negro in the face. This struggle will be the test of real international solidarity of the American white workers.

It is the special duty of the revolutionary Negro workers to carry on tireless activity among the Negro working masses to free them of their distrust of the white proletariat and draw them into the common front of the revolutionary class struggle against the bourgeoisie. They must emphasize with all force that the first rule of proletarian morality is that no worker who wants to be an equal member of his class must ever serve as a strike breaker or a supporter of bourgeois politics.

Scottsboro Struggle Stirs White Toilers of the South

By NAT ROSS

5-[illegible]-33

THE great effect upon large sections of the white toiling masses of the South resulting from recent developments [illegible] Scottsboro [illegible] of fundamental importance. For decades, the Southern ruling class has successfully poisoned the [illegible] of the white masses of the South against the Negro people and created a jim-crow system on the basis of it. As a result of the Scottsboro fight a dim light is beginning to shine thru the darkness of prejudice, among the white workers.

THE DECATUR TRIAL

The white workers could see plainly in the Decatur trial that Negroes were kept off the jury not because they lacked intelligence or ability, but because they were Negroes. They saw that the exclusion of Negroes was based fundamentally on the same causes which excluded the "poor whites" (the majority of the toiling white population of the South) from jury service also. The white workers saw that the Scottsboro boys could not get a fair trial under such circumstances. They were dazed by the testimony of Ruby Bates. Some of them still said the boys should burn just as a lesson to Negroes anyway. Others hesitated, and said that both girls were liars and no good. But many of them knew and said that no white girl who had been raped by six Negroes would have the nerve to lie about it and for that matter it required plenty of honesty and courage to tell the truth in the face of the white lynchers in Decatur.

The "rape bogey" of the Southern exploiters had received a smashing blow in the nose and the white masses saw it.

THE Southern white toilers were greatly impressed by the wonderful fight of the International Labor Defense. They were hearing about the mass actions of all peoples the world over. And right in their own community they saw growing unity. In Birmingham, Scottsboro meetings were held where Negro and white sat together and where white workers and intellectuals called for the freedom of the Scottsboro boys. They saw on May 1 in Birmingham, Ala. how Negroes don't rape white women but defend them from police thugs who try to arrest them, even to the point of beating the cops.

The white workers saw how Tom Mooney, whom many of them idolize, almost unnerved Tom Knight when the latter received Mooney's wire in the Decatur courtroom demanding the freedom of the Scottsboro boys. The white workers are being roused by the growing struggles of the Negro masses in the South. That is why you will find many white workers sympathetic to the I.L.D. on the Scottsboro issue. That is why for the first time since Reconstruction you will find a deep-going interest, discussion and curiosity among the white masses on the Negro question.

PREJUDICE STILL DEEP

Of course, it would be just as wrong not to mention the still existing deep-going prejudice of the majority of the white toiling masses. It is a fact that winning the white masses for the fight for Negro liberation is one of the most important and at the same time one of the stormiest tasks of the Revolutionary movement in the South. The Scottsboro case, among others, has helped to throw new light on the struggle. More and more sections of the white toilers see in the fight for Negro rights and freedom their own salvation from the hunger, terror and reactionary schemes of the jim-crow and lynch rulers of the South. That is why the united front of all toilers in the South for their common interests becomes the all-burning issue of the day.

NEGROES AND COMMUNISTS

To the Editor of The New York Times:

"In Topics of The Times," under the caption of "Justice and Propaganda," you referred to the Scottsboro demonstrations in Washington by the Communist forces as detrimental to the hopes of the nine Negro youths incarcerated in an Alabama prison awaiting retrial.

Clear-minded Negro citizens are by no means in accord with these radical displays. If the white people of this country would scan the pages of Negro newspapers and publications of the better class they would note that Negro leaders and the majority of the rank and file resent this injection of Communist tactics into the affairs of the race. Negroes realize that the Communist interest in their misfortunes has a selfish motive.

The Negroes of America hope to assure the defendants of a square deal from the Alabama judiciary but strenuously voice their resentment against the Communist and other radical groups polishing up the electric chair for these youths by their uncalled-for tactics. The Negroes realize that in order to gain complete economic, social and political justice we must do so through sources within the government itself, and not through foreign or pro-foreign hostile radical groups.

True, a few Negroes will be found in the ranks of these radicals, but they are only those who are unable to see beyond an indefinite point described by Communist agitators. The agitation has proved a temporary outlet perhaps for their own emotions so long pent-up within them. It gives them a sort of temporary satisfaction to parade before a government which they accuse of being indifferent to the injustice they suffer. It is not their intention to destroy the only form of government they know, as the Communists desire, but they are under the impression that by making plenty of noise along with the Communist agitators perhaps they can attract the government's attention.

So it is up to the government to seek the honest cooperation of Negro and white leaders and to decide some program of bettering race relations. There will be no justice in America for the Negro until such a program is adopted. The Negro's faith in America must be preserved. Only America can accomplish this, and only by improving the Negroes' status so as to permit them to enjoy life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness guaranteed by the Constitution.

Justice and Propaganda. The Communist stamp was all over the Scottsboro demonstration at the national capital on Monday. This does not say that the nine young Alabama Negroes standing in peril of their lives ~~should be~~ made to suffer the consequences. The paraders in behalf of justice for the Decatur defendants chanted the "Internationale." This only means that the Communist leadership in this country is more interested in propaganda than in justice. It cannot mean that the American people in general and the people of the State of Alabama in particular must imitate the Communists and sacrifice justice to external considerations.

Justice is not always an easy thing to bestow. If this were so it would not be the precious thing it is. The fact that communism is making capital out of the Scottsboro case is something for the public to keep in mind, but not for our judges and juries. They must work without irritation and without resentment. Incidentally, that is the surest way of spiking the Communist guns.

5-[illegible]-33

National Action Comm. Gives Next Steps

NEW YORK.—Organization of "Scottsboro Marching Clubs" of those who partook in the recent Free the Scottsboro Boys March to Washington, was recommended by the executive committee of the National Scottsboro Action Committee, Saturday.

The Clubs will take active part in performing the tasks outlined by the Committee in its fight to save the nine innocent Scottsboro Negro boys and to win democratic rights for the Negro people, it was announced.

"It is necessary that there be organised bodies to carry out these tasks," the Committee said in its announcement. "It is proper that those who partook in this historic march, the first mass march to Washington on behalf of the Scottsboro boys and the Negro people, should be organized together, and that they should fulfill this function."

Concretization in states and cities of the Bill of Civil Rights for the Negro people, in the form of city-ordinances, and state laws embodying the same principles and demands of rights, was also decided upon by the committee.

Immediate perspectives for action by the committee include the obtaining of a million signatures to the petition for the release of the Scottsboro boys, addressed to President Roosevelt. Two hundred and five thousand signatures were presented to the president by the marchers.

The campaign for the passage of these laws, as well as for the federal bill presented to the president and congress by the marchers will be built around the slogan of "Mass Violation of Jim Crow Laws" it was decided.

It will include canvassing of all representatives and senators in Congress, as well as local and state legislators, and the exposure of all those opposed to the Bill of Civil Rights.

A Southern Negro's Viewpoint.

Editor The News:

Since the date of the alleged crime of the famous Scottsboro case, almost every nation has contributed its ideas and demands as to what action the fair state of Alabama should and must take in regards to same. Sir, please allow me, as a colored citizen of the state of Alabama, space in your paper to make a brief review of all efforts and its effects as relates to the Negro not only of the state of Alabama, but to the entire South.

The propaganda and legal efforts of the International Labor Defense, and Communists have only succeeded in contributing a flame to destroy the good will of the good white people, the various agencies that have and are working for the advancement and protection of the Negro of the Southland.

Northern money and northern attorneys are not needed to attack the state of Alabama to secure justice for the state's Negro population. The Negro and all others should drop the idea that Negroes are convicted in our courts solely because they are ignorant and Negroes.

When we realize that the judges and lawyers, and jurors of the state of Alabama are fully capable and efficient to determine the innocence or guilt of a defendant, then we will be heading somewhere, the Negro should join hands with all efforts to curb such activities of the Commmunists and International Labor Defense.

Because the southern white man has learned that judgment is the application of the trained intellect to human lives, and he knows that it is the power to see, to appreciate and to use the truth in improving the condition of mankind, and I want all colored people of the South to know that when we learn to fall in line with the above instruction we will then feel some relief, and not before.

The Scottsboro Case

Planet

Much ado has been raised over the trial of the nine Negroes being held in Alabama on charges of assault upon two white women. Charges have been made and withdrawn, attorneys criticized and praised, jurors have been made to feel that they were far below the moronic stage as far as intelligence is concerned, and the general public is left to feel that the Scottsboro boys are really not live characters, but mythical creatures who furnish loads of copy for overworked newspaper reporters.

Thus far, only one of the boys has been retried—and convicted. The dust has yet to blow over from this trial. One of the two girls who made the charges has withdrawn her accusations. Regardless of the all-too apparent weakness of the girls' stories, the first Negro to be tried was convicted.

Richmond, Va.

What sort of business is this, anyway? When are we to straighten this affair out? Please, let this one trial of Negroes in a Southern state be a fair one. The South is tired of hanging its head when the word "justice" is mentioned.

Let these nine boys be tried, not as Negroes, but as men. Let that sink in, readers. Not Negroes—MEN!—The Richmonder.

THE SCOTTSBORO FIASCO.

Editor of The Daily News:

After the perusal of two editorials, one of them appearing in the Record, under the caption: "Justice Runs Amuck in Decatur, Albama," and the other in the Daily News, "One Question Remains," I was very favorably impressed with the fairness and impartiality of the temper manifested in both articles.

I, also, was reminded, at the time of the question once put to Solomon regarded as the wisest law maker of his day, as to what is the best government under which to live. His reply was: "That is the best government where, when an injury is done to the humblest citizen thereof, it is felt by every one living under that government."

The population of the United States is heterogeneous. Perhaps more so than any other government of the globe. The negro comprises an important element of this population; consequently, he is entitled to fair play and justice under the federal and state constitutions as a citizen, but too often he gets a very raw deal, from those in authority, who have the power and the might. This is clearly evident in the infamous Scottsboro fiasco.

As the Daily News truly asserts, it is not so much the negro boys that are on trial today as it is the judiciary of the state of Alabama, and I do not believe I would be far wrong when I add that, the whole south is indirectly on trial, if it passively condone this travesty of justice in the lynching of these seven boys "within the law."

Judge Horton, presiding, is seemingly fair and just, as is indicated in his address to the jury trying Patterson, one of the boy defendants, in cautioning them that, when "women of the underworld, who at one time or another have perjured themselves, face a jury, their testimony should be regarded as questionable."

Furthermore, the doctor who was summoned by the state, almitted in his direct testimony that, as a result of the examination of the two women, in less than two hours after they got off the train, both the girls were "in a normal condition, mentally and physically and showed no signs of hysteria, when being examined."

But, notwithstanding the caution of Judge Horton and the testimony of the state's witness, the examining physician, 12 men (tried and true?) found Patterson guilty as charged. And that too, when the presiding judge, in his charge, urged them to ignore race and color in arriving at their verdict. Thereupon, the Daily News pertinently suggests the question: "What constitutes a reasonable doubt in the eyes of an Alabama jury?"

One of the main reasons why thousands of negroes have left the south is due to the fact that, whenever some of them have been charged with committing certain crimes against whites in some parts of this section the jury has already too often concluded, regardless of the evidence in the case, that he is guilty because his face is black.

While each state in the union was made more or less self-determining in its governmental polity by the founders of this republic, so far as its relation to the other states is concerned, nevertheless, it was understood that each and all of them would conduct themselves for the good and best interests of the entire union.

This being true, should the southern states passively condone the railroading of these seven colored boys to the electric chair by the state of Alabama, they will play the role of Saul of Tarsus, holding the clothes of the martyr Stephen, while he was being stoned to death by his enemies.

While I do not know what the final outcome will be in the trial of these boys, yet I do not believe I am wrong when I say, if they are required to pay for this miscarriage of justice, they will not be the only ones to suffer, as long as a just and impartial judge reigns in heaven.

SOBER SECOND THOUGHT ON THE SCOTTSBORO AFFAIR

Reporter
5-27-33
Birmingham, Ala.

The passion generated by the Decatur trial of the Scottsboro youths has about subsided. The best thought of the South has had time to precipitate. It might be that now is a good time for the sober thinking men and women of both races to use their good offices conjointly to avert any further advertisement of the sorry mess.

Admitting that the Court did the best that such a Court might have done under the circumstances, there yet remains something that the sober thinking people of influence might do or might have done to clear the way for the operation of justice. The stamina of a community is not measured so much by what its citizens think and do as by what they will stand for being done in their area, or how they express dynamic disapproval of what they know to be out of harmony with the [illegible] principles for which they stand.

So long as mass injustice has the silence of a community's influential leadership it, by this token, feels itself to have their backing and support. This is the license on which mass injustice has done business in the South for a long time.

The good and just white people of the South, and there are many of them, have been maligned for what they have permitted or stood for being done without open or sincere protest more than for what they have done or abetted.

Clearly, the license for mass injustice is extended on their silence.

There are so many Biblical instances in which Jehovah brought calamity on Israel not for what the best of them did, but for what they permitted the worst of them to do without any show of righteous indignation.

There are many things which, in themselves, cannot be helped immediately, but there are few, even of the worst things might happen, which could be continuously and highly probable in the face of a stern and sincere "We-will-not-stand-for-that" coming from a community's major influence.

We say "major influence" because we do not yet believe that a majority of the South is sympathetic with mass injustice.

It would seem that the State of Alabama has had enough of the Scottsboro affair—convincingly enough to arouse its moral leadership to arms out of its silence.

Statement By 3 Beth-Or Members Holds Rabbi's Views In Condemnation

5-29-33

Montgomery, Ala.

Rupture With Followers Laid To His Insistence

By WILLIAM J. MAHONEY, JR.

Jewry of Montgomery yesterday challenged the assertions which Benjamin Goldstein, former rabbi of Temple Beth-Or, made in New York, and which were quoted in an article published by The Advertiser, on the authority of The New York Times.

Speaking as individuals, members of the Beth-Or congregation discussed the views and attitudes of the former rabbi which had gradually made his position here untenable—a condition which he fully recognized, and which was responsible for his leaving voluntarily.

In addition to a formally prepared statement, signed by three members of the congregation speaking for a large and representative group, the writer has obtained through conversations with other individuals views and opinions of a situation that for the first time in many years threatened the religious and racial tranquillity of Montgomery—striking through communistic argitation at the marked line between the white and black races.

Statements Challenged

The formal statement issued yesterday was signed by E. J. Meyer, Jr., Dr. Clarence K. Weil, and Phil Baum. It follows:

"There has been no meeting of the congregation, of which Rabbi Goldstein was the former rabbi, since the publication in today's press of the alleged statements of Rabbi Goldstein; nor has any formal action been taken by it. However, some of the individual members of the congregation feel that these alleged statements of Rabbi Goldstein should not remain unchallenged.

"The statement of Mayor Gunter, as quoted in this morning's Advertiser, is correct in every detail and has their unqualified approval. Mayor Gunter did not urge Rabbi Goldstein to leave Montgomery. Rabbi Goldstein was not dismissed as the Rabbi of the Congregation. As a matter of fact, Rabbi Goldstein, learning that his religious beliefs and purported Communistic activities were distasteful to the members of the Congregation, voluntarily stated that he would not stand for reelection, and later asked for a leave of absence from the further performance of his duties as rabbi, which was granted, and he left Montgomery.

"They believe that the entire community, Jews and non-Jews, never endorsed or condoned, but in fact condemned Rabbi Goldstein's views and attitudes."

The Full Story

Observations and comments, collected at random yesterday, brought to light the full story of Rabbi Goldstein's tenure of office here, marked by a gradually increasing tension in his congregation. The major portion of this story is of concern only to the congregation.

Mr. Goldstein served for four years as rabbi of the Congregation of Temple Beth-Or. His congregation was the first to feel the effects of original ideas and drastic changes. But his rebellion against the established order was creedal and doctrinal, affecting none but his own congregation, which was free to accept or reject, as it pleased.

Mr. Goldstein had a large group of friends and followers in Montgomery, among non-Jews as well as Jews. These men and women recognized in him a brilliant mind and an original thinker. Some subscribed to all that he said, others differed from him violently, while still others found his utterances and opinions worthy of weighing if not accepting.

When Mr. Goldstein enlarged the scope of his activities to include a crusade in behalf of the Scottsboro and Tallapoosa negroes, he found himself surrounded by a small sympathetic group that included some Jews and some Christians. It is significant, his friends here point out, that not even a representative minority of his [illegible] was in that group.

Advertiser

But Mr. Goldstein's enlarged activities met with active opposition on the part of many of his congregation. Most Montgomerians realized that he spoke as an individual, but some felt it possible that a few might have construed his utterances as those of a spokesman for the Jewish people. His activities became more and more out of harmony with his congregation and increasingly embarrassing to them. The end was inevitable.

Other Factors in Break

Though his activities in the Scottsboro and Tallapoosa cases were directly responsible for Mr. Goldstein's failure to stand for reelection, actually these cases were but the culmination of differences in his own congregation. Finally, being directly opposed to his radical tendencies, his congregation saw no reason for sacrificing their principles for the sake of social ideas and economic changes with which they were not in sympathy.

"I am fond of my right hand," commented one member by way of illustration. "I value it highly and would hate to lose it. But if that hand were diseased and threatened the welfare of my body, I would sacrifice it. Mr. Goldstein's connection with the congregation was an open threat to the welfare of that congregation."

Natural Southern resentment of outside interference in its own affairs is an attitude appreciated and shared by Montgomery citizens of Jewish faith. One member of the congregation voiced that view when Mr. Goldstein became openly associated with the so-called International Labor Defense:

"In the South certain restrictions to which the negro is subjected exist as a matter of necessity. Anyone familiar with the events which took place in the South immediately after the War Between the States will appreciate better the reasons why these conditions exist.

"Most Southerners are anxious to see the negro better his condition, not to the extent of social recognition but to the point where he is allowed equal opportunity for education and for progress."

The Negro Situation

"This State has done much to improve the educational facilities of the negro and has reason to be proud of its schools for colored people. In addition we have an interracial committee composed of outstanding white and colored people, whose chief function is to assist in maintaining peace and harmony between the races. White men whose business brings them in contact with negroes treat them with every consideration, often supplying them with food and medical care which they are too improvident to provide for themselves. I believe as the years go on the race problem will gradually settle itself—provided only that outside interference is not brought to bear on either group.

"It is just such outside interference that is responsible for the present status of the Scottsboro case, and directly responsible for the unfortunate racial clash in Tallapoosa County."

At the time of the Scottsboro agitators' rally in Birmingham, Mr. Goldstein was placed on the program. The board of his congregation promptly instructed him not to attend. Ignoring this, Mr. Goldstein attended and spoke. Several of these incidents of fact were colored by imaginative rumors of inciting race prejudice that became increasingly frequent. Finally there were so many reports current about his activities that it was impossible to verify or disprove them all.

A friend of Mr. Goldstein's, a member of his congregation, finally went to him with the entire matter, and detailed the embarrassment he was causing his congregation. Mr Goldstein promptly requested an immediate leave of absence, to terminate only at the conclusion of his services with Beth-Or. His request was granted as promptly, and there the matter ended, insofar as his congregation was concerned.

Members here yesterday deplored his action in New York in disinterring the story, and followed with their explanation of it. "The matter was closed with us when he left Montgomery," said one, "and it is unfortunate that he has seen fit to reopen it. It is an unpleasantness we will be glad to forget."

Declares He Understands Klan Is Firing Crosses At Jewish Homes Here

NEW YORK, May 26.—(Special)—Rabbi Benjamin B. Goldstein said here today that he had severed his connection with Temple Beth-Or in Montgomery, Ala., because his activities in behalf of the Scottsboro prisoners and negro sharecroppers in Tallapoosa County had split his congregation into factions and had laid members open to violence at hands of klansmen.

He also said Mayor William A. Gunter, of Montgomery, suggested he leave town and charged Mayor Gunter with helping to spread inciting stories.

"I was told," Goldstein said, "that my sympathy for the Scottsboro boys and for the Tallapoosa negroes who were shot down by deputy sheriffs had caused a partial boycott of Jewish merchants in Montgomery and neighboring communities. Furthermore I understand that the Ku Klux Klan is now burning crosses by night in the front yards of Jewish citizens down there. The Mayor told me he understood I was the Southern agent for the International Labor Defense and that I had got Samuel Leibowitz into the Scottsboro case as defense counsel because he was a Jew and I was one."

Goldstein declared that the story which caused him to leave town was that "I was to lead a riot of negroes against the whites on May 20." He said that "the Mayor told me he understood that the Ku Klux Klan were preparing to take measures against me because of the views I held, and that he thought it best to oppose the klan."

Goldstein also asserted that the Mayor cited the new criminal anarchy ordinance just passed, telling him (Goldstein) "it might come in handy in the near future."

Dr. Goldstein denied that he was a communist and said, "Anyone who tries to take an impartial attitude towards the conduct of the Scottsboro case down there is immediately branded a communist and nigger lover." He said he did not believe the "Scottsboro boys" had a fair trial.

Boycott Charges False, Declares Mayor Gunter

Rabbi Goldstein's charges were brought to the attention of Mayor Gunter yesterday by an inquiry from The New York Times. In reply, the Mayor made the following statement:

"That the statements made by Rabbi Goldstein, or any other person, that there has been any boycott here of any Jewish merchants, or the burning of fiery crosses in front of any Jewish homes, is an absolute falsehood.

"The Mayor has no knowledge of any activity here of the Ku Klux Klan which, so far as he knows, is dead in this community.

"That he did not urge Rabbi Goldstein to leave Montgomery but that in view of the delicacy he feels in interfering with relations between the Rabbi and his congregation, he prefers to refer an explanation of that matter to members of the congregation, who are writing personally to the editor of The New York Times."

I [illegible] Ruby [illegible] Monday evening and talked with her as one woman to another until her companion or sponsor began to censor her statements. As a whole, Ruby is not hard to look upon, has a keen sense of humor and shows evidences of much cultural advancement since the good old days on the freight train.

Ruby Bates

Though she had just spoken at a large meeting in Philadelphia, and the Camden meeting place was unbearably warm, she smiled thru it all and repeated that she "could go thru anything for the sake of the boys" she had wronged.

Mother With Her

When questioned about the attitude of her parents towards the affair she said that her mother was "with her," but her father against her.

"Victoria Price would testify, too," she stated, "but her hands are tied. She is out on 15 years' probation and she was afraid the officials would get her if she told the truth." She did not know why Victoria had been sent to the penitentiary as that happened before their acquaintance.

Some crude lads who had been allowed, because of crowded conditions, to stand on the platform at the rear of us wanted to know if Ruby "would make a date with them." Ruby, however, was very cautious. Her sponsor reminded her that there was a Philadelphia reporter standing there.

You All's

When Ruby spoke she showed an amazing stage presence. With the exception of a few "I writtens" and "you all's" her talk was excellent.

The varying effects she had on her audience were interesting. Everyone, however, was curious about her general appearance. What they saw was a well-formed, plump, soberly-dressed white girl. She laughingly told of her clothes — of the wild tales that had gone the rounds about them. Their cheapness spoke for themselves.

Black Pumps

Her dress was a dark blue figured georgette cut on very simple lines. She wore black patent opera pumps that, though apparently new, had already bulged on the sides, making room for two bunions to stretch.

Through her tan silk stockings large scars showed—scars that fairly shrieked, "Hobo." I liked her head, a nicely shaped one, whose graceful lines were enhanced by brown, boyishly cut well-groomed hair—so well groomed that it was difficult to place her with the proverbial stringy-haired "poor white."

Thrilled with Traveling

She seems to be thrilled about all the traveling and she keeps a record of each place she visits. Where she was to stay that night was kept a dark secret, as no one was successful in locating her residence.

Hearing for Patterson's New Trial Granted

Quick, Mates, Here's Treason!

Over in Decatur, Ala., this Judge Horton trying the Negroes for alleged assault upon two white girls, declared from the high place on the bench last Friday that a witness was not beyond belief just because he had been engaged in illicit liquor dealing.

There's an expression that the frivolous sometimes use about a fellow's hat being blown in the river, and if we were less serious-minded and knew more about slangy phrases we should certainly try to ring that one in at this point.

If the "died"-in the wool prohibitionists who have been denouncing everything and everybody who said a kind word for temperance instead of being outright rising and shouting prohibitionists, led by mitred politicians and crusaders, should ever get a crack at this judge, what would happen to him would be aplenty.

We have been educated these many years in Georgia to thinking that if a person glanced even in the direction of anything alcoholic, there was a big hobgoblin just ready to swoop down on him, and if a poor devil was found with a flask of water in his automobile or donkey-wagon it was complete justification for shooting him to death on the highway, and investigating afterwards.

Oh, a crime against the fanatical liquor laws was the worst thing in the category, and now for a judge to say a man was still credible even if he had dealt in the stuff is just too bad for anything. He ought to be shot, and Georgia law would not wait until sunrise!

This newspaper has been much cussed and discussed for its wet proclivities, up to that point that we long ago lost all claims to and consciousness of respectability. We had fully made up our minds just to go on to hell and be done with it. The holies had said we were gone, and we had accepted their judgment, because others knew more about the hereafter than we did. Then here comes a judge who ups and says even a man who had dealt in liquor was still respectable insofar as his veracity was concerned.

Well, we ought to confess that we dealt in liquor once, so as to become thoroughly classified under this recent judicial declaration, and maybe get that additional benefit of claim to respectability. A highly-respected physician asked us if we knew where some good liquor could be obtained for a Methodist preacher who was ill and needed a stimulant—that the man was old, had had the flu and was badly in need of some good whisky—that the doctor would pay for it if I would go into the shadow of the penitentiary in the name of humanity. I told the doctor I would get it for the minister and to give it to him with my compliments. The physician delivered it in his automobile, and the minister accepted it and used it.

The Georgia law which legislators are being urged to change provides that a person who in Georgia buys or sells anything that may be used for beverage purposes which contains over ½ per cent of alcohol shall upon conviction be placed upon the chaingang with all its horrible conditions.

That same law which was forced down the throats of Georgians without their approval or consent provides that any person, including doctors, who transport or possess any alcoholics shall be placed upon the chaingang, and the auto or other vehicle shall be confiscated, sold at public auction and half the proceeds given the arrester.

That same law which ought to be changed because of its outrageous stipulations and all the crime it has occasioned, provides that if any persons, including ministers who may be sick unto death, shall possess any alcoholics, they shall be placed upon the chaingang.

If the Alabama judge had held differently as to veracity, we should have been outlawed on that also, along with what we regarded as a justified errand of mercy, regardless of the law.

If the Georgia law had been enforced in the instance cited, a quasi-newspaper man, a moonshiner, a good physician and one of the most lovable preachers God ever made, the latter on his sick bed, their autos confiscated and divided among rum-chasers—all of these people would have been arrested and placed on the chaingang. And we have seen much argument that all killings in making arrests are justified if prohibition is involved.

We are much obliged to the Alabama judge for his judgment and his courage, and his contribution to our own self-esteem, be it ever so meagre. We have never had a particle of patience with the fanaticism that is behind Georgia's prohibition law, including what has been the Federal, and now that some progress has been indicated in a desire to change the latter, we earnestly hope Georgia will come out of the woods by removing this blot of snooping and bigotry from her own standard.

Macon, Ga.

NEW YORK, April 10. (AP)—Disorder attended the return of Samuel Leibowitz from Decatur, Ala., late Monday, where he defended Haywood Patterson in the "Scottsboro case."

A group of Negroes carried the lawyer on their shoulders from his train to a taxicab and then whites and Negroes which police numbered at 3,000, formed a parade on Broadway, starting at 34th street near Pennsylvania station.

Police in the 30th street precinct, taken unawares by the marching column of fours, telephoned ahead to the 47th street station. When the column reached Times Square, police charged them with night sticks and ordered them to disperse.

Hand to hand fighting followed. Patrolman William Griffin was beaten by a group of Negroes until white passers-by fought them off. Griffin arrested George Northcroft, 36, Negro house painter, as the man who had kicked him in the mouth and knocked out a tooth.

The parade reformed and got as far as 53rd street before the police charged again. Half the marchers hurried into side steets, but the others reassembled, marched on to 59th street and attempted to hold a meeting in Columbus Circle.

The emergency squad from the 88th street precinct reinforced the policemen already on the scene and attempted to disperse some 1,000 persons listening to speakers. Many of the marchers [illegible] as policemen swung night sticks at their legs, but the others marched on.

At 68th street they tried again to hold a meeting and the police broke them up. At 86th street the final set-to occurred. The harried marchers broke up into pairs and small groups and continued quietly uptown toward Harlem.

The entire proceedings lasted about two hours.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE AND DEVELOPMENTS.

Editor of The Daily News:

I was amazed to read recently, in a negro newspaper, of certain significant developments in the famous Scottsboro, Ala., case involving the nine negro youths who were alleged to have attacked two vagrant white girls on a moving train on which all were beating passage.

Some weeks ago one of the girls in a letter to her sweetheart confessed the nine boys were innocent and had not touched her. Prison officials had sought to suppress this letter, but it got out, nevertheless, and has been given considerable publicity in the negro press, while the white press in the South appears to be strangely silent about the matter. In this letter, which the girl wrote to clear herself in the eyes of a lover, she also claimed that she and her companion were forced by police officials to make and sustain their heinous charge which almost put nine innocent youths to death. These officials now sought to make the girl repudiate her confession; and failing in this, it is now reported that the girl has been spirited away so that she might not appear as a witness in the impending retrial ordered by the federal Supreme court.

In view of the pitiless publicity that was given this case during the past two years, with screaming headlines and many pictures, all tending to inflame popular indignation and hasten a conviction and sentence of death, permit me to ask: Is it fair and just that these later developments, which certainly are the most significant that have so far occurred in this case, should be suppressed by the white press and not be given due publicity so as to correct the many vicious impressions that the previous publicity has created? I am very much surprised, indeed, that this paper has likewise failed to give space to an item of such tremendous import.

I believe I am correct in the assumption that the newspaper is one of our most powerful agencies of education and of the shaping of public opinion. My work as an educator and clergyman has shown this to me clearly enough. It therefore appears to me that newspapers should and must do everything in their power to correct public opinion when the latter has been wrongly informed or given false impressions as the result of perjury and third-degree methods. The papers have recently been filled with accounts of a kidnapping. Here, now, was a kidnapping which was even more significant in that it is one apparently perpetrated by police and court officials who are trying to save their dirty skins.

Is it not bad enough, I am constrained to inquire, that unfortunate, defenseless people should be lynched by courts and public opinion through unfair trials and unwarranted, vitiating publicity? Do the newspapers not add to this by handling negro news as they do and by failing to give, as in this instance, widespread publicity to the perversion of justice that has almost put these youths to death? Many other cases have happened in recent months which have been manhandled in this uprighteous manner. Justice and a sense of honesty compel me to ask why this should be necessary.

The honor of a state or nation or individual cannot be preserved by such methods. It does not make for better citizenship of either white people or black; it rather effects the opposite and tends to preserve and engender much of the friction and ill-will and misunderstanding which is responsible for so much of the disaster that afflicts us in our lives.

7 Negros Win Discrimination Point at Trial

DECATUR, Ala., March 31.—(INS).—Circuit Judge James E. Horton today held that the defense in the Scottsboro criminal assault trial had made out a prima facie case of racial discrimination in the operation of the Alabama selective jury system in Morgan County.

He laid upon the state the burden of proof that negroes were not excluded from juries because of their color and Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, Jr., calling members of the jury board, immediately evidence in an effort to show the color line was not drawn when jury rolls were made up.

Judge Horton later denied a defense motion to quash the jury venire of 100 in the retrial of seven Negroes on charges of assaulting two white women.

The defense contended unsuccessfully that Negroes were barred from the Morgan County list of 2,000 prospective jurors because of their color.

Repudiates Own Story In Previous Trial, Saying She 'Was Excited' Then

DECATUR, ALA., April 6.—(AP)—In a dramatically tense courtroom, Ruby Bates, long-missing witness in the "Scottsboro case," today denied her testimony in previous trials in which eight of nine negroes indicted for an attack on two girls were sentenced to death.

The girl, missing since Feb. 27, appeared just as the defense was prepared to rest its case in behalf of Heywood Patterson, 19-year-old Chattanooga negro, and the first of the negroes to face retrial.

SPECIAL GUARD ON DUTY

DECATUR, ALA., April 6.—(AP)—National guardsmen tonight were placed on duty at the apartment hotel of Samuel S. Liebowitz, chief of defense counsel in the "Scottsboro case" as reports were received here that a crowd had formed at Huntsville to come here.

Miss Ruby Bates, one of the State's principal witnesses in the first trial at Scottsboro two years ago, who appeared here unexpectedly this afternoon in the trial of Heywood Patterson and denied her previous testimony, was under Leibowitz's protection until court opens tomorrow.

Capt. Joe Burleson, commanding the guard, said early tonight he had checked the reports and believed them unfounded but guards armed with automatic rifles were kept stationed at the hotel as a precautionary measure.

"No sir," she replied, raising her voice slightly in reply to a question from Samuel S. Leibowitz, of New York, chief of defense counsel: "Were you attacked aboard that freight train that afternoon?"

"I told it because I was excited," she replied to Leibowitz's question as to why she testified in the trials in Jackson County two years ago that she had been attacked by six negroes.

Through a long cross-examination, during which, at times, she was obviously flustered and hesitated on some questions, she reiterated that she was not attacked.

Can't Remember State Queries

"I can't remember," she replied to several questions propounded by Atty. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., particularly concerning the surname of a woman for whom she said she worked while in New York. "Marguerite is all I remember," she said.

The Bates girl, on cross-examination said Victoria Price had fainted when she reached the ground at Paint Rock and she sat holding her head in her lap.

The Bates girl said she "could not say" whether Mrs. Price had been attacked.

The court was in informal recess at the time she entered. Judge James E. Horton, presiding, only a minute or two before had said, "the court will wait eight minutes" to a whispered request from Leibowitz.

That remark was the only inkling the spectators, who took every available seat, had that something unusual was impending. Less than 10 minutes earlier, Leibowitz had rested for the defense "with reservations."

The girl, clad in a gray coat and close-fitting hat to match, was accompanied by Mrs. May Jones, social worker, of Birmingham, who said she had driven her here at the request of the Rev. Charles Clingman, rector of the Episcopal Church of the Advent at Birmingham.

Birmingham Rector Subpoenaed

Mrs. Jones was sworn to testify that she drove the girl here from Birmingham and Atty. Gen. Knight immediately asked a subpoena for the Birmingham minister.

Taking the stand, Miss Bates identified herself and, in a hushed courtroom, faced Mrs. Price, whom Patterson was charged with attacking, and identified her.

Montgomery Advertiser Ala

These two women seemed to glare at each other and Mrs. Price's pale face was suffused with color.

Lester Carter, of Knoxville, Tenn., who was on the stand during the morning was brought in and the girl identified him.

Carter in a three-hour recital this morning, during which he gestured almost constantly, had told of a clandestine meeting with the Bates girl at which Mrs. Price and Jack Tillery were present and of intimacies with her.

Taking up a recital of her movements from March 23, 1931, until she was taken from a Southern Railway freight train at Paint Rock, Ala., two days later, and, with Mrs. Price, accused the negroes of attacking her, Miss Bates admitted intimacies testified to in the forenoon by Carter.

Spent Night With Man

She said she spent the night with Carter, Jack Tillery, and Mrs. Price in a box car when the "hobo" trip was planned.

On March 24, 1931, she said, she, Mrs. Price and Carter caught a freight train to Chattanooga and there they met Orville Gillery (Carolina Slim) and spent the night in a "hobo swamp."

Unable to find work, she said, the quartet boarded a freight train the next day to return to Huntsville, and rode a box car to Stevenson.

"Me, Victoria, Lester, and Gilley boarded a box car which we rode to Stevenson, and there we got in a gondola," she said. The fight between the negroes and seven white boys occurred in the next car, she testified.

When taken from the train at Paint Rock, she said she was excited and continued in that state in jail.

"She (Victoria) told me if I did not say it (that she had been attacked) they would put us in jail," the girl testified when asked by Leibowitz if any one told her what to say.

Has Been In New York

The girl said she came here from New York, leaving there Monday and going to Birmingham.

"I certainly did," she said, when Leibowitz asked her if she met Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, pastor of Riverside Baptist Church, in New York.

The girl said she told him her story and that Dr. Fosdick sent her to Birmingham to Dr. Clingman.

Taking up cross-examination, Atty. Gen. Knight asked her: "Where did you get that hat and coat?"

"I bought it," she replied and hesitated, biting her lips, when he asked who gave her the money, but finally said, in an almost inaudible voice, "Dr. Fosdick."

Knight switched to her disappearance and she said she had gone from her home in Huntsville to Montgomery with Rosetta Brown and two "boy friends."

It took her 12 days to make her way from Montgomery to New York, she said, hitch-hiking to Chattanooga and there deciding to go to New York.

Miss Bates admitted writing her mother that she was with "Mr. Jackson," whom she could not identify further, and later, during the examination, said he had given her $20 and that she had $15 of her own when they left Huntsville.

"Who suggested going to New York?" Knight asked. "Rosetta, and I said 'suits me'," she replied.

Knight, in sharp tones, asked her who came from New York with her and she replied she came alone on money borrowed from the woman for whom she worked.

Doesn't Know Employer's Name

She could identify her employer only by the name Marguerite. She borrowed $50, she said, and took a bus to Birmingham, where she arrived at 6:30 a.m. today, and was met by Joseph R. Brodsky, of New York, one of the defense attorneys, a Mrs. Clements, and a Mr. Boley. They took her to Dr. Clingman's rectory she said.

Knight switched to what she did in New York and she said she was employed at a tourist camp at $9 a week.

Miss Bates could give no explanation for going to Dr. Fosdick with her story, saying that the women who employed her gave her his address.

"Why did she give it to you?" Knight asked.

"I asked for it," she replied, and said she did so because she had seen his name in a newspaper.

In the forenoon, during his three-hour recital, Carter provoked mirth among the spectators by his frequent use of hobo vernacular and his gestured interpretations.

His story was that, while in jail at Huntsville, he met Tillery and Mrs. Price and, through them, met Ruby Bates. After the night in the box car, he said the "hobo" trip was decided on with him and the girls going on and writing for Tillery when they settled down.

Stayed in "Hobo Jungle"

Carter said he accompanied the two women to Chattanooga, where they met Gilley, and spent the night in the "hobo jungle" near the Southern Railway tracks. In rapid, picturesque phrases, Carter told of the return journey, on which he and Gilley accompanied the girls.

Mrs. Price had said she and the Bates girl went to Chattanooga alone, spent the night in Mrs. Calli Brochi's boarding house, and boarded the train alone the next day after a fruitless search for work.

Carter said he rode with the two girls on a box car to Stevenson and then boarded a gondola in which the State alleges each of the women was attacked after six white youths were forced from the train.

Montgomery Advertiser
Montgomery Ala

On cross-examination, Carter said a minister in a "jungle" near Wynne, Ark., had told him he should tell his story as the "people in Alabama would be interested."

"Oh, there's lots of ministers on the road now," he said, when asked if he meant ministers of the Gospel, "and some of them carry Bibles."

Indications tonight were that testimony would be concluded by noon tomorrow, with the case possibly reaching the jury by nightfall.

CITES COLOR LINE AT MURDER TRIAL

Decatur, Ala., March 28.—Fighting for the lives of nine colored men accused of attacking two white girls, Samuel S. Leibowitz, Brooklyn attorney, today called witness after witness to the stand to prove that color discrimination exists in the Southern jury system.

A packed courtroom heard Mr. Leibowitz charge that "for 25 years past the officials of Jackson County have systematically refused and neglected to place the names of colored persons on the jury rolls, although some 600 residing in that county are qualified to serve."

Mr. Leibowitz challenged Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, jr., to name a colored man who had served as a juror in Jackson County in the past two decades. The Attorney General only jeered him with a return challenge to "prove" discrimination.

Through today and tomorrow Mr. Leibowitz will call 20 colored men to the witness stand, everyone of whom he regards as fully qualified to serve as a juror.

Four white witnesses called by the Brooklyn attorney insisted that it would be impossible to convince them that any but a white man possessed the "sound judgment" and "training in law and justice" essential for a "fair and impartial verdict."

Under the attorney's probing they admitted, with apologetic glances at the Attorney General, that they knew of no cases on which colored men had served as jurors in Jackson County or the name of any colored man even being placed on a jury roll in the county.

Several days ago The Commercial Appeal found it necessary, in the discharge of its duty to the public, to direct attention to the mess that a lot of meddlers made of the Scottsboro case in Alabama. Under the pretense of defending some negro boys, these meddlers paraded themselves as heroes in the battle for human rights, rekindled as far as possible all of the sectional prejudices and race hatreds in the book, and in the end made a mockery of both justice and the orderly processes of law.

One of the organizations mixed up in this business was and is the American Civil Liberties Union. The Commercial Appeal felt obliged to denounce as frauds the appeals made by this organization to innocent people for funds with which to make the meddling more complete. The American Civil Liberties Union undertakes to explain, in another column, that it is not a fraud.

The attention of our readers is invited to the explanation. It might be well to observe that the Civil Liberties Union very promptly and ingeniously takes a run-out on the trial itself, frankly stating that for that it "has no responsibility." The International Labor Defense, a radical, mischief-making associate, handled the defense. The Civil Liberties Union was willing to beat the bushes for nickels and dimes to "insure a fair trial," but when the trial turned out to be an indictment of the entire Southern people and even of justice itself, it dismisses the injustice with the statement that it "has no responsibility."

The American Civil Liberties Union is a black and tan outfit which interests itself largely in dabbling in other people's business. It assumes that it must go on parade at intervals by entering a strange community and, without regard to local conditions or customs, pretend to defend somebody by putting the whole community on trial. No local lawyer, jealous of the reputation, integrity and the traditions of local courts and local justice, will do.

This is particularly true of the outfit's activities in the South. It proceeds on the idea that the South is still a conquered province, basking in ignorance, and ruled by a lot of overbearing slave-drivers immune to every principle of justice or morals. A few political self-seekers rose to a doubtful fame and temporary power by such stuff 60 years ago, but happily it is no longer found except among a few professionals who lather themselves up for periodical drives and parades. That northern people themselves have no truck for such mischief-makers was evidenced last week by the very proper and sensible action of the officials in Illinois who denied Civil Liberties Union agents permission to go into the mine district and start a lot of monkey business among an inflamed and dissatisfied community of miners.

The record brands most of these outfits as frauds, thriving on prejudice. Not a night but somebody, frequently a young woman, is "taken for a ride" in New York or Chicago. What does the American Civil Liberties Union do? Light up the torches? Beat the tin pans? No! It quietly scoots for cover and keeps its mouth shut. But let somebody be "taken for a ride" south of the Ohio River. It immediately becomes a "lynching," and all the meddlers rush out with demands that the barbarous and savage outrage be repudiated by the governor and that the courts at once get into action and hang the perpetrators.

No civilized people have found a substitute for law and order. The Commercial Appeal stands for the orderly processes of law. It yields to no voice in this community in its persistent demand for a fair and impartial enforcement of law and the triumph of justice whenever she sits in judgment upon life, liberty or property. Gang killings, lynchings or whatever they may be called are relics of a disordered age. No community can exist without order. But it can exist without meddlers. The sooner everybody learns to attend to his own business, the sooner will everybody have some worthwhile business to attend to.

The South on Trial

Two years ago a fight broke out on a freight train going from Chattanooga to Memphis, Tennessee. The fight has developed into a cause celebre that is discrediting the South in the eyes of the civilized world.

Riding the freight were a dozen Negro boys, seven white hoboes, and two women, Victoria Price and Ruby Bates. In the fight the whites were forced off the train. They flashed word ahead to a little town called Paint Rock.

There a posse arrested nine of the Negroes, and took the women into custody as material witnesses. The women charged that they had been criminally assaulted, and within two weeks all but one of the boys were convicted, and sentenced to die. The boy not sentenced to death was only 13 years old. Later, another of the boys was also saved from the death penalty as a juvenile.

New trials begun at Decatur, Alabama, on order of the U. S. Supreme Court are having no effect on the original verdict in these so-called "Scottsboro cases." At the first retrial, just ended, Ruby Bates repudiated her testimony, charged Victoria Price with "framing" the Negroes. Her startling testimony was corroborated by Leslie Carter, the only one of the white hoboes to testify.

Despite this testimony, despite the admirably fair conduct of the presiding Judge, despite the presence of a courageous Southern white lawyer among defense counsel, the jury took only a few minutes to arrive at a verdict of guilty. One man—though he voted "guilty"—held out for life imprisonment instead of the death penalty, but he was finally overcome after 21 hours of wrangling in the jury room.

It is incredible that a new trial, under fairer circumstances, will not be granted. The conduct of Wade Wright, the circuit solicitor who prosecuted the case, was almost unparalleled in its cheap bigotry and unscrupulous demagogy. The failure to permit Negro representation on the jury actually, if not legally, violated the defendant's rights.

Not nine Negro boys, but the South is on trial in Alabama. Will it prove in the eyes of the whole world that, despite the Fourteenth amendment, the black man has no rights in the South? Will it demonstrate that ignorance and the meanest kind of race hatred hold the Southern white man in their grip?

Will Alabama show the Negro that he must look to the North, and to the despised Communist party, for protection against legal lynching? We cannot believe it. Surely there are others in the South with the courage of Judge Horton and Defense Attorney Chamlee, big enough to give fellow men justice—no matter what the color of their skin.

SCOTTSBORO AGAIN

THIS little town in north Alabama has been in the spot light of the nation and a large part of the world for the past two years and the light has not been of that hue which we would crave as a guiding beacon to direct our steps in this span of existence.

Scottsboro is a typical southern town filled with a law abiding citizenry and it would have been far better for this little community if it had been left a free hand by outsiders in the directing of its judicial and civic affairs.

But there are a lot of meddlesome people in this universe who feel duty bound to stick their nose into any trouble that may arise regardless of whether the disturbance affects their own being.

One such class of people are those members which make up the organization of the International Labor Defense which has continually stuck its nose into the now famous trial of seven negroes in Scottsboro charged with criminally assaulting two white women.

The state of Alabama is certainly capable of dispensing justice within its own boundaries and the outrageous affair would have been settled long ago had not outside interference stepped in and churned up the "muddy waters."

Two news items of yesterday brings the "Scottsboro case" again into the spotlight which has been too long shining upon this fair spot of earth.

Mrs. Victoria Price, one of the women alleged to have been attacked and who appeared as a state witness, is reported missing from her home for the last ten days and unless she is located the state will be handicapped in the prosecution of the remaining six negroes who are to be tried.

Her disappearance recalls the story about Ruby Bates, the second of the white women whom the negroes are charged with criminally assaulting.

Ruby Bates, after having given testimony in the first trial that positively identified her negro assailants; dropped out of sight for many months and no trace of her was to be found.

When the case was re-opened a few months ago Ruby made a sudden appearance in Scottsboro but her testimony was of a different nature this time.

She turned from state witness to the aid of the defense and retracted her former testimony; she stated she had been in New York all during her absence—the headquarters of the I. L. D.; and that she did not receive any money for changing her stand in the witness chair.

We once again hear from Ruby as she led a parade of negroes and whites in Washington marching to the White House to demand racial parity and equality for all.

It looks very evident that Ruby Bates has joined the I. L. D. as either an ardent convert or a well paid promotion agent.

The second bit of news concerned the negro Heywood Patterson, who has been convict le but whose sentence is now under appeal. Patterson, who is incarcerated in a Birmingham jail, was stabbed twice yesterday by two of his cellmates—members of his own race who said that the "Scottsboro boy" was too arrogant and upish.

He will recover from his wounds but the incident goes to prove that his outlook has become one of perfect ego since the I. L. D. has taken to nursing his cause.

Perhaps, we will not hear much more about Scottsboro until the trial of the other negroes opens but we are very positive that we hope to hear even less about the International Labor Defense—offensive in its make-up and questionable in its character.

Our sympathy lies with the little town of Scottsboro and our sister commonwealth of Alabama in being hampered with the execution of its judicial power through undue interference from the outside.

The nation as a whole is thoroughly disgusted with the Scottsboro case and though handicaps may prevail we predict that justice will be meted out to those accused with the same unfailing fairness that has always characterized our judicial systems—but the prolonged agony of delay caused by such a militant group as the I. L. D. will never raise the banner of justice to dazzling heights.

Alabama and the Country

In postponing the second of the Scottsboro retrials Judge Horton has acted with great propriety and with an evident desire to serve the true ends of justice. After Mr. Leibowitz's unprofessional outburst had been published in Decatur, to proceed would have been a travesty of justice. A fair trial in that jurisdiction clearly became impossible, and through Judge Horton the State of Alabama has now recognized the fact. It may, indeed, have been Mr. Leibowitz's intention to produce exactly that result; if so, the matter is immaterial. The Scottsboro cases have now taken on an importance which transcends the importance of Mr. Leibowitz, of the Communists, the Negroes and the Decatur jurymen put together. They present a clear test of whether the American system of criminal law is capable of guaranteeing a genuinely fair trial to accused persons even when the bitterest of passions and prejudices have been stirred up deliberately, not only by the prosecution but by the defense as well.

To attain some sort of perspective it is necessary to review the development of the cases. The eight Negroes were arrested, put through an obviously hasty and careless form of trial and unfairly condemned to death. That the trial was unfair is the verdict of the United States Supreme Court; it constitutes a black mark against Alabama justice, and the fact stands that only through the intervention of Communists and "New York Jews" was the State of Alabama prevented from unjustly taking those eight lives.

Remembering that there have been similar miscarriages of justice in our own and probably every other state of the Union, this much, nevertheless, must be recognized: Alabama justice was originally at fault; and it was this fault which gave the Communist International Labor Defense its opportunity. The opportunity was ruthlessly and shamelessly exploited, not in the interests of the defendants but in the interests of political propaganda. Mr. Leibowitz is not a Communist; his method of conducting the case, however, when he finally took it over, was such as unavoidably to inflame the passions already aroused. To make good the grounds for appeal, he felt it necessary to raise the question of the exclusion of Negroes from jury service; but this also made it virtually impossible for a Southern jury to acquit. The fate of the defendants was thus linked to a vast social and political issue in which their individual rights and interests were bound to be swallowed up.

After the reversal in the Supreme Court, Alabama opinion in any event would have been under a powerful temptation to "justify" the original conviction by a second one, whether it was just or not. The Communist intervention, with all its attendant propaganda and publicity, operated to exaggerate the temptation a thousandfold. Many statements of the Attorney General prosecuting the retrial, the indefensible address of the solicitor referring to "Jew money" from New York, and finally the verdict—apparently against all the weight of evidence, and now condemned as "outrageous" even by Southern newspapers which excoriate the defense tactics—make it only too apparent that this motive has utterly vitiated the first retrial and will inevitably vitiate the others unless this tragic history can be halted.

The central fact in the whole case is that the eight defendants have become simply pawns amid forces which threaten to grind them to dust without regard for the actual merits of the evidence against them. That is an impossible situation, for Alabama and for the country at large, and instinct with dangerous possibilities for the future. There is, however, one straight road through it. That is for Alabama opinion itself to make a new start, for upright and public-spirited Alabamans—such as Judge Horton himself—to take the case into their own hands, to exclude alike Communists, political lawyers, courtroom orators and mob ignorance, and insist that the facts as they have been established be sifted in fair trial with a sole eye to ascertaining what happened. Every man and woman in the country now has an interest in this case and has the right to ask of Alabama that she enlist her best brains, her ablest and most public-spirited leaders, to guarantee that whatever be the outcome of the case it may be accepted as a fair one. That, after all, is the one thing that matters, the one test of justice, the one way in which the state may emerge from an unhappy and tragic affair with nothing but honor to it-

NEGROES CALLED TO RALLY HERE

Funds To Be Raised For Defense Of Youths In Alabama

A mass meeting of Charlottesville Negroes to enlist financial support for the legal defense of seven Negro youths under sentence of death in the Scottsboro (Alabama) case, has been called at Mt. Zion church on Ridge Street for Friday night.

The rally, which is intended as an opening wedge for the collection of funds locally to help defend the Negro youths accused of an attack upon two white women, is being sponsored by the colored Baptist ministers of this City.

"The purpose of this meeting," said two of them, Rev. H. E. Williams and Rev. W. R. Strassner, this morning, "is primarily to raise funds for the defense of these boys. They are almost at the point of despair and since it takes money to fight such a case, we intend to give them a helping hand.

"We are not lined up with any Communistis movement," they said. Both indicated that any funds collected would be sent on to the National Association for Advancement of Colored People.

Not Class Organization

"We don't want people to get the idea that this is any sort of a class organization aimed against any other sort of class organization or group," the two preachers declared. "Our relationships here are good and we don't want them broken up because of anything done by the churches."

First announcement of the meeting came yesterday afternoon after a regular meeting of the Charlottesville Ministerial Association. In an address before that body, Superintendent of Schools A. L. Bennett mentioned the Scottsboro case as an illustration for certain points in his talk. This was objected to by Rev Henry W. Battle, D. D., retired Baptist minister, who said that he did not believe that the case should have been mentioned.

The Negro minist[illegible] Williams then arose to point out that the case had been widely publicized and was naturally the center of considerable interest. He could see no objection to its mention, he said.

There are six Negro Baptist churches in this city and an Episcopal mission.

A RED MENACE TO JUSTICE

There is much sweet reasonableness in the statement of the trial judge in the recent Scottsboro case that a "fair trial is impossible" at present. It is significant, too, that the judge admits it. The impossibility of fair consideration for the Neg[illegible] now is due to the defense being [illegible] or conducted by a Communist organization, although Samuel Leibowitz himself is not a Communist. His statements concerning the type of rural [illegible] Alabama, however, was in no sense a reasonable statement by an attorney.

In the recent trial the defense had a remarkably strong case in view of the recanting of the earlier testimony by one of the women involved; it is fair to conclude that in almost any other court or before any jury under normal circumstances the unsupported word of only one woman would not have been taken very seriously. But due to the stark prejudice against Communism in the state the impression was widespread that Communism itself was on trial, and the rural temper in the South is staunchly opposed to the Moscow doctrine.

It was a blunder of grave importance to have permitted the Communistic organization to take over the defense, though Leibowitz, the defense attorney, did remarkable work in tearing the prosecution's presentation to shreds. Communistic activity is a detriment to justice. Everything they touch is injured. Their tactics are to glorify Communism rather than to aid anybody in trouble.

Recently in New York, when Socialists and other citizens held a meeting of protest against the Scottsboro case an army of loud-mouthed Communists breezed along and broke up the gathering before even resolutions could be passed. Leibowitz himself refused to address any of their "mass protest meetings;" but he cannot avoid the effects of the support of these vocalists in the cause of Moscow.

Jury Book Brought Into Court In Effort To Prove Race Bar

Scottsboro Defense Trying To Quash Venire In Decatur Trial

By T. M. DAVENPORT
Associated Press Staff Writer

DECATUR, ALA., March 30—(AP)—The big red book in which names of prospective jurymen are kept today was brought into court as defense counsel sought to quash the venire drawn for the trial of Haywood Patterson, Chattanooga negro, indicted with eight others in the "Scottsboro case" on charges of attacking two white girls.

Attorneys said it probably was the first time in the history of the State that a jury roll, a secret record under Alabama statutes, had been brought into court as evidence for any purpose.

Samuel C. Liebowitz, of New York, chief counsel for the defendant, asked the jury roll be produced to prove his contention that it contained the names of no negroes which he said, violated the constitutional right of the defendant as guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution.

J. A. Tidwell, president of the jury board compiling the roll, was called by Liebowitz, and, under questioning, said he could not say whether the names were those of "white, black or yellow." "I don't know all of them personally and did not when they were placed on the rolls." He had the book as court recessed for the day.

Patterson is the first of nine negroes indicted for an alleged attack on two white girls to be called for the new trials, transferred here from Jackson County after the U. S. Supreme Court had set aside death sentences.

Horton Halts Parade of Negroes

After 12 negroes had been called, giving almost identical testimony that they had never heard of members of their race serving on juries, Judge James E. Horton, presiding, told the defense he had heard enough of "that line of testimony." John Green, clerk of the Morgan County Circuit Court, made a total of 13 witnesses called by the defense.

The State has called only three, J. A. Tidwell, John Tomlinson, and W. J. Briscoe, who comprises the Morgan County Jury Board, which prepares the jury roll and fills the box from which venires are drawn.

One by one, the witnesses were called to the stand to identify long lists of negroes living in the country and to state under direct examination by Liebowitz that they had never seen a negro on a jury in Morgan County courts.

It took half an hour or more for each witness and frequently longer as Atty. Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., countered defense moves by asking the witnesses if they had any personal knowledge of whether they had been considered by the jury board and found lacking in the necessary qualifications.

Clashes between Liebowitz and Knight, each of whom raised his voice frequently until it could be heard in the corridors outside interrupted proceedings as they sparred for advantage in the legal battle underway.

Only these flareups kept the spectators from drowsing in the courtroom, which became so warm that ceiling fans were kept running.

There was a general craning of necks as Knight asked the Rev. W. J. Wilson, negro minister, "are you a member of the Communist Party?"

"No, sir," Wilson replied, shaking his head, and, on redirect examination by Liebowitz, said he was a Republican.

More than 180 names of negroes living in the county whom the witnesses described as in their opinion, holding the qualifications necessary to qualify for jury service under the selective jury statute of Alabama were read into the testimony.

Constitutional Issue Raised

During the three days court has been held this week, the same question constantly has been raised whether absence of negroes from juries constituted a violation of the rights of the defendants guaranteed under the fourteenth amendment.

In the maze of tedious testimony the names of the two alleged victims of the attack and of the defendants themselves have drifted into the background.

Patterson was the only one of the defendants brought into court today. The others, Andy Wright and Clarence Norris, of Chattanooga; Charlie Weems and Ozie Powell of Atlanta; Willie Roberson of Columbus, Ga., and Olen Montgomery, of Monroe, Ga., were left in the jail.

Patterson at times dozed during the afternoon as the proceedings moved slowly. He had before him a rusty mule shoe, and a rabbit's foot that his counsel obtained for him at his request.

An effort was made by Liebowitz, who entered the case at the invitation of the International Labor Defense but on his stipulation that he accept no remuneration, to have Judge Horton reverse his previous decision to grant the State a severance for Patterson.

Liebowitz wanted the judge to place all seven facing retrial on trial at the same time, contending that it was unfair to Patterson "to single him out." Atty. Gen. Knight yesterday had informed the court he wished to try Patterson separately as Patterson was in the first trial, which resulted in conviction and his request was granted. The other two are juveniles.

A CRIMINAL TRIAL

The Scottsboro case will be called for retrial today in Decatur.

"This," says The Birmingham News, "is going to be an unpleasant ordeal for Alabama. Under the best possible circumstances a thing of this kind is bad enough. In this instance an unpleasant situation has been aggravated by elements which should not have entered into it. Alabama has been viciously defamed in connection with the affair by unscrupulous agitators who have been more interested in creating propaganda for radical causes than in seeing justice done. This had been unfair and it has been hard to bear with patience."

But, reminds The News, "For its part, Alabama's sole interest is in seeing justice done."

This should be borne in mind by Alabamians.

They need not be reminded that this is a criminal trial which sole purpose is to decide the innocence or guilt of the prisoners.

There is no racial question involved.

The question of capital punishment does not enter the case.

The wisdom of such heavy punishment for the charged crimes is not on trial.

The State of Alabama and its people are not on trial.

The Scottsboro case is strictly a criminal case and as such is held in open court with the world looking on to see that justice is done.

JURORS ATTEND CHURCH

New York Times

Members of Three Faiths Hear Sermon on Tolerance by Episcopal Rector.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., April 2.—The jury which will begin hearing evidence tomorrow in the Scottsboro case prepared for the task ahead today by attending the services at St. John's Episcopal Church in a body.

There they heard a sermon on tolerance delivered by the Rev. Peter M. Dennis, the rector, who avoided any direct reference to the trial which has agitated this North Alabama community much less, in many respects, than other sections of the country.

Most of the members of the jury, chosen from a venire of white men after the lawyers defending the nine accused Negroes had waged an unsuccessful fight against exclusion of Negro talesmen, are Methodists or Baptists, but they attended the Episcopal Church at the suggestion of Eugene E. Graves, the banker member of the jury, who is a vestryman of St. John's.

"We must enlarge our vision, we must banish hatred and hypocrisy," the Rev. Mr. Dennis told the congregation of which the jury, seated in the last two pews, was a part.

Most of the rector's sermon dealt with the "inconsistency" of American policy in protesting the Japanese invasion of Manchuria and forgetting the sending of marines to Nicaragua. But he added:

Appeals for Open Hearts.

"We, all of us, and I am speaking particularly to ourselves right here in Decatur, need to open our hearts to the heavenly spirit and to put away the things that led well-fed bodies and starved souls to nail the Lamb of God to the Cross on Calvary."

After church the jurors, three farmers and nine townsmen, went for a stroll. One member sent home for his radio set and had it installed in the jury's suite at the Hotel Lyons, where they are quartered. Another, who is a barber by trade, had a busman's holiday by shaving some of his fellow jurors.

Meanwhile the nine prisoners, charged with attacking Ruby Bates and Mrs. Victoria Price on a freight train near Scottsboro two years ago, amused themselves in the Morgan County jail by singing work songs in their cells, from which they can see the timbers of a gallows no longer used.

Of the group, the only one actually on trial is Haywood Patterson, who, according to the evidence the State plans to present to the jury beginning tomorrow morning, was the ringleader of the gang. He was indicted jointly with the others, but the State obtained a severance in order to try him alone.

Patterson is charged with attacking the twice-married Price woman, who will be the main witness for the State. The other white girl alleged to have been attacked by the Negroes has been missing from her Huntsville home for a month and, so far as has been learned, remains unfound.

Severe Cross-Examination Expected.

Samuel S. Leibowitz, the New York criminal lawyer defending the Negroes, whose original conviction and sentence of death were reversed by the United States Supreme Court in a decision which received little publicity in Alabama, expects the cross-examination of the State's star witness to consume the better part of a full court session.

That he intends to delve deeply into her past was indicated during his examination of prospective jurymen, when he asked if they would take into consideration in weighing the credibility of a witness the kind of life that witness had led, even if it happened to be a woman.

Attorney General Knight also expects Mr. Leibowitz to use all his skill as a cross-examiner in questioning Mrs. Price.

The lawyer's questioning of talesmen on Friday also brought to light the significant but hitherto scarcely known fact that Ruby Bates formerly lived here. One of the veniremen, in responding to the New York lawyer's questions said he had known the Bates girl when she lived here nine years ago.

"Make a note of that," Mr. Liebowitz said to one of his assistants with an expression of surprise.

Demand Release of Miss Rukeyser.

Chief of Police Rigsby received a telegram today demanding the "unconditional release" of Muriel Rukeyser and the two men taken into custody yesterday for investigation and released.

The telegram was signed by the National Students League, of which Miss Rukeyser said she was a member. No charges of any kind were [illegible] against the three New York [illegible] they were [illegible] only a few hours. They were ordered to appear before Judge James E. Horton tomorrow when the trial is re[illegible]

By the time the telegram was received the visitors from New York [illegible] down along with several [illegible] who came here in the capacity of "observers" in the trial of a case which the International Labor Defense and its Communist affiliates have been used as propaganda for organization work among the Negroes. It was understood that the exodus was ordered by Mr. Liebowitz as a condition of his continuing as trial counsel.

Explaining his attitude, Mr. Liebowitz said:

"I am not interested in the affairs of the Republican party, the Democratic party, the Socialist party, the Communist party or any other group in the conduct of this case. I am interested solely in saving these innocent boys from the electric chair, and I will do my best to see that their case is not endangered by propaganda or agitation from any quarter. I have ordered the irresponsibles away and they must stay away."

MORAL ATTACK RULED OUT

Judge Rejects Court Records as Not Affecting the Credibility of Her Testimony.

New York

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

N.Y.

DECATUR, Ala., April 3.—Victoria Price, whose testimony two years ago at Scottsboro led Jackson County juries to condemn eight of nine Negro defendants to death, repeated her charges today before Judge James E. Horton and a jury in the Morgan County Court House at the first of the retrials ordered by the United States Supreme Court.

Called to the witness stand by Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr. as the main witness against Haywood Patterson, the first of the nine prisoners placed on trial, she identified him unhesitatingly as one of six Negroes who, she testified, had attacked her on a freight train between Stevenson and Paint Rock.

Her direct examination took just twelve minutes of the court's time. When it was finished she settled back in her chair, crossed her silk-stockinged legs and met a day-long attack upon her character and credibility with angry defiance. At times when Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of defense counsel, pressed searching questions regarding her past, her lip curled and she snapped her answers in the colloquialisms of the "poor white."

Mrs. Price entered an angry denial when Mr. Leibowitz asked if she had not concocted the whole story of the mass attack by the Negroes and forced Ruby Bates, the other victim of the alleged crime, to corroborate her in order to forestall the danger of her own arrest for vagrancy or a more serious offense. She joined the Attorney General in challenging Mr. Leibowitz to produce the missing Bates girl to "ask her about it."

Shouts Answers to Questions.

"That's some of that Ruby Bates' dope," she shouted in a voice that shook with anger.

"You can't prove it," she shouted another time when Mr. Leibowitz promised to show the court that the condition in which doctors found her when she was examined at Scottsboro after an armed possé had taken the girls and the Negroes off the train on which the attack supposedly took place, was the result of her misconduct the night before in a hobo jungle on the outskirts of Chattanooga.

Certified copies of court records from Huntsville where Mrs. Price lived with her widowed mother, were offered by Mr. Leibowitz to show that prior to March 25, 1931, she had been arrested for offenses against the moral code.

Judge Horton rejected one of the copies on the ground that an offense under the prohibition law is not a reflection on the credibility of a witness and barred the others on the ground that they charged violations of city ordinances rather than State laws.

Mrs. Price came to court wearing a black dress with a fichu of white lace at the throat. The little blue straw hat on her head was enlivened by a small red feather sticking above the crown. A string of glass beads adorned her neck and on three fingers of her left hand were large and showy rings.

She defended the testimony she had given with as much fire as she defended her reputation, heatedly denying at one moment that she had wrecked the home of a married woman with two babies, and in the next breath thrusting aside seeming inconsistencies in her testimony with apologies for her lack of education and faulty memory.

Doctor Describes Injuries.

Although Mrs. Price insisted that she had fought the Negroes off until her strength gave out, and declared that her head was cut open by a blow from the butt of a pistol wielded by Patterson, Dr. R. R. Bridges, the Scottsboro physician, who testified just before adjournment, said he had found only superficial bruises and scratches when he examined her.

While the doctor was on the stand Judge Horton took a hand in the examination, showing patricular interest in the physician's statement that neither Mrs. Price nor her companion, the Bates girl, were hysterical or nervous when they were brought to his office. Not until the next day, he said, did either of them show any signs of nervousness and then, after a night in jail, it manifested itself in tears.

The star witness for the State told the sordid details of the crime before a crowded court with unabashed frankness and plain-speaking. She repeated the lewd remarks she says the Negroes made to her without the flutter of an eye-lash and in a voice that carried to the furthest corner of the court room. The only women in the crowd which heard her story and the very clinical medical testimony which followed it, were two visitors from New York. At times they looked as though they wished they had not come.

There was little that was new in the testimony Mrs. Price gave under direct examination by Mr. Knight. She and the Bates girl, a mill worker like herself, decided, she said to go to Chattanooga in search of employment. Wearing overalls over three dresses they wore to avoid carrying hand luggage, she said, they hopped a freight train and arrived in Chattanooga on the evening of March 24, 1931.

Sought Work in Chattanooga.

There, Mrs. Price said, she was directed to the home of Mrs. Callie Brochie, where she and Miss Bates spent the night. In the morning upon finding that jobs were as scarce in Chattanooga as in Huntsville, she and her companion retrieved their overalls from the corner of the station where they had hidden them and started homeward on an outgoing freight train.

They were in a gondola car with seven white boys, Mrs. Price declared, when Patterson, with the other Negores at his heels, jumped in from the top of a box car waving a pistol and ordering the white boys to "unload." Mrs. Price related all the rest of the conversation that she could remember without sparing any of the details. One of the printable remarks she attributed to the Negroes follows:

"We're going to take you girls up North and make you our women."

There was a fight in which all the white boys except one named Orville Gilley, were thrown off the train soon after it left Stevenson, a way-station between Chattanooga and Scottsboro. Gilley, according to Mrs. Price, was afraid to jump off the train and said he would "rather stay in the car and die with these girls." Mrs. Price said that she too told the Negroes that she was "going to get off at Huntsville or die."

The seven white men were rounded up and held in the jail at Scottsborough until the first trial of the Negroes was over. Only one of them, Gilley, was called upon to testify in the first trial, but it was indicated today that Lester Carter, another of the white hoboes, would be a surprise witness for the defense, if the State does not locate and call him first.

Refuses to Go Over Crime Again.

Mr. Leibowitz opened his examination of Mrs. Price, who had testified that she was 21 when the attack occurred, by asking if she was now 27 years old.

"I ain't that educated that I can figure it out," she replied.

The New York lawyer asked her to describe in detail how she resisted the Negroes.

"Judge, your Honor, I've answered four times and I ain't going to say no more," she said as she turned to face Judge Horton.

Once she protested that she could not understand the questions of Mr. Leibowitz.

"Do I use words you don't understand?" he asked.

"You speak them too fast," she said.

The witness refused to identify a miniature train of box cars, gondolas and tank cars as similar to the freight train and the identification was made later by R. S. Turner, conductor of the train the girls had boarded at Chattanooga. He also testified that he had heard no shots or screams as he rode in the caboose, twenty-six cars behind the gondolas in which the attack is alleged to have occurred.

Several times Mr. Leibowitz, angered at what he termed Mrs. Price's "speech-making," asked the judge to warn her to confine her remarks to answering questions. Twice Mr. Knight warned her to "be calm." When she leaned forward and screamed that Patterson had attacked her, Mr. Leibowitz said:

"You're a little bit of an actress, aren't you?"

"You're a pretty good actor yourself," she retorted.

Mr. Leibowitz asked how many mills she visited in Chattanooga in search of work.

"It's been two years ago and I disremember," she answered.

Denies Accompanying White Boys.

Mr. Leibowitz sought vainly to get Mrs. Price to admit that she and Miss Bates left Chattanooga with Gilley and Carter, but the witness insisted that she and her "friend girl" were "the onliest ones on the oil car" in which they started out.

Denying intimations that the whole case was a frame-up, Mrs Price declared she had urged Miss Bates to "tell nothing but the truth," and she denied that she had quarrel with Gilley and Carter in jail because "they wouldn't commit perjury."

Mr. Leibowitz asked the witness if she had not know Negroes and spent considerable time with them in Chattanooga. This she strongly denied.

Before Mrs. Price left the witness stand she identified photographs of herself and Ruby Bates, produced by Mr. Leibowitz and offered in evidence. One, showing one of the girls with a Negro was marked for identification and will be introduced in evidence later.

When Attorney General Knight objected to introduction of the pictures, Mr. Leibowitz replied that he would use them to show that Mrs. Price was on friendly terms with Negroes.

Court adjourned until tomorrow after the testimony of Dr. Bridges.

THE SCOTTSBORO ISSUE

In the Scottsboro case the state of Alabama is faced with a predicament which anyone who knows the racial questions involved will understand.

The guilt or innocence of the nine Negroes accused of attacking two women textile mill workers, after tossing several white men off a moving freight train on which all were riding, is not the principal issue now involved. Alabama unquestionably considers the Negroes guilty, regardless of whether or not [illegible] ial under protection of state [illegible] ilitia was "fair." A second trial, ordered by the United States Supreme Court, will result in another conviction, it is confidently predicted.

The dilemma then, so far as the state is concerned, is not the fate of the accused but the opening up for discussion and judicial decision of certain Constitutional rights which by social sanction and practice have long been withheld from Negroes, not only in the South but elsewhere.

Most important is jury service. Negroes, admittedly, are excluded from jury service in Alabama by a systematic combing of the poll lists. The argument in defense of the practice runs like this: since the white man has no right to object to the presence of a Negro on his trial jury, a Negro cannot legally complain about the presence of whites.

This sophistry is satisfactory enough locally, but it might not be persuasive with the Supreme Court. Consequently the Alabama attorney general is preparing his case with the greatest care with the expectation of having to defend another appeal.

Soon after the question of Negro jury service was first raised an editorial in the Jackson County Sentinel, published in the county where the first trial was held, said "a Negro juror in Jackson county would be a curiosity—and some curiosities are embalmed, you know."

Not only were there no Negroes on the juries which tried the Negroes, but most of the white men compos-

ns them were from the Sand Moun- ain section where natives are said o boast of signs reading, "Nigger, on't let the sun go down on your ead." There are only 25 Negro oters in the county's population of [illegible],000.

The difficult situation is clearly [illegible]ected in the statement of At[illegible] ney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., a son of the Alabama supreme court justice who wrote the opinion affirming the conviction and sentence of the Negroes. "If it's necessary to call out every company of militia in the state of Alabama to give them a fair trial, we'll do it."

Sand Mountain doubtless will show a proper respect for this authority, but it is a foregone conclusion that it will have none at all for any court ruling running counter to popular will.

CHANGE OF VENUE DENIED TO NEGROES

Judge Scores Affidavits by 'Dead Men' in Rejecting Plea in Scottsboro Case.

Times 11-22-33 N.Y.

JURY ISSUE IS PRESSED

Court Reverses Predecessor and Orders Official to Reply on Selection of Panel.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 21.—Holding that the defense had failed to prove charges of local prejudice, Judge W. W. Callahan ruled today that the Scottsboro trials—the South's cause celébre—must be held here.

Defeated in their effort to have the trials transferred to Birmingham, the lawyers defending seven Negroes accused of attacking two white girls nearly three years ago, resumed their assault upon Alabama's "lily white" jury law.

Denying the defense motion for a second change of venue, Judge Callahan declared that affidavits of investigators who quoted dead men had little probative value and that the State, represented by Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., had satisfied him that the Negroes could and would receive a fair and impartial trial in Morgan County.

Judge Callahan, in the opinion accompanying his ruling, made no mention of the Alabama statute prohibiting more than one change of venue. It was upon the contention that this law was unconstitutional that the defense hoped to base an appeal to the United States Supreme Court should the jury's verdict go against them for the third time.

Must Rely on Jury Selection.

Another possible peg for an appeal was knocked out later in the day when Joseph R. Brodsky, a defense attorney, began reading into the record the testimony by which Samuel S. Leibewitz sought to show at the last trial of Heywood Patterson that Negroes were systematically excluded from jury service in Morgan County solely because of race.

Judge Callahan had ruled that the defense need not call all of its witnesses back. He would accept the testimony they gave before, he said, but he would not be bound by the rulings on admissibility of evidence handed down by Judge James E. Horton, who presidded at the earlier trial.

When Mr. Brodsky came to that part of the record which showed that Judge Horton had sustained an objection by the Attorney General when Mr. Lebowitz asked Arthur J. Tidwell, a jury commissioner, to explain why J. J. Sykes, a Negro apparently qualified for jury duty, was kept off the jury roll, Judge Callahan interrupted.

"I'll overrule the objection," he said.

Mr. Knight explained that his objection was based upon the contention that the jury commissioners enjoyed discretionary powers not subject to review, but Judge Callahan interrupted him, saying:

"If your contention is sound, there is no way of telling whether there is exclusion or not. I hold that the witness should be allowed to answer."

Mr. Brodsky then asked for and obtained the judge's permission to recall Mr. Tidwell and get his explanation on the record. The court waited while biliffs were sent out to seek the jury commissioner.

He was not found, however, and since he was the only witness to be heard on the defense motion to quash the venire from which a jury will be chosen Monday to try Patterson for the third time, Judge Callahan adjourned court until Thursday, the date set for argument on a motion to quash the indictments.

Bias Charges Contested.

Mr. Leibowitz, whose original attack upon the jury system here attracted to himself as much animosity as had originally been engendered against the Negro defendants when they were arrested in Scottsboro, was absent from today's session, and Patterson was the only one of the seven defendants in the court room.

At the outset of the day's session a handful of spectators was present and at its close only newspaper men and lawyers remained. The dullness of the day's proceedings, coupled with a severe rain and wind storm which could be seen approaching from the court room windows, kept others away.

Despite the presence of several hundred destitute citizens of Morgan County gathered on the lawn seeking work relief, there was no trace of the tension which characterized yesterday's opening session of the trial when Mr. Leibowitz was present. Visitors entering the court room, however, were searched for weapons.

Court opened at 8:30 A. M. but it was 2 P. M. before Judge Callahan delivered his ruling denying to the defense their hoped-for change of venue.

In the time between Attorney General and his adversaries, Mr. Brodsky and G. W. Chamlee of Chattanooga fought a battle of affidavits interspersed with the direct testimony of witnesses.

Half a dozen residents of the county who had been quoted in affidavits by defense investigators as saying that the Negroes, their counsel and their witnesses should be killed, took the stand and denied that they had said such things to any one.

A score of others said the same thing in affidavits which Mr. Knight's assistant, Thomas Lawson, read into the record. All were of the opinion that the Negroes would receive "a fair and impartial trial here."

Two Accused of Perjury.

While the affidavit were being read, Mr. Knight charged that two of the defense investigators, John Williams and Victor Ellwood, had committed perjury and asked that bench warrants be issued for them. This brought an objection from Mr. Chamlee, who said that the request should have been made privately.

"Word will go out all over the country that the defense presented perjured testimony," he said.

"Well," said Judge Callahan, "I reckon if it does, the word will go out all over the country that I didn't do anything about it. The affidavits were made outside the county—outside the State—and it's a matter for the grand jury anyway."

Mr. Knight then played his trump card, presenting affidavits from undertakers asserting that four of the men the defense investigators had quoted in their affidavits had died before the alleged interviews were supposed to have taken place. This point was emphasized by Judge Callahan when he denied the motion to transfer the case to Birmingham.

Before the decision was rendered, however, more affidavits were submitted from hardware merchants denying the defense assertion that during the last trial of Patterson local supplies of ammunition and firearms were sold out.

Woman "Cousins" Disagree.

The defense also sprang a surprise in the person of Mrs. Mary Leonard of Birmingham, who said that she came to Decatur to call upon a kinsman and gather such evidence for the defense as she could.

Mrs. Leonard arrived Sunday, called upon Mrs. Grady Cagle, talked wit ha taxicab chauffeur and some friends of Mrs. Cagle, and expressed the opinion in court this morning that "people here are hot about this case."

She added that "a Mrs. Haas told me only two minutes ago right outside this court room that she was afraid to come to the trial last time because they were planning to lynch the Negroes; and if you don't believe me, call her in now."

Mrs. Cagle then testified that she never laid eyes on Mrs. Leonard until she called as a "cousin" on Sunday. The relationship was not cleared up, but she spent the night.

Mrs. Cagle declared that not a word was said about prejudice against the defendants by any one but the visitor, who brought the subject up.

"The men folks just sat around listening silent-like," she explained.

Finally, Judge Callahan, becoming impatient, said: "Oh, let's quit." And a recess was taken to lunch, after which more affidavits were presented by the State. Mr. Brodsky and Mr. Knight then debated the change of venue issue and the announcement from the bench followed at once.

Affidavits of "Dead Men."

The defendants application was very long, and "embellished with well-rounded sentenses," Judge Callahan said. Reduced to its essentials, he explained, it alleged that a fair and impartial trial could not be had here. If that were true, he added, without mentioning the statutory prohibition against a second change, it would be his duty to transfer the case. . . .

He pointed out that the affidavits filed by the defense were based on the "unsubstantiated" observations and reports of conversations with citizens of the country by admitted strangers while the State's affidavits weer made by persons who had lived here for years and knew the temper of the people.

Referring to the affidavits of Victor Ellwood, Jim Jones and John Williams, the investigators retained by David Schriftman to sound out local sentiment on the Scottsboro case, Judge Callahan said: "There is evidence in the case—evidence undisputed—that tends to show that the names of some of the parties alleged to have been interviewed have been long since dead. While only a comparative few were shown to be dead, the fact that they quoted the language of the dead inevitably strikes at the very vitals of the probative force and credence to be given their affidavits.

"It doesn't necessarily follow that error in a few instances must cast a shadow of doubt on all the contents of the affidavits. Certainly not if the error is of such a type as one could conclude was only error, but when it is shown that it is more than mere error, the weakness becomes more serious in my judgment."

"As for troops," continued the judge, "I am not blind to my present surroundings. I can't see anything to suggest to me in the remotest degree the necessity for troops."

While the defense asserted that a fiery cross was burned during the last trial of Patterson and that a mob planned an attack upon the jail last Spring, Judge Callahan pointed out that no evidence had been presented to support the allegations.

"Well," he concluded, "I reckon that's about enough. I am told that I would make everybody happy if I granted this motion. If the facts warranted it, nothing would make me happier. However, they don't so warrant, and I'm going to deny the motion."

Venue Change Appeal Denied; Venire Attacked

Trial At Decatur Recesses Until Thursday; I. L. D. Renews Racial Dispute

To Await Witness

Jury Commissioner Called To Testify Why Negro Is Excluded From Lists

By T. M. DAVENPORT
Associated Press Staff Writer

DECATUR, ALA., Nov. 22—(AP)—A decision on a motion to quash the venire drawn for the third trial of Heywood Patterson, one of seven negro defendants in the "Scottsboro case," tonight was held in abeyance by Judge W. W. Callahan, pending the answer of a witness to a single question.

Judge Callahan this afternoon had overruled a motion for a change of venue to Birmingham for the new trials for the seven defendants, and sought to dispose of the motion to quash the venire before adjourning until Thursday but the witness, A. J. Tidwell, a member of the Morgan County Jury Commission, could not be located.

The negroes were convicted and sentenced to death for attacking Mrs. Victoria Price and Ruby Bates aboard a Southern Railway freight train on March 25, 1931, at their first trials at Scottsboro, Ala., but won new trials after an appeal to the United States Supreme court. Patterson was again convicted in Decatur last April but the trial judge, James E. Horton, set the verdict aside.

The question up this afternoon was propounded by Joseph R. Brodsky, of New York, a member of the legal staff retained by the International Labor Defense to defend the negroes at the April hearing. It was objected to by Atty. Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., handling the prosecution for the State, and Judge Horton, then presiding, sustained the objection.

Jury Commissioner Questioned

Brodsky had asked Tidwell if he knew why the name of J. J. Sykes, negro undertaker, was excluded from the list of qualified jurymen. Judge Callahan held today that to prohibit the question would make impossible determination of qualifications of negroes for jury duty.

The motion to quash the venire was denied by Judge Horton last Spring after an extended hearing when the cases of the negroes were brought here for retrial under a change of venue, from Scottsboro, Jackson County.

Attorneys at this hearing agreed to submit the record of the testimony on the motion last March but Judge Callahan ordered it read saying he might rule differently on the legal points raised but only on the question to Tidwell did he wish to alter the record.

On reconvening Thursday, the question will be propounded again to Tidwell, and the motion to quash the indictments will be taken up. Both motions to quash were based on allegations that negroes were excluded from Grand and petit juries "solely because of their race and color" and thereby were deprived of their constitutional rights.

There was a momentary stir about the courthouse about mid-afternoon, when a crowd estimated at 150 men gathered about one door, but investigation disclosed they were unemployed and their sole interest was in obtaining the jobs to be allotted to the R. F. C. office here this afternoon.

This crowd showed not the slightest interest in the legal battle being fought on the second floor, but was in an hilarious mood at the thought of obtaining work.

"A job is all that interests me," said one of them. "I don't know nothing about no trial."

Judge Denies Troops Needed

Judge Callahan, before announcing his decision to deny the change of venue, went at length into the evidence and dwelt particularly on defense claims of conditions at Scottsboro in 1931 when eight of the nine negroes accused in the case were sentenced to death. One of the negroes sentenced there and the ninth are now in custody of the juvenile court.

"There isn't any evidence before me to indicate that there was any necessity for troops at Scottsboro," Judge Callahan said, "except that they were there at the request of the presiding judge, and I must of course concede that he had sufficient reason for asking them."

The judge remarked on troops here last April when Patterson, the only one tried before the cases were indefinitely postponed, adding "but those things were long ago. x x x I can not see anything here now, or since this trial started, to warrant the use of troops. There are none here now and that answers that."

Judge Callahan in summing up, said the burden of proof was on the defense on the motion for a change of venue and that the State's evidence overwhelmed any proof offered. He also commented on the fact that some of the affidavits offered by the defense, gave purported remarks against the negroes by the men who were dead.

Brodsky and Knight were brief in arguments, the former recounting briefly that Judge Horton had considered the public mind enough inflamed last April 19 to postpone indefinitely further trials.

"I think we are correct in the statement that the feeling is such in Decatur," said Brodsky, "that a fair and impartial trial cannot be held."

Knight Takes Issue

Knight referred to the purported remarks of Samuel S. Liebowitz, chief of defense counsel, deriding the jury that convicted Patterson, and his reply which caused Judge Horton to postpone the trials, and added "Judge Horton did not in any way indicate that Morgan County was an unsafe place to try the cases."

The Attorney General referred to the State's rebuttal to the defense affidavits made by David S. Schriftman, of New York, and three investigators employed by him, Victor Elwood, John Williams, and Jim Jones, all of Birmingham, and declared the State had successfully disproved them.

The high light of the day was the appearance of two women on the stand, the first Mrs. Mary Leonard, of Birmingham, testifying that a fair trial could not be held, and that the defendants and their attorneys were in danger. The second was Mrs. Grady Cagle, at whose home here Mrs. Leonard spent Sunday night.

Mrs. Leonard testified that she came here to visit Mrs. Cagle and Schriftman had asked her to advise him "the whole truth" of anything she learned concerning feeling in the case.

"A taxi driver told me," said Mrs. Leonard, "that 'if they don't do something with them (the defendants) soon, they will all have whiskers.'"

"Ought To Be Shot"

Mrs. Leonard said she had talked to a number of persons and the majority expressed ill feeling against the negroes and their lawyers. She said a Mr. Powell, at the Cagle home, told her "the negroes, their lawyers, and the girls ought to be taken outside the courthouse and shot."

Knight sought to link her with the Communist Party, but she denied seeking a permit for a communist meeting in Birmingham. She subsequently testified that she had gone to the City Commission there to ask a permit for a meeting of unemployed.

Mrs. Cagle was called by the State in rebuttal and said Mrs. Leonard had arrived at her home Sunday afternoon and had identified herself as a cousin of Mr. Cagle, and asked to spend the night. Mrs. Cagle said she had not heard Powell make any remarks concerning the Scottsboro case, although Mrs. Leonard sought to engage him in conversation on the subject.

"She told me she had come here to do anything she could to get the cases transferred to Birmingham," Mrs. Cagle testified.

The practice of searching spectators for weapons before admitting them to the courtroom continued today, but newspapermen were recognized and admitted without the patting of pockets.

Rain Interests Spectators

The crowd inside the Courtroom was more interested in watching the intermittent rain squalls and dark clouds scudding across the sky than in listening to the procedure in the trial. There was constant shifting as spectators became bored and left, and others, most of them waiting their turn at the R. F. C., office next door, entered.

Once or twice Judge Callahan varied the monotony with a quip, causing chuckles to ripple through the drab courtroom. Once as questions were repeated, he interrupted with "Oh, let's quit this" and dismissed the witness.

Patterson was the only defendant in the Courtroom and appeared to have little interest in what was going on.

The other six defendants were kept in jail, 50 steps from the Courthouse, where extra deputies sheriff maintained watch, "just in case the unexpected should happen."

12-16-33

DECATUR, Ala.—(By Clarence Mitchell Afro Staff Correspondent)—Snorting, and stopping to catch his breath at regular intervals, over-fed Wade Wright, solicitor of Morgan County, Alabama, exhorted twelve citizens of his State to send two Scottsboro defendants to the electric chair last week.

Baltimore

"You know these n—— meant to rape these white women," he shouted with blood tinging his face an ugly crimson, "they rushed into that car and said, 'all of you white (at this point he used a vile epithet) unload.'"

His discourse was sometimes poetic, sometimes profane, but never quiet and reasoning. He charged the jury by Heaven and by Hades and when he would come to the end of a particular passage in his speech he would hum like an old time Baptist minister.

His voice is the type which is heard at county fairs announcing the world's alleged, greatest show or proclaiming the virtues of a patent medicine.

Challenge To Good

This time he was proclaiming the virtues of a patent story—the story of one Victoria Price, much married, ill-famed, and unlettered. He painted this woman as the acme of virginity and helplessness.

He called her a challenge to all that was noble and good in the hearts of those Alabamians sitting on the jury. She was his lovely princess whose honor must be avenged.

With remarkable agility he evaded any legal quotations, with equally remarkable prevarication he put words into the testimony of witnesses which they had never mentioned even in passing.

When his tumult and shouting had died the sum total of his remarks that should not have been permitted in an intelligent court might have been called nothing and yet it was his speech which helped to bring in a verdict of guilty against two men whose lives hang in balance on the testimony of an alleged street walker.

By CLARENCE MITCHELL

DECATUR, Ala.—Rounding the turn of a line of filthy apologies for prison cells on Sunday, I ran against the outstretched arms of a man doomed to die in the electric chair at Kilby prison in Montgomery, Alabama, for the alleged rape of Victoria Price, a white female hobo and alleged prostitute. His name was Haywood Patterson and at that moment his arms were around his sweetheart, Mattie Johnson.

"Hello there, Haywood, old man," I said. His mind was evidently far away because he was a little slow in responding [illegible] he was hard to stop.

Baltimore

"Hello yourself," he said, and stretched his hand out to clasp mine with boyish enthusiasm. On learning my name he proceeded to introduce me to Miss Johnson who was a little bashful because of my sudden arrival.

I tried to avoid talking of his death penalty but somehow he brought it up with a carelessness that was surprising. "Of course they won't do it," he confided. "Too many people are fighting for me. Look, I'll show you some of my letters."

He rummaged around in his bed for a minute or two and produced a pile of mail. "See," he said, "California, Wisconsin, Baltimore,—everywhere." Some of the missives were marked with the letter "M." "Those," he said in lower tones, "are from mamma."

He wasn't sure of what kind of work he would or could do if ever he got free, "I know I'll get something though," he insisted, while leaning against the bars.

This boy of twenty—looking forward to life and future happiness—in the shadow of the electric chair after which there is no known future, only current of "sufficient in- current of "sufficient intensity to tensity to kill" as Judge W. W. Callahan said while reading Patterson's death sentence on Wednesday.

Has Faith in I.L.D.

It is doubtful if ever he has had a lesson on what Communism is all about and it is equally doubtful if he ever heard of the I.L.D. until his trial began but his faith in both of them is a refreshing illustration of youth's unfailing idealism.

You Can't Get a Fair Trial

Afro-American

Baltimore

Negroes in Alabama accused of raping white women, whatever the women's proved characters, cannot get a fair trial in the courts. [illegible] as the chief lesson of three convictions of the Scottsboro boys.

Even after reversal by the Supreme Court on the ground that the accused did not have a fair trial in the first case and a new trial granted by Judge Horton in the second case on the ground that Victoria Price's rape story couldn't be believed, nevertheless, Judge Callahan and a jury aided by Prosecutor Knight again condemned two of the boys to the electric chair.

The jury, rather ashamed of its verdict, did not look at the prisoners as they were led out of the room. They knew that they hadn't convicted the boys because they believed them guilty but because they are black, because they have Communist lawyers, and because it is necessary to keep Negroes in "their place."

Conviction of one of the Scottsboro defendants in the third trial yesterday would seem even more terrible but for the hope that the U. S. Supreme court will set aside the verdict as it did in the first trial. In the second trial the trial judge himself threw out the verdict.

It is unthinkable that these Negro boys shall be executed on contradictory and discredited flimsiest case against them. Since one of the two girls confessed that her earlier testimony was a lie, there has been no real case.

Judge Callahan's charge to this jury was so unfair that he even failed to tell the jurors how they might acquit until the defense counsel protested. The state's attorney confessed that his own speech to the jury was "an appeal to passion."

TO VINDICATE JUSTICE

To people who assume that the latest verdict in the Scottsboro case represents public opinion in the more intelligent sections of Alabama, as it seems to in the type of district where Tom Heflin used to find his support, may be commended the bravely worded criticism of the leading newspaper in Birmingham. It views, and it is baoked by others, with grave misgiving the picture which will be presented of Alabama justice if the Patterson trial comes for review by the United States Supreme Court. The specific cause of this misgiving, as the newspapers state, is the manner in which the trial judge behaved last week.

It is greatly to be hoped that the Supreme Court of Alabama itself will so deal with the trial as to make it unnecessary to bring the case to Washington. It is abundantly proved that only when the case is tried with another judge such as Judge Horton proved himself to be, during the second trial of Patterson and when he set aside the verdict, and a jury drawn from a community which will not allow itself to be whipped by an unfair prosecutor into a spirit of racial persecution, will the prerequisities of justice be present. That such a judge and such a jury can be obtained in Alabama is the confident belief of those who are in a position to speak for the State.

After the previous trial, this newspaper expressed the hope that the conduct of the defence in future would be entrusted to lawyers of honorable records as members of the Alabama bar. Justified or not, the local sentiment now prevalent against those who are defending the Negro defendants is a factor which cannot be ignored. To adapt Grover Cleveland's famous phrase, what the cause of justice is faced with is a condition not a theory. No one who remembers the fierce resentment in Massachusetts against lawyers "imported" to defend, or help defend, Sacco and Vanzetti, can fail to perceive the unwisdom of flying further in the face of local pride no matter how misguided it may be. The end to be served is not an exposure of racial animosities in Alabama, but the vindication of justice.

ALABAMA'S AMATEUR PENMAN

Globe and Independent

Nashville, Tenn.

There can not be less than nation-wide astonishment over one of the disclosures at the Decatur trial of the Scottsboro boys. It pertains to the jury commissioner "red handed" in an attempt to "fix" a record that would render it impossible for the Supreme Court to grant new trials to the Scottsboro boys on the plea that will be made that Negroes have been persistently excluded from jury service in Alabama. The man's act was so amateurish, and doubtless so disgusted many newspaper men at the trial who feel that a white official should be above doing so dishonorable a thing, that, even though showing this jury commissioner up was one of the most sensational happenings at Haywood Patterson's trial, the news was suppressed and evidently not sent out to many daily newspapers. Those of our readers who failed to read what the handwriting expert found out about "Alabama justice," are urged to read the following report from the special correspondent of the Associated Negro Press:

"Decatur is still chuckling over the way Judge Callahan overruled the defense's motion to quash the Jackson county indictments against the Scottsboro boys on the grounds that they were illegal because Negroes were systematically excluded from jury services.

The defense proved conclusively by the testimony of John V. Harding, a nationally known handwriting expert, that the Jackson county jury lists had been tampered with. The names of Negroes used by the defense at the trial this Spring, had been forged on the jury roll.

The handwriting, according to the expert, was that of Kelly Morgan, a Jackson county jury commissioner. The names had been forged on the roll after the roll had been completed. The superimposing of names over red lines which had been drawn across the pages of the jury roll, was clear even to spectators who peered through Harding's magnifying glass. In one case a letter of one of the forged names was superimposed over the writing of another name written before the Negroes' name had been forged. Nevertheless, Judge Callahan held that the defense had not proved that there was any fraud connected with the jury roll.

In uttering his decision overruling the defense motion to quash the indictments, the jurist chose his words with care. When he concluded he had left out the most important part of the testimony presented by the Defense, that of the sworn testimony of Kelly Morgan who said that there were no red lines drawn through the jury roll book when he wrote in names of the jurors.

Since the Negroes' names were written over the red lines it was clear that these names had been added since the roll was completed. This Judge Callahan did not touch upon. When Leibowitz tried to call his attention to it, Judge Callahan said irritably:

"My mind is made up. I will not listen to arguments."

Chicago Def

By DEWEY R. JONES

A young woman, quiet of voice and pale of complexion, sat in the office of The Chicago Defender Saturday morning and told of her experience trying to right a wrong she had helped to do a group of boys in Alabama. She was Ruby Bates, former Huntsville, Ala., mill hand, who, at 19 years of age, has lived through a more varied career than is permitted to most people at three times her age.

It is true, most of her experiences have been of the brand that few people would like to share, but they have been experiences nevertheless and have added much to her knowledge of human beings. For instance, she has been an inmate of an Alabama correctional institution for girls, she has been a worker in a garment mill at Huntsville at a wage of $2.75 per week. She has hoboed her way about Alabama dressed in men's clothes and slept in hobo camps with men. She has been arrested in more places than one and driven from some places, and she has figured prominently in one of the most sensational criminal cases ever recorded. And all these things before she reached her 20th birthday.

In Defender Plant

These are some of the things Ruby Bates told to this writer Saturday as she walked through the plant of The Chicago Defender. She told of the Scottsboro case and how it had affected her. Years of toil and privations, a lack of home life, poverty and ignorance, she said, had contributed to her being in the position she was at the time the Scottsboro case opened in 1931. She was tired of slaving away for nothing and to listening to the quarrels of her people, and son, on the advice of Victoria Price, the other white woman in the case, she decided to "hit the trail." Victoria, she explained, was more than 30 years old and knew all the ins and outs of the kind of life the two were choosing. It was she who suggested that the two join with some boys, Orville Gilley and Lester Wright, to hobo to Chattanooga in search of work. And it was with this girl and the two men on the return trip to Huntsville that Ruby Bates saw the fight that resulted in the wholesale arrests and rape trials.

"Why did you testify that you were attacked by the boys when the Scottsboro trial was held?" I asked her.

And without hesitation she answered: "Because they told me that I would be sent back to jail if I didn't say they had attacked me. I had been in that place and I didn't want to spend another three years there. I didn't know till later that the boys were sentenced to the electric chair; then I knew I had to tell the truth."

Why She Changed

To my question as to why she changed her testimony she stated that her conscience wouldn't let her see innocent boys be sent to the electric chair if she could help it. "They now tell me that I was paid by the I. L. D. to change my testimony," she said. "But I wasn't paid a cent. I just couldn't stand to see those boys be railroaded to jail when I knew it was a frame-up. I have brothers and sisters too, and if this can happen to Colored boys it can happen to white ones in time."

And there was no doubting the sincerity of her emotions as she said this. Somehow one felt instinctively that here was a girl who, had she been given the right start, might have meant much to the proper understanding of a great human problem.

When I asked her how her mother and father felt about her stand on the question she answered that her father wants to kill her. "He tried to get into the witness room at Decatur," she said, "and said that he would be glad to lead a mob to lynch me." Her mother, she said, feels that she is doing the right thing. "She said I could not do anything else."

System Revealed

As she talked you came to see the whole system of the South. You saw the mills, the peonage, the segregation and its debasing influences; you saw the riots, the lynchings, the murder, rapine, bastardy and all the other evils of the South rolled into one frail person who now seeks to correct them. She told about sheriffs and guards at Alabama prisons who take "Negro girls out at night and stay out with them till daybreak." She told of how these same officers of the law would lead mobs when they were supposed to be protecting the lives of those in their territories.

As for Victoria Price—she was dismissed with this significant sentence: "Why, Victoria told me herself that she had stayed with Colored men and that she would prefer them any day to white men."

And so that is the story of Ruby Bates, the white girl who told a white jury at Scottsboro that nine innocent boys raped her and who came back to Decatur from New York two years later to tell another white jury that she had lied the first time. She was in Chicago making speeches to help right the wrong she had done, and she says she will fight until she succeeds. "Yes, I'll go back to testify for them again," she said. "And I'll keep on going back until the whole world understands that justice must be done."

The Taxpayer Foots the Bill

Every time a crime is committed somebody has to suffer, financially or otherwise. When a criminal is apprehended the taxpayer has a burden placed upon his shoulders. The cost of the courts must be met and the taxpayer is the one who has to meet it.

In many instances the taxpayers of a county, in their efforts to uphold the law, are forced to bear the cost of the prosecution in which neither the defendant nor the injured parties are residents of the county where the crime was committed.

We had a case of this kind in this county several years ago when a resident of Etowah county was seized while in Blount by citizens of Jefferson and carried to that county and given a flogging. The taxpayers of Blount county had to pay the cost of that trial.

Another case in point is the famous Scottsboro case. Two women from Madison county were assaulted by some negroes from outside the State while they were passing through Jackson county on a train. None of the parties lived in Jackson. No body in Jackson was interested in either the women or the negroes but in their efforts to enforce the law the county became liable for the cost in the prosecution of these criminals.

Some of the defendants in this case have been tried for the third time, once in Jackson and twice in Morgan. All cost has to be borne by the taxpayers of Jackson county. It has almost bankrupted that county and the end is not yet in sight.

The burden is too great for any one county to bear alone, and we believe that the next Legislature should pass a law relieving Jackson county of a part of this burden.

Alabama Lynch Terror Defended by Boss Politician

PORTLAND, Me.—A committee from the Portland branch of the I.L.D. were given permission by the pastor, Rev. [illegible] to speak at the [illegible] A.M.E. Church (Negro) on the Scottsboro case. The speeches were well received and much enthusiasm was expressed. As a resolution was about to be taken to send a protest to the Supreme Court of Alabama, the floor was taken by former judge Max L. Pinansky, one of the most notorious "red baiters" in the State of Maine, who went to every extreme of capitalist political jokery to give the impression that the "purest justice" prevails in all the courts, and that if there were no Negroes on the jury in the Scottsboro case it was merely an accident.

The writer is not a member of the I.L.D. but was merely a spectator at the meeting, but in 20 years of listening to capitalist propaganda he never heard such a piece of political fakery.

Daily Worker

12-7-33 New York

By JOHN L. SPIVAK

ARTICLE IV.

(EDITOR'S NOTE: This is the fourth article of a series of four by John L. Spivak who attended the Decatur trial of Heywood Patterson as special correspondent for the Daily Worker.)

THE court's refusal to wait for the deposition of Ruby Bates, seriously sick in a New York hospital, was comparable only with the attorney general's deliberate and open coaching of Victoria Price on the stand which every newspaperman in the court room as well as Judge Callahan saw.

It was while Victoria was testifying, insisting as she had at the spring trial that Patterson and the other Scottsboro boys had raped her. Throughout her testimony as at the former Patterson trial Victoria kept her eyes glued on Knight. Whenever Leibowitz asked a question that she could not answer she would repeat it after him while waiting for Knight to form the answer with his lips. Knight had done the same thing at the Spring trial but this time it was more obvious. It seems that he did not care what the rest of the world noticed about his coaching the witness.

Victoria Tells Fantastic Tale.

Victoria, in telling her story, drew a vivid picture of the Scottsboro boys climbing over the side of the gondola, Patterson with a gun in his hand which he used to clip her forehead making it bleed.

(Even state witnesses contradicted her testimony that she was bleeding from cuts on her head.)

"That there defendant Heywood Heywood Patterson hit me over my head with the butt end of the revolver," she intoned in her metallic voice.

"Which end of the gun is the butt end?" Leibowitz asked sweetly.

Victoria looked at him, a startled light appearing in her eyes. For a long moment she was completely silent. Then, as though caught, she uttered a sickly chuckle, looking at Knight despairingly. Knight's ruddy face grew redder. An embarrassed smile spread across his features.

Knight Signals Answer to Her.

Suddenly he held his right hand up over the table and opened and closed his fingers several times around a pencil he held in his hand.

"The butt end of the gun is the part you hold in your hand," Victoria said in desperation.

Knight sank back in his chair with a sigh of relief.

Ray Daniell, Allen Raymond of the N. Y. Herald Tribune, Tom Cassidy of the N. Y. Daily News, who were sitting at my left, turned to me with looks of amazement on their faces.

"Did you see him signal to her?"

"You bet I did."

The Southern newspapermen kept their eyes glued to their copy. If they saw—and I cannot imagine how they could have missed it—they were saying nothing about the deliberate coaching of the witness. Certainly the jury saw it. It was impossible to have missed it if a man had his eyes open.

Judge's Partiality Crudely Obvious.

Judge Callahan did not say a word. Throughout the whole trial Callahan's partiality for the prosecution was so obvious that it was ludicrous.

"What the hell is he trying to do?" one of the Northern newspapermen said at one time, "Is he trying to give the defense a record a thousand times better than the Horton case for appeals?"

Decision after decision, ruling after ruling from the bench, had made it inevitable for the higher courts to overrule. This was particularly true whenever Leibowitz, pressing witnesses for answers and the witnesses found themselves caught in cleverly laid traps, was stopped from continuing his questioning.

"That's enough now," Callahan cried repeatedly whenever he saw a witness about to break down.

Once Leibowitz, goaded to fury by the Judge's deliberate interference with witnesses' answers, protested that it was not enough.

"That will do!" Callahan roared slapping his palm down on the bench. "That will do, Mr. Leibowitz. I said that will do!"

Leibowitz, knowing that the judge was aching for an opportunity to hold him for contempt of court, desisted. There was nothing to be gained by going to jail—and the record showed the prejudice and unfairness of the judge.

Judge Fails to Consider Possibility of Acquittal.

After three days of this sort of farce that Alabama calls justice came the court's now world-famous charge to the jury. For one and a half hours he read from notes. He touched upon everything that the jury needed to convict Patterson and not ONE word did he utter of instruction should the jury want to acquit the defendant. It was not until both Leibowitz and Knight rushed to the bench and called his attention to it that he added a few weak words of instruction should they find the defendant innocent.

This charge in itself is undoubtedly the rawest charge that was ever made in this country, scene of so many raw cases. But at least in the Tom Mooney case, in the Sacco-Vanzetti case, in a host of other cases, the judges no matter how prejudiced they were against the defendant, made a pretense to law. Here there was not even the slightest pretense to law or justice.

Patterson was a "nigger" and it didn't matter.

Southern Correspondents Soft-Pedal Raw Deals.

If Northern newspapermen had not been present at the trial the world would never have known how utterly disgusting was Alabama's "justice" in this case. Only the Northern reporters told what was happening in the court room. The rest of the world, getting its news from the Associated Press, United Press and International News Service, got the facts in the case, with the most important facts buried in the heart of the story in a paragraph or two.

It was that way during the Spring trial with the exception of the International News Service which had Carter Brooke Jones covering it. This time the deliberate burial and suppression of news was so evident that even conservative reporters like Daniell and Raymond could not avoid noticing it and commenting upon it.

The first motion Leibowitz made for a mistrial on the ground that the judge was deliberately prejudicing the jury against the defense happened some ten minutes after court opened one morning. Present were David Davenport of the Associated Press, Ralph Hurst of the Birmingham News Age Herald, Ben Cothran of the United Press and myself. Daniell, Raymond and Cassidy did not come in until some fifteen minutes later.

When Daniell asked me if anything had happened I told him about Callahan's accusations against Leibowitz that he was trying to implant "vicious" ideas about Victoria Price's chastity into the minds of the jury, Leibowitz' move for a mistrial and Callahan's apology.

Ben Cothran edged over and offered Daniell his running story of what had happened.

A. P. Buries Story of Jury Roll Forgeries.

That Leibowitz had made a move for a mistrial was given in a line. There was not a word about Callahan's using the word "vicious," Leibowitz' protest and Callahan's apology. Neither was there a mention of it in the A. P. or Hurst's copy.

During the entire trial this deliberate overlooking of important news that was against the state was evident. When the jury roll forgeries came out it was a national story. Here, for the first time in Southern history, the South had confessed that they deliberately discriminated against Negroes on jury rolls by trying to forge the names of Negroes. Yet that very story and the actual facts of the forgeries were buried deep in the A. P. story which went to the entire country. Hurst scarcely touched it until subsequently, when the handwriting expert testified and he could not avoid it.

When Callahan's amazing charge to the jury was made every Northern newspaperman there realized its gravity and importance. Daniell had made arrangements to take the whole thing down verbatim. He suspected in view of Callahan's decisions that the charge might be a bombshell and wanted every word of it. The other reporters wrote furiously, taking down the salient points.

When the charge was finished Daniell turned to Raymond [illegible] the, his eyes round with [illegible].

"I never heard anything like it," he said. "That [illegible] of a b[illegible] just told them to come in with a verdict of guilty. It's so raw that it [illegible] sure of one thing: these boys will never burn in the electric chair."

Daily Worker 12-7-33 N.Y.

The papers that afternoon carried the Associated Press story. The Birmingham News Age Herald carried the story. But all they carried was that the judge had charged the jury. Not a single word of the rawness of the charge. Not a single word of Callahan's forgetting to instruct the jury in the event they should decide to acquit the defendant.

Daniell talked to Davenport in the corridor of the county court house. We were all around. Daniell said he could not understand how the Associated press didn't carry the story of the judge's forgetting to instruct on acquittal.

Davenport returned: "Oh, I wrote the whole thing, including the high lights of the charge. But I guess some copy reader cut it out."

It was so funny that the Northern newspapermen walked away disgusted, convinced that the Associated Press, let alone the 'liberal" Birmingham News Age Herald, had deliberately suppressed news not only in this instance but throughout the whole trial.

It is difficult to write of these things without feeling a growing sense of indignation and hatred of the farce Alabama just put on in Decatur. No matter how calmly one tries to look at it, the crudeness of it, the utter callousness of the deliberate railroading of Patterson to the electric chair is so brazen that certainly one is convinced there is no hope for justice in Alabama unless terrific pressure and condemnation is put upon those officials responsible for this outrage.

Klansmen Attend Meet Held for Alabama Boys

Called for the purpose of raising funds for the defense of the seven negroes charged with a capital offense at Scottsboro, Ala., a negro mass meeting Sunday afternoon at the Holsey Temple, corner of Boulevard and Chamberlain Street, raised only $15, due partly to the presence of a score of hooded Klansmen and partly due to the arrival of a detachment of police.

The meeting, which was to have been addressed by two representatives of the International Labor Defense, simmered down to a group gathering that heard Rev. J. Raymond Henderson, a negro preacher, make a brief appeal for funds for the "Scottsboro boys."

Ku-Klux Klansmen in full regalia distributed handbills that carried in bold type "The Ku-Klux Klan Rides Again" and "Communism Will Not Be Tolerated." Negroes in the vicinity were visibly disturbed by the demonstration, although the Klansmen went quietly about their business of passing out the handbills.

Somebody telephoned police headquarters that a riot was imminent and Lieutenant Lon Evans, with a squad of officers, arrived in jig time. They shooed off a number of negroes and several white persons, among them Mrs. Mary Leonard and Parker Q. Wilson, of Cincinnati, both representatives of the Communist organization, who were scheduled to address the mass meeting.

The officers took into custody Nathan Yagol, 21-year-old Emory University student, but later released him when he insisted that he was on hand merely to "increase his store of information" in connection with his study of political science.

Sidelights on the Lynch Trial of Heywood Patterson

World-wide Protests Make Decatur Officials Change Their First Lynch Plans

By JOHN L. SPIVAK

ARTICLE II

Knight and I spent three and a half hours discussing the Scottsboro case. In the course of that conversation I told him that, so far as I was able to see, the whole thing looked like a set-up for a slaughter of the defendants and their I. L. D. attorneys: No steps to guard the Scottsboro boys; deep, seething hatred against "Northern Jews" who were coming in to fight for "niggers" and the numerous subsidiary reasons. Knight did not deny my charge that it looked like a set-up. All he did was bang on a chair with his cane and repeat:

"I tell you, Spivak, those 'nigras' will not be lynched."

"How about Leibowitz, Brodsky and the other I. L. D. attorneys?" I insisted.

He shrugged his shoulders without committing himself.

"Callahan is running for re-election this spring. He has not been liked in Morgan County. You are running for Lieutenant Governor. With sentiment aroused against the Scottsboro boys, admit it, and they are convicted, Callahan's re-election and your election is a foregone conclusion."

"Spivak," he returned, grinning, "you don't think anybody is honest, do you?"

Threatened With Contempt of Court

The day after I called upon Knight I went to Decatur and spent about half an hour with Callahan. The crusty old farmer judge did not want to talk.

"Let Tom Knight do the talking," he growled. "He's always shooting his mouth off. What I have to say I'll say from the bench."

Callahan's determination not to guard the defendants and their attorneys was obvious, and when I mentioned that it looked like a set-up for a massacre he just raised his eye-brows without saying anything. Then I mentioned his political career and he rose in great indignation from his chair:

"Young man," he cried furiously, "if you say anything about that, you are insinuating that my judgments from the bench will be influenced by political aspirations. If you say anything like that you will be in contempt of court and liable to serve a jail sentence!"

Since I am out of the jurisdiction of his court now I can say freely that his whole attitude on the bench was that of a man seeking to make political capital out of the case. His rulings, comments and speeches were designed to stir up hatred against the Negroes and then to exploit that aroused sentiment for his own and his Party's purposes in exactly the same way that Hitler arouses, and then exploits anti-semitism. Otherwise I cannot account for the amazing decisions he delivered from the bench during this past farcial trial. Both Callahan and Knight were playing to the lynch mob; that was evident to everyone at the trial.

Impossible for Patterson to Get Fair Trial

That it was an impossibility for Patterson to get a fair and impartial trial in Morgan County was a foregone conclusion. Other newspapermen and I had talked to citizens several days before the trial started. Everywhere we heard bitterness and fury against the defense and their defendants. In several places I personally heard repeated assertions that Leibowitz, Brodsky and the "Northerners" would be shot down in the courtroom. That there was no massacre is one of the miracles. On the Saturday night and the Sunday before the trial actually got under way, a house to house canvass was made in Decatur, telling the residents to keep away from the courtroom and that "all trouble was off." No explanation was made for this action. Whether the pressure of President Roosevelt and his action in forwarding the protests without comment to Governor Miller had anything to do about it, I do not know. There is one thing certain though: The world-wide publicity given to the set-up and the flood of excoriating and denunciatory protests undoubtedly left its effect upon the Alabama officials.

Farcical Decisions

Before the actual trial started and Callahan began to make his now famous farcical decisions on law which have amazed the whole world, he called the newspapermen into his private office to discuss our complaint about the lack of facilities for writing our stories. Originally he had refused to let us have a press table and even during this conversation he refused to let us within the enclosure where the actual trial was going on because of his fear that should trouble start in the courtroom the newspapermen would be in the way of flying bullets.

"Gentlemen," said Callahan when we were all seated, "this business of supplying seats for the press is a ticklish one. There is a 'nigra' reporter here from some paper or other. For me to supply you with seats and not him would make it seem like I was prejudiced against him. I cannot do that. If I set aside a reserved seat for him it will arouse a good deal of resentment among the townsfolk, and this is a situation that has to be met without arousing too much ire. So I don't know what to do about it."

A little later in the conversation after we had settled the press table problem, he turned to the Northern reporters:

"You know," he said ingratiatingly, "I do not see why Alabama has been made the brunt of attacks on its exclusion of Negroes from the jury. There are no Negroes on juries in New York, yet you fellows say nothing about that."

This was the first expression of the judicial attitude Callahan was to show so brazenly in the coming trial. A little later the learned judge, in discussing the danger of mobs, said:

"Those 'nigras' are in no danger. Nevertheless I have ordered two Birmingham deputy sheriffs to stay at the Morgan County jail day and night. There is, of course, some sentiment against Mr. Leibowitz, but I have appointed two sheriffs to act as his bodyguards at all times while he is in Morgan County. As for you gentlemen of the press, if any of you are armed, I would suggest that you leave your pistols in your hotel because you might get into trouble."

That afternoon when we entered court we were "frisked," along with everyone else. It was under this condition that Callahan decided, even after he had bluntly told the reporters that the I. L. D. attorney was in danger, that there was no reason for a change of venue on the grounds that their lives were threatened.

For the Country at large the case is of peculiar interest as a study of the nice discrimination with which the South treats matters of venery. The women concerned were white, the offenders on trial were black. Had they been white there would have been no case.

As a matter of fact white men were participants. Some of them actually have been witnesses in the successive trials against the Negroes. They have received a consideration even more striking than that accorded by a Hudson Valley judge recently to a white man who mistreated a little white stepdaughter.

"You have," remarked the magistrate in this case, "committed a very grave offense, one for which in the South you might be lynched. I sentence you to a year in prison—Sentence suspended."

THREE TIMES CONDEMNED.

For the third time Heywood Patterson, one of the accused Negroes in the "Scottsboro case," has heard a jury announce that he is guilty as charged and that the punishment is fixed at death. Yet, that he will be legally executed for the crime of which the jury has declared him guilty, appears to be doubtful. The grounds on which the case was carried successfully to the United States Supreme Court on the occasion of the first conviction and which caused the verdict to be set aside still have force. It is indicated that similar steps will now be taken, provided the Alabama courts do not set aside the verdict as was done in the second trial.

The seven Negroes should suffer punishment for whatever crime they committed. However, the obstacle in the case has lain in determining on unimpeachable testimony what did happen in connection with the offense for which they have been subjected to trial. It was the belief that the Negroes were in the process of being "railroaded" to death through Alabama prejudice against their color that raised up sympathy for them and brought them the means of defense. The International Labor Defense which came to their aid may have a Communist origin, but, if it were striving to promote justice, its radical character would not deprive it of the right to be heard.

There is a spirit of resentment in Alabama against the outside interference in this case. That has made it impossible to secure a trial free from prejudice. The case has been under way for nearly three years and it may continue to attract attention for as many more before it reaches a termination. Probably, the precautions taken for the protection of the prisoners is all that has prevented a wholesale lynching.

Twice before the purpose of the state of Alabama legally to hang the three Scottsboro Negroes has been frustrated by appellate court intervention. A jury now has recommended the death penalty a third time, with the prospect that this verdict likewise will be upset on the ground of injustice and erroneous procedure. Ultimately, in all probability, the case will be settled by resort to the impulsive Southern method of lynching.

Seven Defendants Arraigned Preliminary To Trial Starting Next Week

BY RALPH E. HURST
The Birmingham News Staff Writer

11-20-33

DECATUR—After an afternoon session devoted to defense efforts toward removing the Scottsboro cases to Birmingham for trial, Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief counsel for the seven Negro defendants, announced he was going Monday night to Louisiana in connection with the case and would be absent from Decatur for "a few days."

The defense motion for a change of venue was based on affidavits of investigators who claimed they had obtained expressions of sentiment from nearly 500 Morgan County citizens declaring that the Negroes would not get a real trial and that they should be lynched.

The state asked that those named be subpoenaed, which the court ordered, and then Atty. Gen. Knight met the contention by offering counter affidavits from half a hundred prominent residents of the county declaring they wanted to see justice done and expressed belief that neither the defendants nor their attorneys were in any danger.

Reading of the defense affidavits consumed more than two hours, and Judge W. W. Callahan adjourned court at 4:45 p.m., until 8:30 a.m. Tuesday.

The defendants, brought here from Birmingham at dawn, were arraigned at the morning session at which venires were drawn for the trials next Monday and motions made by the defense to quash the indictments and veniremen and to permit Ruby Bates' testimony to be submitted in depositions instead of having her return to Alabama.

Hearing on the quash motion was set for Thursday, with the defense planning to call a number of witnesses from Jackson County.

Although he refused to request troops, Judge Callahan took unusual precautions by swearing in 20 Jefferson and Morgan County deputies and ordering them to provide a constant guard for Leibowitz wherever he goes day and night.

All persons entering the courtroom were searched, and one gun was taken from a man soon after the afternoon session started. There was no indication of any trouble, however.

Strict rules regarding newspaper men and photographers were laid down by Judge Callahan, who told the deputies to bar cameramen from the courthouse and its grounds.

Two photographers, John Tresilian, of The New York News, and Donald Shropshire, Decatur, were brought into court for shooting long range pictures. On their plea that they had not heard of the judge's restriction, they were ordered not to print the pictures and were told that any other violations of the order would be dealt with severely.

A plea of "not guilty" was entered for the seven Negroes by Leibowitz, who asked a severance for each of the defendants.

Atty. Gen. Knight designated Patterson to be tried first.

An agreement was made to permit the defense to offer from the record evidence and testimony taken here last Spring on the motion to quash the indictments.

As court convened, Judge Callahan instructed the officers not only to maintain rigid order within the courtroom but to protect the defendants and attorneys in the case within or without the courtroom.

"Any person who is connected with this case," said Judge Callahan, who recently announced he would not ask for national guardsmen to protect defendants and other principals in the case, "is entitled to your protection, in this court, on the street or anywhere in Morgan County."

The court, besides warning the officers to be on the alert to head off any demonstrations, instructed them to be watchful also to prevent photographs from being made, either in the courtroom or on the courthouse premises.

Soon after swearing in the special officers, Judge Callahan called the principals to order and the routine arraignment of the nine Negroes who are to be tried a week hence got under way.

Judge Callahan turning to Leibowitz, asked him if he was ready to proceed with the arraignment and the latter announced the defense had several motions to offer.

Subsequently, George W. Chamlee, Chattanooga, one of Leibowitz's associates, offered motions to quash the indictment and to dismiss the evidence.

In the arraignment which followed the nine defendants were charged jointly with attacking Victoria Price, Ruby Bates' name not being mentioned. Defense counsel entered a general plea of not guilty.'

The seven Negroes were taken out of the Jefferson County Jail at Birmingham at 4 a.m. and after an uneventful trip were placed in the Morgan County Jail at 6:15 a.m. They were escorted by Sheriff Hawkins and 19 Jefferson County deputies and Sheriff "Bud" Davis and a deputy from Morgan County.

The defendants were loaded into four automobiles which were preceded and followed by cars. The deputies were heavily armed with pistols, rifles, shotguns and submachine guns.

Alabama law does not provide for a second change of venue. The motion to move the cases from Decatur to which place they were brought from Scottsboro will be in the nature of a predicate on which the defense might appeal from convictions, attacking the constitutionality of this Alabama statute.

The defendants will be guarded here by the Morgan County sheriff's office, supplemented by 15 Jefferson deputies that Sheriff Hawkins will leave here.

An appeal to President Roosevelt to urge the governor of Alabama to provide national guardsmen during the trial was sent by telegraph to Warm Springs, Ga., by Samuel S. Leibowitz and other defense attorneys after Judge Callahan had stated he would have no troops on duty. The message pictured conditions here as "extremely grave."

Decatur was normally serene Monday morning and there was not a single outsider about the courthouse or jail when the defendants were brought in.

Atty. Gen. Knight was prepared to oppose the motion, explaining he was anxious to avoid delay in the trials. The final decision rests with Judge Callahan, who was designated to preside at the arraignment in the place of Judge Horton, the other Morgan County circuit judge, who recused himself.

Patterson, the first of the nine Negroes to be tried for an alleged attack on two white girls in 1931, originally was tried in Jackson County, but was granted a new hearing by the United States Supreme Court. He was convicted and sentenced to death at his second trial here under a change of venue, but Judge Horton set aside the verdict.

Should Judge Callahan overrule the defense motion for the change of venue, the Jefferson deputies, under direction of Chief Deputy Gilbert, will remain in charge of the Negroes until the completion of Patterson's trial next week.

The case which has attracted world wide notice, developed aboard a freight train near the Alabama-Tennessee border. The nine Negroes were removed from the train in Jackson County and charged with attacking Ruby Bates and Mrs. Victoria Price, Huntsville cotton mill workers, who had donned overalls and boarded the freight in Chattanooga.

In the first trials in April, 1931, in Jackson County, eight of the defendants were convicted and sentenced to die, Eugene Williams, and another, Roy Wright, who gained a mistrial in Scottsboro, were held to be juveniles. The case was returned to the Alabama courts when the Supreme Court set aside the death sentences, holding the Negroes had not had the benefit of adequate counsel.

Troops Not Needed At Trial, Miller Says

MONTGOMERY—(AP)—Gov. Miller Monday wired George W. Chamblee, general counsel for the Scottsboro Negroes, that he did not believe troops were necessary as the trials opened at Decatur, but that they would be sent there immediately if there was any change in sentiment.

The telegram read: "Your wire. Have kept in close touch with trial judge at Decatur and state and county officials there. They advise me there is no indication of mob violence. Have authorized trial judge to appoint necessary additional deputies at expense of state. Investigation has been made in all portions of Morgan County and local officials base their judgment on this investigation, and state that, in their opinion, no military guard is necessary. I am keeping in close touch with officials of Morgan County in charge of these cases and should they advise any change in sentiment, or any necessity for military guards, I will provide such immediately. I have confidence in the judgment of civil authorities in charge of these cases and I have an abiding faith in the law-abiding spirit of the citizens of Morgan County."

Gov. Miller dictated the telegram from his sick bed at the mansion where he has been confined since last Monday with a slight fever.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 20.—Seven Negroes who have been imprisoned ince March, 1931, accused of atacking two white girls on a freight rain near Scottsboro, sat in Morgan County Court today and heard heir lawyers plead that they be ent to Birmingham for trial to hwart threatened mob violence ere.

It was the same courtroom in which Heywood Patterson, one of the defendants, was condemned to death on Palm Sunday by an all-white jury. Yet the scene and the very atmosphere of the courtroom were different and more tense than at any time in the previous trial.

Upon the bench sat Circuit Judge W. W. Callahan, gray haired, sharp featured and impatient with lawyer's ways of delaying the proceedings. His manner formed a contrast with the comparatively complacent Judge James E. Horton, who was supplanted as trial judge after he reversed the verdict against Patterson as contrary to the evidence.

Contrasts With Previous Trial.

Instead of the large detail of National Guardsmen on duty in the courtroom at the last trial, nineteen deputies in mufti, recruited in Birmingham and elsewhere outside of Morgan County, were there on Judge Callahan's order to guard the prisoners, their lawyers and witnesses.

Times 7-17-33
N. York

This time there was no provision for the press, whose representatives at the previous trial enjoyed reserved seats inside the railed enclosure before the bench. The townfolk, it was said unofficially, resented such consideration being shown to "outsiders."

Flashlights boomed and typewriters clicked last Spring in the courthouse, but this morning two photographers who snapped a picture on the lawn were haled before the bench and threatened with contempt citations if they repeated their offense.

When Patterson was tried here before, half the spectators benches were occupied by Negroes. This morning when court opened there wasn't a Negro man or woman in the courtroom or anywhere near the building. Visitors leaving the courthouse at the noon recess remarked with pleased expressions that it was going to be "an old-fashioned trial," without any new-fangled city trimmings.

One "Gun-Toter" Rebuked.

Yet Judge Callahan showed no disposition to minimize the dangers confronting the defendants or their counsel, Samuel S. Leibowitz, Joseph Brodsky and G. W. Chamblee, all of whom are retained by the International Labor Defense, which, because of its Communistic affiliations, is anathema here.

Every person entering the courtroom was searched from shoulder to ankle for weapons. This vigilance was rewarded in the afternoon when an overalled farmer, arriving late, was found to be carrying a six-shooter. The bailiff who discovered it promptly marched him down the centre aisle to Sheriff Ed Davis, who smilingly took the weapon and escorted its owner out of the courtroom.

No arrest was made, however, and the "gun-toter" was sent home with a warning. He explained, it was said, that he had brought the revolver to town this morning to have a new sight placed upon its barrel. Then having nothing else to do, he had sauntered down to court, without knowing that visitors were being searched.

N.Y.

Even before this incident occurred, Judge Callahan, in swearing in the specail deputies at the opening of court, advised them that they were to protect "all connected with this case, defendants, lawyers and witnesses, not only the court room but anywhere in the county."

He took special precautions to guard Mr. Leibowitz, assigning two picked men to accompany him everywhere he went.

"I mean everywhere, too," he added, as the two men nodded their understanding.

Appeal Basis Laid in Motions.

Immediately after pleading the seven defendants not guilty to a charge of a criminal assault upon Ruby Bates and Victoria Price, the defense offered three motions, two of which, if they accomplish nothing more, will furnish the basis for an appeal to the United States Supreme Court if that proves necessary.

Most of the day was spent arguing the motion for a change of venue. Judge Callahan set Thursday for argument on another motion to quash the indictment against all the defendants on the ground that it was invalidated by the exclusion of Negroes from the grand jury which returned it.

A third motion was disposed of without argument, the defense gaining its point. This was a petition for the appointment of a commissioner to take the testimony of Ruby Bates, who changed from the rôle of prosecutrix to that of star withness for the defense at the last trial. She recently informed Mr. Leibowitz that she was afraid to return to Decatur.

At the direction of Judge Callahan the clerk of the court issued an order commissioning Julius Applebaum of 32 Broadway, New York City, to issue a subpoena for the former Huntsville girl and examine her at his convenience.

A copy of the defense interrogatory and a letter containing her address was being held here tonight pending the preparation of the cross-interrogatory of Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., the prosecutor.

An incident which in drama matched the discovery of an armed man in the court room came late in the afternoon when the defense offered half a dozen affidavits in support of their contention that the lives of the defendants and their counsel would be jeopardized if they were forced to go to trial here next Monday, the date set for Patterson's third trial.

These affidavits, sworn out by private investigators sent into the county as brush and soap salesmen last Summer to sound out sentiment, contain the names and addresses of hundreds of Morgan County residents who allegedly expressed the opinion that mob action was the proper way to correct what they supposedly regarded as a miscarriage of justice.

Among those quoted were National Guardsmen who said they would throw their guns away if a lynch mob tried to seize the prisoners; one man who named thirty-one confederates in an attempted lynching of a Negro here last August, and garagemen, merchants, café-keepers and barbers, who said that the "Jew lawyers from New York," should be strung up "like the Niggers." Some of the most substantial citizens of the county were on the list.

When Mr. Brodsky offered the affidavits, the judge promptly asked him to read them, asserting that "this is a public trial." Mr. Leibowitz objected, asserting that public reading of the affidavits and their publication in newspapers would "aggravate an already inflamed public opinion."

Change of Venue Forecast.

Judge Callahan was adamant, but before Mr. Brodsky began reading, he ordered the room cleared of any of the 100 veniremen, drawn earlier in the day for Patterson's trial, because "matters are about to be gone into which I don't think it is proper that you should hear." The only venireman present promptly departed.

When Mr. Knight objected to the introduction of the affidavits, Judge Callahan declared that he would rule that the defense was entitled to apply for a change of venue in "spite of that section of the code" of Alabama criminal procedure limiting defendants to one change of venue.

The defense contends that this statute is unconstitutional in that it inhibits the right to a fair trial.

The reading of the document consumed two hours and twenty minutes. Mr. Brodsky read rapidly in a low tone so that, strain their ears as they would, the spectators could distinguish a name only here and there. Some left the room.

Even the judge had difficulty in hearing, cupping his hand first behind one ear and then behind another. Finally he left the bench and sat in the witness chair directly in front of Mr. Brodsky, who let his voice fall lower.

Investigator Is Questioned.

When the reading ended, Mr. Brodsky, on demand of the Attorney General, took the stand. He testified that the affidavits were made by men employed by David Schriftman, a New York attorney, whom he had retained "to investigate and report the true state of public opinion in Morgan County, regardless of whom it helps or hurts."

Mr. Schriftman following Mr. Brodsky to the stand, stated that the men he engaged to help him in his investigation were one John Williams, Jim Jones, a Birmingham Negro, and Victor Ellwood, also of Birmingham.

"How do you know that these men didn't copy all these names out of old telephone directories?" Mr. Knight asked.

Judge Callahan sustained an objection by Mr. Leibowitz.

"You don't know whether they included the names of persons who have been dead a number of years?" demanded the Attorney General.

Judge Callahan again refused to let the witness reply.

Mr. Schriftman went on to say that his own investigation had consisted only of a leisurely drive through Morgan County, stopping at gasoline stations and stores to engage in casual conversations about the case.

Thomas Lawson, an Assistant Attorney General, then presented a great sheaf of affidavits from residents of the county asserting that no prejudice existed either against the accused Negroes or their lawyers.

Just before Judge Callahan adjourned court until tomorrow morning, Mr. Leibowitz announced that he would be unable to attend the next few sessions of the preliminary hearing.

"I wont be here tomorrow,' he said. "I have a message which which takes me to the State of Louisiana on this case. However, my associates will be here.

Throughout the day's session which began at 8:30 A. M., and ended about 5 P. M., the seven Negroes sprawled comfortably in their chairs chewing gum, staring out of the windows and obviously enjoying a sense of importance.

Their transfer from the Birmingham jail, where they have been held since last Spring for safe-keeping, was accomplished without incident. They left Birmingham about 4 A. M., escorted by Sheriff James F. Hawkins of Birmingham and a score of deputies with rifles and a machine gun. They arrived here a little after 8 A. M. and were in the local jail before the townsfolk knew they were here.

Fifteen of the deputies were selected as court guards upon Sheriff Hawkins's recommendation because of their reputation for experience in handling crowds in court rooms and for level-headedness and sound judgment. They will be assisted by four local deputies.

Crusade Against South?

THAT the I. L. D. radical racketeer is using the Scottsboro case as a cause-celebre for propaganda purposes, this newspaper has often charged. Dr. Frank L. Owsley, of Vanderbilt, in the American Review for October, contends that the action of the I. L. D., coupled with other phases, indicates that a third crusade against the Agrarian South is under way. We have respect for Dr. Owsley's opinions, but we thing that he overestimates the part politics and Eastern industry have taken in the affair.

Behind the Scottsboro propaganda and the Lowell decision, Prof. Owsley sees a new and anomalous alliance between Communists and Republican capitalists. It is an alliance born of the Republican East's fear of Democratic dominance in the South and West, and of the Communists' desire to integrate the Agrarian South in the American Soviet. Their ostensible motive, he says, is to promote "justice" and crush "Southern tyranny," a battle cry which echoes the emotionalism of the Civil war. The real purpose, he insists, is the subjugation of the South to preserve a balance of power which in recent years has become endangered.

"In considering any political action," according to Prof. Owsley, "the Southern white first considers how that action will ultimately affect the relationship between the races." That is the point which he discusses. He emphasizes that he wants to see justice done, but that he is primarily interested in the social effects of this new outburst against the South.

"Those engaged in this new crusade of 'justice for the Negro' in Southern courts," he writes, "may be divided into the four classes so characteristic of abolitionism and reconstruction: first, the industrialists themselves, either capitalists or Communists, with their smart lawyers and publicity advisers; second the journalists publicists,, novelists poets, preachers professors who work as paid propagandists; third those who, being victimized by stories of Southern outrages, take up their pens to write in anger against the South, against which they already abhor an animosity inherited from former attacks; finally, the public at large, uncritical, lacking in either historical information or historical sense, ready because of its inherited dislike of the South to believe the worst of that section."

From analogy and circumstantial evidence Prof. Owsley concludes that the industrialists have declared war upon the South. The Communists have given him direct evidence of their intent from their official literature. Neither campaign will succeed, he beleves, beyond forcing the Southern whites to revert to the methods and psychology of the Ku-Klux Klan and retarding the development of the Negro.

The views are interesting and we agree with his indictment of the I. L. D. However, we doubt if other elements would join so irresponsible an organization in a concerted crusade against the South.

Help the Scottsboro Boys' Fund

Amsterdam News

3-2-33

New York, N.Y.

IN SCOTTSBORO, EARLY this month, nine innocent Negro boys will be on trial for their lives. The eyes of the entire world will be centered on this small Southern town where race prejudice and Negro oppression will struggle against the liberation movement of the Negro.

While this drama of historic significance to the Negro, is being staged, Negro and white workers and intellectuals everywhere are building the mass support for the Scottsboro case. The Scottsboro Unity Defense Committee, a group of persons who regardless of their political and religious differences, have united to support the Scottsboro boys. This committee has arranged a dance to help raise funds for the defense of this case. For without money the hands of the defense are tied. Every step taken by the International Labor Defense is a costly one.

The dance arranged by the Scottsboro Unity Defense Committee will be held at the Savoy Ballroom, Lenox avenue and 140th street, Wednesday night, March 8. At this benefit there will be an all-star performance. Some of New York's most famous entertainers will donate their services to making the evening a success. Fletcher Henderson, Bennie Carter and Red McKenzie and their orchestras, Chilton and Thomas, the famous dancers, Monette Moore of "Flying Colors," Carolyn Snowden, the well-known dancer, and the Three Black Dots will all be on hand.

Tickets for this dance are only 50 cents. Everyone is urged to buy tickets in advance, so that the defense committee may know how much money they may pledge to the organized Scottsboro defense. Tickets will be on sale at The Amsterdam News, 2293 Seventh avenue; the Harlem Personal Service Shop, 236 West 135th street; the John Reed Club, 450 Sixth avenue; Workers' Book Shop, 50 East Thirteenth street, and Room 611, 80 East Eleventh street. To buy a ticket for this dance is to join the mass support of the Scottsboro boys.

Harlem chorus girls are sending up a new wail. The chorines claim that their salaries have now reached a new low of $22.50 weekly. "Even if prosperity returns we are in for another beating," said one the other day. "I would not be surprised to see our salaries keep on sliding, and if good times come again it is going to be a long time before we can hope to reach the $25 in Harlem and the $30 to $40 on Broadway.

In the meantime the following letter came from the organization which showed the way to actors and stage hands years ago:

Dear Sir:

We, the Colored Union Motion Picture Operators, members of Local 306, at our regular weekly "get-together," held in our clubrooms at 2005 Seventh avenue on February 21, desire to express to you especially and to the publishers of The Amsterdam News our heartfelt thanks for the fair and impartial measure of publicity given our cause, and for the fine racial and community attitude you manifest concerning the struggle we are now waging to maintain union conditions of work and wages in certain Harlem theatres.

In this struggle we are aware that it is one not only in our own interest, but in the interest of the community also. Every institution in Harlem, be it religious, social, industrial or otherwise, depends upon the Negro wage-earners for its maintenance and success. We feel, therefore, that our efforts deserve the unstinted sympathy and support of every Negro and others in Harlem who are not completely blinded by prejudice against Negroes and antagonistic to the principles of organized labor which we represent.

We also desire to take this opportunity, through you and The Amsterdam News, to thank the theatre-going publice for the support thus far given us on the picket line before the several theatres in Harlem. We shall continue to think with profound gratitude of this support and hope that the economic advantages which will accrue to our group and the community as a result of our struggle will, in a measure, be compensation to our friends and well-wishers among whom we hold none higher and more deserving than yourself.

Sincerely yours,

Decision On Venue Change Delayed By Effort To Quash Charges

SCOTTSBORO, ALA., March 6.—(AP)—Decision on a motion for change of venue for seven of nine negroes indicted in the "Scottsboro attack case," today was delayed as defense counsel unexpectedly filed a motion to quash the indictment because negroes "were excluded from the Grand Jury."

The motion to quash was filed by Irvin Schwab, of New York, one of the attorneys employed by the International Labor Defense to defend the negroes, who contended that exclusion of negroes from the Grand Jury was unfair to the defendants.

Thomas E. Knight, Jr., State attorney general, who is directing the prosecution and who had stated no objections to a change of venue would be interposed, asked defense counsel to withdraw the motion to quash so that the change of venue might be decided.

When this was declined, Knight asked the court for a recess to prepare his argument against the motion to quash. This was granted, and arguments on the motion were set for tomorrow. Defense counsel indicated they might seek to offer evidence.

The negroes were granted a new trial by the U. S. Supreme Court which Nov. 7 set aside the death sentences.

Schwab said members of the jury commission would be called as witnesses and said he had affidavits from negroes that they were qualified to serve on both grand and petit juries but were never called in such capacity.

The motion for a change of venue was based on allegations that "due to prejudice, the defendants would not be given a fair trial in Jackson County."

If Judge A. E. Hawkins, presiding, who once sentenced eight of the nine negroes involved to death, overrules the motion to quash, he then will rule on the request for a change of venue.

Opinion was general that the change of venue would be granted. While defense asked that Jefferson County (Birmingham) be designated as the site of the new trials Knight said it was within the discretion of the judge to designate the trial court.

The negroes are accused of attacking two young Huntsville white girls as they "hoboed" their way home aboard a freight train March 25, 1931, after an unsuccessful search for work in Chattanooga.

SCOTTSBORO, Ala., March 6.—Judge Hawkins postponed rendering a decision on the 5 motions filed in behalf of the 9 Scottsboro Boys by the attorneys for the International Labor Defense until tomorrow.

New York, N.Y.

WASHINGTON, March 6.—President Roosevelt today refused to see a delegation of Negro and white persons, headed by William L. Patterson, of New York, which came here to appear before the Governors' Conference to protest against the flagrant [illegible]ation of the constitutional rights [illegible] the Negro People by the federal and various State governments and the courts. The decision refusing to see the delegates was given to Patterson by the president's secretary, Howe.

Will Return.

Patterson replied in the name of the delegation that the delegation would return within a few days reinforced. The delegation is composed of representatives of 97 organizations of Negro and white workers with an approximate membership of 500,000.

The delegation will visit Miss Perkins, Roosevelt's Secretary of Labor to protest against the growing attack on foreign born Negro and white workers and demand a halt to deportations. It will also visit several Senators to raise the question of the lynch terror against the Negro masses, the frame-up and attempt to legally lynch the nine innocent Scottsboro boys, the chain gang sentence against Angelo Herndon and the lynch verdict against Euel Lee and other Negro victims of capitalist justice.

Temper and Venue

Macon Ga.

In the Scottsboro case a change of venue has shifted the new trial ordered by the United States Supreme court [illegible] miles from Jackson county, Ala., to Morgan county, in the same state. It is not to be supposed that fundamentally there is much difference in public sentiment between the two places in a case involving charges of criminal assault on white women by Negro men. But the difference of fifty miles hardly measures the change for the better that has come over public feeling everywhere in Alabama since the [illegible] of the supreme court.

It was all very well to protest against interference by outsiders and in particular by "radicals" from New York. Chief Justice Hughes and his associates are neither outsiders nor radicals. Their caveat against imposing wholesale death sentences in a doubtful case could not but bring even the people of Scottsboro to a soberer state of mind. The change of venue was probably welcomed in Scottsboro. It averted a formal recantation.—New York Times.

SECOND TRIAL OF JESS HOLLINS ENDS ABRUPTLY WHEN RULING JUDGE SUSTAINS DEMURRER

Black Dispatch

3-3-33 Oklahoma City

JUDGE E. P. HILL, EMPLOYED BY STATE BRANCHES OF N. A. A. C. P., SPRINGS SURPRISE BASED ON THREE POINTS

Action of Court Practically Throws Case Back to Creek County For New Charges

OKMULGEE, Okla., Feb. 27.—"Demurrer sustained." With this laconic remark Mark L. Bozarth, district judge this morning abruptly brought to an end the trial of Jess Hollins, Negro, charged with the crime of rape. Hollins is alleged to have criminally assaulted Alta McCullom, a white girl in Creek county, near Slick about fourteen months ago.

Judge E. P. Hill, McAlester attorney, employed by the state branches of the N. A. A. C. P., immediately upon the calling of the case, filed a demurrer to the information upon which Hollins had recently been tried and sentenced to electrocution. The demurrer which was sustained by Judge Bozarth, raised three points in which Hill charged the information was defective.

First, that said information does not substantially conform to the requirements of the statutes in charging the defendant with the crime of rape.

Second, that more than one offense is charged in the information.

Third, that the facts stated in the said information do not constitute a public offense.

"Your honor, here's nothing to this demurrer," said Sam Cunningham, assistant county attorney of Creek county, when he had read the instrument.

"Well, we'll see whether there is anything to it," said Judge Hill, as he began to read to the court an opinion, viz.: "Rector vs Territory of Oklahoma; 60 Pacific, 275.

"Let me see that," said Cunningham, when Hill had read a few paragraphs.

"And while you read it I'll just read to the court another opinion," said Judge Hill, as he reached for another volume and began to read "Davis vs State; 17 Oklahoma Criminal, Page 608."

"Well, Judge, I believe he's right," said Cunningham. "I believe he's got me."

"Well, make the record show that this demurrer is sustained," insisted Hill.

Judge Bozarth made the order, and then Cunningham asked to be permitted to amend his information.

"Your honor, there is nothing to amend, as I see it," said Judge Hill. "When you sustained this demurrer, there certainly ceased to be anything before this court over which it has any jurisdiction. Jess Hollins is not charged by anyone with having committed a crime in Okmulgee county, and if any legal proceedings are now taken against this defendant, they must eminate from Creek county," continued the defense counsel.

Bozarth expressed the opinion that he might have jurisdiction over the request to amend, and gave Cunningham until April 3 to submit a brief covering this question. The prisoner, Jess Hollins, was ordered held until that date, awaiting the action of Creek county.

The action of Judge Bozarth has the effect of throwing the entire case back into Creek county, where Hollins will have to be again charged in an original information, arraigned and given a preliminary hearing. In such an event defense counsel will again demand a change of venue.

Judge Hill, in the absence of Judge Redwine, who was absent on account of an attack of pneumonia, expressed the belief that Creek county authorities would hardly be able to prepare an information against the defendant that would hold water. "It looks as though we will demur them out of court," he said.

Cunningham appeared much crestfallen and was visibly irritated at the action of Judge Bozarth, and the court acted with such swiftness in the matter that the huge crowd which thronged the court room hardly knew what had happened.

A score of witnesses, both black and white, were subpoenaed and were present for the trial. Mrs. Irene Hollins was also present, as was also the complaining witness.

The action of Judge Bozarth today is the second jolt given to the state in its efforts to electrocute Jess Hollins. The crimina court of appeals last September reversed the former trial, stating in unvarnished language the night session held at Sapulpa, which lasted only a few minutes, and at which time Hollins was sentenced to be electrocuted, deprived Hollins of due process of law. Hollins has been held since that time in the penitentiary at McAlester. The judge who sentenced Hollins to death, told the high court that he acted hastily because of fear of mob violence.

Hollins' attorneys express belief that the man is innocent of the charge and have located witnesses who will doubtless clear the man when their testimony is heard in court.

WELL TREATED IN PRISON

New York, N.Y.

But Eight at Kilby Penitentiary Are Kept in Death Cells to Avoid Riot, Warden Asserts.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 12.—George B. Walls, Warden of Kilby prison, where eight of the nine Negroes accused of attacking two white girls on a freight train near Scottsboro two years ago are confind, explained today that they were held in the death house to protect them from other prisoners.

Lawyers defending the Negroes have complained that they are not permitted to discuss the case with their clients except in the presence of the warden or prison guards, and they hold that confinement of the prisoners in the death cells is no longer justified because the Supreme Court has set aside death sentences imposed at Scottsboro and ordered new trials.

Warden Walls, admitting that prison rules forbade private interviews with prisoners in the death house, declared that to transfer the Negroes to the prison proper would be unsafe. When the inmates of Kilby prison are not working in the cotton mill or in the fields, they have full liberty within the prison walls until 9 P. M., when they are locked in their cells.

While the white prisoners and the Negroes occupy separate cell blocks, since Alabama laws prevent mingling of races even under prison roofs, the warden asserted that a riot would certainly follow transfer of the "Scottsboro boys" from the death house to the prison itself. The mess hall, in which all the prisoners except the inmates of the death house eat, is divided only by a partition eight feet high.

Allowed to See Prisoners.

The warden readily consented to escort a reporter through the prison, of which he is extremely proud, and into the death house itself to talk with the Negroes in the Scottsboro case. The death house cells are as roomy as the other cells, and each has a window and modern plumbing.

The only difference in the treatment of death-house inmates and others is that the former are kept locked in their cells all the time, except twice a week when they are taken singly to the shower room for baths. Since the Scottsboro Negroes are being held for safe-keeping for Jackson County, they cannot be put to work in the prison shops.

The death house is really one end of a wing of the main prison building, separated from the rest by steel doors. It contains a dozen cells, each of which is occupied by a Negro. A metal door and a short passageway lead to the execution chamber with its yellow-varnished electric chair in the centre.

In the presence of the warden each of the prisoners was asked if he had been mistreated since his arrival at Kilby prison in April, 1931. Most of them solemnly assured the visitor that they were "treated all right." A few, who have been cautioned not to discuss the case with strangers, simply said:

"See my lawyer."

Andy Wright, Claude Patterson and Charles Williams declared they knew nothing about the crime of which they were accused and that they had seen no white girls on the train, nor had they engaged in a fight with white boys. They had been on an oil-tank car, they said. What had happened as the freight train traveled from Chattanooga to Paint Rock they had learned only when they were taken off by an armed posse there and accused of attacking the girls.

Leibowitz to Arrive Today.

Their story conformed with that told by Roy Wright, the 15-year-old Negro boy held in jail at Birmingham, who has denied any part in the crime and has described the mistreatment he says was administered to him and his companions by militiamen and deputy sheriffs while he was awaiting trial at Scottsboro.

Samuel Leibowitz of New York, who will head the battery of legal talent engaged by the International Labor Defense to try to save the accused youths from the electric chair, is due in Chattanooga tomorrow to confer with George W. Chamlee, the Tennessee lawyer, who last Tuesday won a change of venue.

Judge A. E. Hawkins, who granted the motion of the defense, transferred the trial to Decatur instead of Birmingham, thus going counter to the wishes of the defense. Upon Mr. Leibowitz's arrival, there will probably be a decision on whether to ask Judge Hawkins to reconsider the motion for a change of venue to permit defense counsel to introduce evidence of prejudice against the Negroes in Decatur.

A motion to quash the indictments on the ground that jury commissioners of Jackson County systematically excluded Negroes from the grand jury which indicted the Negroes will be argued before the judge who will preside at the trial.

It is this phase of the case which is causing the greatest concern to the people of Alabama who regard it as a challenge to the whole jury system of the State. Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr. has said that he will fight the attack on his State's jury system in the United States Supreme Court if necessary.

Try to Lynch White Reporter for Negro Press at Scottsboro Hearing

Daily Worker

Charged With "Helping Niggers"; Decatur Gangsters Claim Credit for Murdering Negroes: Prepare Lynchings at Trial

NEW YORK.—The story of how a white reporter for a number of Southern Negro newspapers narrowly escaped lynching in Scottsboro two weeks ago when the change of venue for the nine framed-up Negro youths was being argued there, was told yesterday to the International Labor Defense here.

The newspaperman, who has just come up to New York from the South, in relating his experiences, gave further confirmation of the lynch atmosphere which is now carefully being prepared for the Scottsboro boys.

Sounding the alarm, William L. Patterson, national secretary of the I. L. D., in a wire sent Saturday to workingclass organizations all over the country and to every district of the I. L. D., declared in substance:

"Immediate mass action must rouse millions to save the Scottsboro boys. Let up in mass action is responsible for the present situation in which the nine innocent Negro boys are faced with an infinitely greater danger of lynching. Neglect is murder."

The wire also called on all organizations and individuals to wire Gov. B. M. Miller of Alabama, demanding a change of venue for the Scottsboro case from the lynch-town of Decatur, in Northern rural Alabama, to Birmingham, where a wide working class population of Negro and white would make it more difficult for the authorities to make lynch-preparations.

Describing how he narrowly avoided death at the hands of a lynch mob in Scottsboro, the reporter for the Negro press said:

"I asked the way to the jail, when I came in," he told an I. L. D. representative." "I was immediately surrounded by a mob of armed men who took me to the sheriff's office demanding that I be lynched. There was no indication that the sheriff opposed this idea. Certainly the mob didn't expect real opposition. The sheriff, however, wanted to be careful. The Scottsboro trial was still to come with its greater lynch possibilities. They kept me in the sheriff's office until eight o'clock in the morning, with the gang baiting and heckling me.

"The charge against me, though I was not arrested, was, as nearly as I could figure out from the talk, that I 'had come to help them "niggers" some way.' They couldn't quite figure me out, so they kept me in the office until eight in the morning, and then put me out of town, the gang accompanying me on the road. I had walked down the road a long way leaving the Scottsboro people behind before I felt sure I wasn't going to be strung up or shot that day."

The lynch-plans, the I. L. D. has charged, are directly connected with the condition of the jail in Decatur, which is such that, as a deputy described it to the New York Times reporter: "You could get out of there with a spoon." The same applies to getting in, the I. L. D. pointed out, and this was one of the factors which influenced Knight and Hawkins to select Decatur for the scene of the trial.

Threaten Militia

In further preparation for the lynching, Sheriff A. W. Davis of Morgan county, in which Decatur is located, has announced he will ask for militia to be sent there, and Mayor James A. Nelson said he will mobilize the American Legion.

Decatur, I. L. D. investigators have revealed, is the headquarters for criminal gangs which opearte thruout the state. The leader of one of these gangs is quoted as having said of the Scottsboro case that "if he had been on that train, there wouldn't have been any trial, there wouldn't have been any arrests, and there wouldn't have been any of the 'niggers' alive."

Gang Murders Suppressed

Immediately following the lynch-trial of the nine boys in 1931, an unknown number of Negroes were murdered on freight trains in northern Alabama. The number has been conservatively estimated at twenty.

The Decatur gangsters are revealed by the investigation as claiming credit for these murders.

In a further statement today, the I. L. D. repeated its warning and its charges, growing out of investigation of lynch preparations for the Scottsboro boys and their defenders in Northern Alabama, that "vigilance committees" have been set up, centering in Huntsville, which is half-way between Scottsboro and Decatur, for the organization of a lynching party in case the boys are acquitted. These "vigilance committees," called originally in an open letter in the Huntsville Times soon after the announcement of the U. S. Supreme Court decision, have spread their murderous tentacles all over northern Alabama, and are now tightening their organizations in final preparations for the trial which is to open on March 27.

But Miller Bars Outside Interference With Administration of Alabama Law.

HIMSELF AS LAST RESORT

3-12-33

He Says He Won't Let Any Be Put to Death in Scottsboro Case Unless Sure of Guilt.

New York Times

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 11.—Benjamin Meek Miller, Governor of Alabama, in an interview today in which he defended the laws of his State and their administration, promised ample protection and a square deal to the nine Negroes awaiting a second trial for an attack on two white girls near Scottsboro.

The interview took place in his office at the Capitol, from the dome of which first waved the Stars and Bars of the Confederacy. It was there, too, that Jefferson Davis was inaugurated President of the Confederate States of America in 1861.

Governor Miller, holding that the guilt or innocence of the accused men rested entirely with the court, confined himself to a discussion of the underlying principles involved and declined to discuss the issues of the case itself.

Effects of Radical Protests.

Since the Negroes were convicted and sentenced to death in April, 1931, Governor Miller said he had received more than 150,000 communications from radical and labor organizations throughout the world protesting against the executions which were prevented when the the United States Supreme Court ordered new trials. Many of them contained threats that he and other officers of the State would suffer the same fate meted out to the Negroes, he said.

The agitation by Communists, who interested themselves in the Negroes after their conviction, has helped stiffen the attitude of the people of Alabama against the Negroes.

By capitalizing on the legal assistance provided for the Negroes by the International Labor Defense it is said, Communist organizers have been active along the share croppers of the so-called Black Belt and have been successful in perfecting an organization. Many elements in Alabama regard this as a dangerous movement.

Promise of Impartial Trials.

Whatever the attitude of the people toward the Negroes or the organization that has aligned itself with their defense, Governor Miller declared it would not be allowed to interfere with the administration of justice free from prejudice or influence.

"My interest in this case is not different from my interest in other important trials," he said. "It is to see that all the defendants get a fair trial by an impartial jury and I know that they will get one.

"There will be no lynching either in the courtroom or outside it. If it becomes necessary, I shall call out the Militia to protect them, but I am not sure—I don't know that it will be necessary.

Governor Miller is a genial, pleasant-faced man with the judicial mien that comes from years spent on the bench. He served both as a Circuit Court judge and as a Supreme Court justice before he became Governor two years ago last January. The cases of the Negroes probably would come before him on appeals for clemency if they should be convicted.

"Not one of those Negroes will die in the electric chair unless I am satisfied that he is guilty," he said.

Crimes Punishable By Death.

The statutes of Alabama provide capital punishment for seven crimes and, while the Governor conceded that this might seem somewhat severe to Northern minds, he pointed out that the statutes were rooted in common lay and he held them as necessary now as when they were enacted.

The crimes for which juries are empowered to recommend death sentences are murder in the first degree, rape, first-degree arson, criminal mistreatment of a girl under 12 years of age, train-wrecking, robbery, and last for emphasis "carnal knowledge of a married woman by falsely impersonating her husband."

These are not obsolete laws. A man was convicted for crime of impersonating a woman's husband here less than two years ago and sentenced to ten years in prison, although the jury had the power to order the death penalty. In the crime of impersonation, the woman's testimony must be corroborated, but where rape is charged the word of the victim is sufficient to convict.

In two years since Governor Miller took office ten men, all Negroes, have been executed in the electric chair at Kilby prison, six for murder, three for rape and one for robbery. Of twelve death sentences commuted by Governor Miller, ten were imposed on Negroes and two on white men.

Enforcing State's Law Stressed.

The law under which the Negroes were convicted in the Scottsboro case and under which they will be tried again is very brief. It reads as follows:

"Any person guilty of the crime of rape must, on conviction, be punished at the discretion of the jury by death or imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than ten years."

Governor Miller takes the position that, regardless of what people in other States think about the severity of the statute, it is the law of Alabama and it must be enforced.

He pointed out that scarcely any of the protests against the conviction of the Negroes came from Communists within the State, or for that matter in the South. Most of them, he said, came from Communist organizations in other parts of the country and abroad, and virtually all contained the phrases, "We demand," and "We will hold you responsible."

Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., who will prosecute the Negroes and who was present at the interview, asserted that the law was administered without regard to color and declared that juries in Alabama demanded just as much proof against a Negro as they would against a white man.

A Negro accused of the same crime as the nine now awaiting was acquitted by a jury in Montgomery County, which is on the very edge of the Black Belt, at about the same time the nine men were convicted at Scottsboro, he said.

Scottsboro Folk Defended.

A leading member of the Alabama bar declared today that the mountaineers of Scottsboro, clamoring about the courthouse in a lynching mood and held back by a cordon of militiamen, did less to influence justice than the Communists and their allies attempted to do when the appeal was argued before the Supreme Court in Washington.

"Our Attorney General was threatened with violent treatment and death up there in the nation's Capitol," he said. "Policemen were sent to escort him from his hotel to the court room in the Capitol. Communists demonstrated and marched outside the building. They deluged the court with telegrams designed to influence their judgment. and when the hearing was over there was bloodshed, sir.

"Nothing like that happened at Scottsboro. No protection had to be given the defense attorneys at any time during the proceedings. None sought to influence the court and there was no bloodshed at any time.

"The fact that we don't allow our trials to be dragged out by technicalities does not mean that any rights of the defendants are overlooked. A speedy trial is not synonymous with an unfair trial.

Restoring of "Prestige" Desired.

The lawyer's words summed up the general attitude of the white men of the State. The idea he expressed is heard everywhere. Constantly it is iterated that the Negroes will receive a fair trial, yet nowhere is there the slightest doubt that they will be convicted a second time because nowhere is there an ydoubt of their guilt.

A large number of persons feel that the State Supreme Court, which upheld the convictions of seven of the condemned Negroes, was damaged in "prestige" when the United States Supreme Court reversed it. A new set of verdicts of guilty, it is felt would restore that prestige.

Attorney General Knight, who has been criticized locally for asking a delay in argument on the defense motion to quash all the indictments on the ground that Negroes were excluded from the grand jury, replied to the criticisms today.

The postponement of argument, he said, was asked not because he was unprepared to meet the issue but to protect the rights of the defendants. Had the motion to quash been argued before Judge A. E. Hawkins in Scottsboro las Monday, the other defense motion for a change of venue would have been lost because the trial would actually have been under way, he explained.

Anticipatin~ future appeals, he said that he was building up the record of the case with unusual care.

The Jail Riot Staged By The Scottsboro Negroes.

The riot staged in the Jefferson County jail by the nine Negro defendants in the Scottsboro case must be put down as just another unfortunate consequence of the senseless and vicious agitation of the case by the International Labor Defense and other radical groups or individuals.

There can be no doubt that the prisoners were aroused to their mutinous attitude by the Communist propaganda that has been bearing in upon them, and not by any grievance over the treatment they have received in jail. It is not surprising that the propaganda which has reached them should have had this effect. The fact that the Negroes, after their violent outburst and some hours of sulking, have abandoned that attitude and promised to behave themselves, indicates that their own better judgment has now prevailed over the incitements to which they have been subjected. Let us hope this better judgment will continue to rule their conduct. It is obviously better for them to behave themselves, and it is better for everyone and everything else concerned. It ought not to be difficult to persuade them of this. However they may feel about the case itself, they surely have no cause for complaint at the treatment they have received in jail.

If we realize that their spell of misbehavior was a more or less natural result of the propaganda which has surrounded the case, we may dismiss it as a matter of no serious concern. It is unpleasant for Alabama to have this sort of thing happen. But there has been much in connection with the case that has been unpleasant to Alabamians. Our people on the whole have tried to bear it all with patience, which under the circumstances is the sensible attitude for us to take, and certainly we can be patient with respect to this latest consequence of the reckless and unscrupulous agitation on the part of radicals who have sought to make of the case a cause celebre in the interest mainly of themselves, and not of the defendants.

Counsel Will Argue Today for Shift to Birmingham and Then Meet With Attorney General.

New York
N.Y.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CHATTANOOGA, March 13.—Samuel S. Leibowitz, New York criminal lawyer, arrived here today and took charge of the defense of the nine Negroes held in prison for two years on charges of attacking two while girls in the now famous Scottsboro case.

Mr. Leibowitz and Joseph Brodsky, who is associated with him as counsel, conferred at length with George W. Chamlee, former prosecutor of Chattanooga, who is helping them prepare their case. The lawyers mapped a three-point plan of action to be pressed before the opening of the new trial, ordered by the United States Supreme Court in setting aside death sentences originally imposed.

They will try tomorrow to induce Judge A. E. Hawkins to reconsider his decision at Scottsboro last Monday, when on a motion for a change of venue he named Decatur instead of Birmingham as the place for the second trial.

Regardless of the outcome of their efforts, Mr. Leibowitz and his associates will proceed to Montgomery to seek an understanding with Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr. on a date for argument on a motion to quash indictments. This plea is based on the ground that Negroes were barred from the grand jury which returned the bills.

While they are in Montgomery the lawyers intend to demand the right of private audience with the eight prisoners who are confined in Kilby prison there. It is expected that this privilege will be denied, and in that case Mr. Leibowitz said he would appeal to the courts to transfer the prisoners to the place where they will be tried or sue out a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the eight defendants are illegally incarcerated in the death-house.

Seeks to Avoid Militia Call.

The defense lawyers are hopeful that they will be able to convince Judge Hawkins that Birmingham is a more suitable place for the trial of a case which has begun to assume the proportions of a Sacco-Vanzetti trial of the South than is Decatur, a rural community in a county contiguous to Madison County, home of Ruby Bates and Mrs. Victoria Price, victims of the alleged attack.

The jail and prison are under the same roof in Birmingham, and Mr. Leibowitz pointed out that it would not be necessary to call out the militia to provide the adequate protection which Governor Miller of Alabama has promised the defendants, if the trial were held there. He believes that the very presence of the militia about the court room would be prejudicial to the defendants.

The first legal tilt in the coming battle will probably come over the issue of the right of counsel to confer privately with the eight defendants in the death-house at Kilby prison. Warden George B. Walls has said that he will not permit unsupervised consultation without a court order, and Attorney General Knight has declared there is no need for it, because the laws of privilege governing the relations of lawyer and client are broad enough to prevent the introduction of testimony by an eavesdropper, even though his capacity be an official one.

Mr. Leibowitz made it clear that these conditions were unsatisfactory to him and that he would resort to legal action if State officials persisted in their refusal to permit lawyers for the defense to have private audience with their defendants. Their incarceration in the death-house after new trials were ordered was without warrant in law, he said.

Divorced From Red Activities.

One of the first things the New York attorney, who has won eighty-four of the eighty-five capital cases in which he has represented defendants, sought to do was to divorce himself from the Communist activities which have helped crystalize sentiment in the South against the accused Negroes since the International Labor Defense interested itself in their case.

Governor Miller has been bombarded, under Communist direction, with telegraphed and written protests and threats in what has been interpreted here as an organized movement to coerce the courts of Alabama.

Communist organizers are also said to have capitalized on the help they have extended to the accused Negroes to further the organization work they are carrying on among the share-croppers of the black belt.

Not only did Mr. Leibowitz deny any Communist connections, but he made public letters which passed between him and William L. Patterson, the Negro secretary of the International Labor Defense, before he consented to accept the assignment to defend the accused Negroes.

"Lest there be any misapprehension among the people of the great State of Alabama regarding my entry into this case, I wish to make my own position clear at the very outset," said Mr. Leibowitz in a statement issued after his arrival.

"I have consented to defend these Negroes because the highest court of our country has decreed that they shall have new trials on the ground that they were not adequately defended at their first trial in Scottsboro.

"Nine human lives are at stake, but almost equally important is the preservation of our tradition and ideal of equal justice for all regardless of race, color or creed.

"It is true of every local community that when an outsider comes into it he runs the risk of antagonizing its people. I want the people of this country, and especially the South, to know that I am not presuming to come here to try to tell them how to administer their laws or run their affairs.

"The International Labor Defense has interested me in the case. I have become identified with it regardless of the fact that I have no connection with the Communist party or any other radical organization.

"I am not a 'Red' by the widest stretch of the imagination. As a matter of fact, it is only recently that I was a candidate for Democratic leader of an assembly district in my home town of Brooklyn. I am a stanch supporter of Franklin D. Roosevelt and served my country to the best of my ability in the World War.

No Pay From Labor Defense.

"I am not in sympathy with the political activities of the Communists or any other radical organization. The fact is that I am receiving neither pay for my work in the case, nor have I permitted the International Labor Defense to pay 1 cent of the necessary expenses I have incurred in the defense of these boys.

"I am coming here simply as a lawyer to try a law case, fully mindful of the sincere desire of the good people of the great South to give every living thing on God's green earth a square deal.

"If these men really committed this atrocious crime charged against them, they should suffer the penalty provided by law, which is death. On the other hand, if these girls are making false accusations then I know that there is not a red-blooded, upstanding American citizen below the Mason-Dixon Line who will not pray with heart and soul for their acquittal. I cannot subscribe to what in some quarters is the prevailing notion, that the Southerner will not give these Negro youths an absolutely fair chance for their lives."

In the letter from the International Labor Defense in which Mr. Liebowitz's assistance was sought, there was the following statement:

"We do not ask you as a condition of your acceptance as trial counsel to give up any of your social, economic or political views."

In reply Mr. Leibowitz wrote under date of Jan. 9, 1933:

"While, as you are quite aware, your organization and I are not in agreement in our political and economic views, your letter arouses my sympathetic interest, because it touches no controversial theory of economy or government, but the basic rights of man.

"Let me say at the outset that if I serve this cause, as you suggest I should, I will not serve it for money; nor will I permit you to repay the expense I may incur.

"The limits of the Scottsboro case, if I measure them correctly, rest somewhere outside the fate of the seven defendants. Within its compass reside our national conscience, our Caucasian sense of even-handed justice, and our dignity and reputation before the world.

"Not Doomed by Color of Skins."

"To help keep sacred these ancient shrines of our civilization and our national life is a duty which any man should render freely, and ask no payment except that which his fealty to his country and his pride in its ideals will provide.

"You have given me to understand that the defense was not properly presented before the first trial court, and in that assertion you have the support of the appellate tribunal's reversal of the conviction.

"At the moment, when I stand on the threshold of the case, I think it improper to discuss any of its ramifications. But it is gratifying to enter it with a warrant from the courts of Alabama to exert whatever talent I may possess in the defendants' behalf.

"I do not believe it has ever been the desire of the people of the South to deal unfairly with the Negro. Customs differ; social usages and points of view are dictated by tradition. But persons of substance in the Southern States have recognized for many generations a moral obligation toward the simple and generous folk whom slavery brought them first as chattels.

"Some of my friends have advised me to take no part in this case. They fear that the defendants have been prejudged. That irrespective of the action of the Appellate Court they are doomed because their skins are black. I cannot partake of that opinion.

"North and south, east and west, we Americans have a common tradition of justice. And if it is justice that these black men be adjudged innocent—if it is justice, I repeat—I cannot believe that the people of Alabama will be false to their great heritage of honor and to those brave and chivalrous generations of the past in whose blood the history of their State is written.

"If the views I have expressed match yours, then I will accept the task of conducting the defense."

BACKS JURY POLICY IN NEGROES' TRIAL

Alabama Attorney General Is Ready to Defend System Before Supreme Court.

RACIAL EXCLUSION DENIED

Official Scoffs at the Story o Scottsboro Defendant That He Was Jabbed With Bayonet.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 10.—Holding that Alabama's jury system had been challenged by the motion to quash the indictments against nine Negroes accused of rape, on the ground that members of their race were excluded from the grand jury which indicted them, Thomas E. Knight Jr., Attorney General, said today that he was prepared to defend it before the United States Supreme Court if necessary.

The Negroes accused of attacking Ruby Bates and Mrs. Victoria Price on a freight train on which they were stealing a ride from Chattanooga, Tenn., on March 25, 1931, were saved from death in the electric chair by the United States Su preme Court, which ordered new trials for all, holding that their first trial at Scottsboro was unfair.

Eight of them are in Kilby prison here and the other, a juvenile, is in jail in Birmingham.

State officials here, it became known today, expect the defense attorneys to follow their motion to quash the indictments with another motion to dismiss the venire of talesmen from which a jury will be selected to try the defendants on the ground of systematic exclusion of Negroes from jury service in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution.

"Systematic Exclusion" Denied.

Mr. Knight denied vigorously today that there was any such "systematic exclusion" on purely racial grounds. The Alabama statute describing the qualifications of jurors gives the jury commissioners, appointed by the Governor, wide latitude in the selection of veniremen. Its constitutionality, Mr. Knight declared, has been upheld by the United States Supreme Court.

If Negroes rarely if ever appeared on juries in Alabama, he said, it could only mean that Negroes seldom if ever satisfied the jury commissioners that they were persons of "sound judgment" or otherwise fitted to determine between right and wrong.

"When you challenge the right of jury commissioners to exercise their discretion in the selection of veniremen," he said, "you challenge the jury system, not only of Alabama but the whole United States. That is an issue of great importance in this case.

"It is the contention of the State of Alabama that its jury law provides equal protection to all in theory, and that it does also in practice within the decisions heretofore handed down by the Supreme Court of the United States. Negroes are not systematically excluded from service because of race or color. That is our contention. We are prepared also to defend the administration of the law by our jury commissioners."

Attorney General to Prosecute.

Mr. Knight, who is only a little over 30 years old and is the son of a Supreme Court justice who wrote the opinion upholding the original conviction of the Negroes, did not enter the case until the International Labor Defense, a New York organization with radical connections, came to the defense of the prisoners after they had been saved from a lynching mob, convicted in a court of law and condemned to die. He will prosecute them at the new trial which has been ordered.

In discussing the case today he expressed indignant resentment at the "interference" of outside elements in the administration of Alabama justice and insisted that justice was done in the first trial at Scottsboro.

He declared that critics who thought Jackson County showed too much haste in concluding the trials of the Negroes less than a fortnight after their arrest should consider the case of Zangara in Florida.

The Attorney General denied also the allegations of Roy Wright, the 15-year-old prisoner at Birmingham, who charged in an interview in prison that he had been stuck with the bayonet of a militiaman at Scottsboro and beaten in the court house by deputy sheriffs during the trial of a co-defendant.

All this was untrue, Mr. Knight said, and he declared that he would submit evidence to prove it was false if the defense undertook to show that incriminating statements made by the prisoners against each other were obtained under duress.

Negroes' Counsel Praised.

Discussing the question of the adequacy of the counsel assigned by the court to defend the Negroes at their first trial, Mr. Knight paid high tribute to Milo Moody, their assigned counsel, as one of the best criminal lawyers in Jackson County.

In the ten days prior to their trial, Mr. Knight said, Mr. Moody conferred with the prisoners on several occasions in preparing his case. The inadequacy of defense counsel provided by Judge A. E. Hawkins was the ground on which the Supreme Court ordered new trials.

"They had adequate representation," Mr. Knight declared, "and their statement that they were mistreated by the militia or the deputy sheriffs is ridiculous. Consider a moment. The militia was called out to save these prisoners from lynching. Is it likely that they or the deputy sheriffs would do anything which might incite the mob to action?"

The disappearance of the Bates girl on Feb. 28, Mr. Knight said, would not hamper the prosecution materially, even though she did not reappear by the time set for the trial.

Missing Witness Still Sought.

Mr. Knight declared he had process servers searching the State for her, and said that by the time the trial starts he would produce her or be in a position to prove that she was beyond the jurisdiction of the State. In that case, he said, he believed the testimony she gave at the first trial would be admissible at the second.

From other sources it was learned that the Bates girl before her disappearance told prosecuting officials she had been offered large sums of money to disappear before the second trial.

There is a disposition among officials to suspect radical organizations of having induced her to run away, and it was learned today that police throughout the State had been asked to take into custody a Communist agitator from San Francisco in connection with her disappearance.

Some of the criticism directed at the manner in which the first trial was conducted grew out of the fact that none of seven white hoboes whom the Negroes were said to have pitched off the train before attacking the two white girls was called to testify against them, although the white men were rounded up and lodged in the Jackson County jail until the trials were concluded.

Mr. Knight explained that this was because none of the white men was a resident of Jackson County, where the crime was committed. There was no reason to summon witnesses of that sort to corroborate the testimony of substantial county men who saw them thrown off the train, Mr. Knight declared, and he added that the white men, with one exception, were ousted from the train before the Negroes committed the crime for which they were indicted.

Meanwhile, in Chattanooga, George W. Chamlee, one of the defense attorneys, was preparing the motions which he will file before the trial starts, probably about March 20. He has been criticized by members of the Alabama bar for accepting a retainer from the International Labor Defense to defend Negroes accused of what Southerners regard as the most heinous of crimes.

He explained over the telephone this afternoon that he did not enter the case expressly at the behest of the International Labor Defense, but had been the attorney some years ago for Claude Patterson, father of Haywood Patterson, one of the prisoners, in civil litigation.

"I regard this not only as an important case from a legal viewpoint but as an opportunity to render a real public service," said Mr. Chamlee.

Chamlee Defends Course.

"Here are nine negroes accused of attacking two white girls. They once were condemned to death. They came very near being lynched. Everybody assumed that they were guilty as charged.

"Now if we can show that they were innocent of the charge, or even if we can show conclusively that only some of them were not guilty of this awful crime, it might make mobs think twice in the future before resorting to the rope. It is my hope that this case will provide the object lesson that will end lynching in the South."

Thomas Lawson, an Assistant Attorney General who was assigned to the task of collating the record of the case at Scottsboro, returned to the Capitol today and reported to Mr. Knight that the work would be completed in a day or so.

It is Mr. Knight's intention to ask Judge Horton of Athens to convene court at Decatur, Morgan County, at his earliest convenience when the record has been assembled. The trial, originally scheduled to take place at Scottsboro, was transferred to Decatur on a defense motion for a change of venue.

Motion to Quash Pending.

When the defense attorneys filed their motion to quash the indictments at Scottsboro last Monday, Mr. Knight was taken by surprise and asked for a twenty-four hour delay in argument on the issue. On Tuesday the court granted the change of venue, and the argument on the motion to quash went over to the judge of the new jurisdiction.

Tonight The Alabama Journal, published here in the capital city, commented editorially as follows:

"Laymen in Alabama have not been especially concerned about where these trials are held, for they have felt that Alabama courts anywhere would give the Negroes a fair trial. But even laymen have been greatly concerned in recent months over some of the race angles in the case and its handling, which must pass muster before the Supreme Court of the United States.

"It may have been a surprise to the Attorney General's Office that this point (the exclusion of Negroes from jury duty) was raised immediately, but it was no surprise to the average citizen. That is the angle of this case which is going to require legal talent and generalship of the highest order."

Postmaster Tries to Bar Scottsboro Defense Stamps

NEW YORK.—Action by the United States Post Office to attack the Scottsboro Defense Campaign of the International Labor Defense by preventing the use of the Scottsboro penny stamps now being sold to raise funds for the fight to save the nine innocent Negro boys has been sharply challenged by the I.L.D.

The I.L.D. has issued an attractive penny stamp, to enable all workers, employed or unemployed, to contribute to the defense to whatever amount they may be able. These stamps are to be affixed to the back of letters written by the buyers, to spread the mass defense, and to advertise their sale.

In a letter to the I.L.D., Postmaster J. J. Kiely, of New York, threatened to refuse to accept any letters on which these stamps are affixed.

The I.L.D. immediately took legal steps to have this threat withdrawn, pointing out in a letter sent to the postmaster by Joseph R. Brodsky, attorney in the Scottsboro case, that this is an illegal threat, as a decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals has established, in the case of printed matter on the outside of envelopes exposing the Mooney frame-up, that such use of stamps is legal.

At the same time, the I.L.D. pointed out that such a threat is plain discrimination in a class case, as the post office permits affixing of Red Cross and other racket stamps on letters.

Workers are called upon by the I.L.D. to answer this challenge by buying larger quantities of these stamps, pasting them on the back of every letter they write.

Fight for Negro Rights in the Black Belt

Daily Worker

THE mass fight for the Scottsboro boys achieved another important partial victory on Monday. Judge A. E. Hawkins was forced, under pressure of the world-wide thunder of protest against the lynch verdicts, to grant the motion of the International Labor Defense attorneys for a change of venue from the town of Scottsboro, Alabama, scene of the original mock trials over which Judge Hawkins himself presided. Judge Hawkins at that time denied a change of venue.

Thus, step by step in the grim world-wide fight against the lynch verdicts, against the brutal system of national oppression, economic robbery and persecution of the Negro people, mass pressure on the lynch courts has forced the white ruling class of this country to retreat from one position to another.

3-9-33

The fight, however, is not yet won. With typical hypocrisy the ruling class and its courts attempt to utilize even the partial victories wrested from them by the mass fight to bolster up the lying pretext that the capitalist courts are "fair" and " impartial". In this way, they attempt a monstrous deception of the toiling masses, aimed at disarming the vigilance of the workers, while preparing to carry through the legal lynchings under the camouflage of careful "deliberation", of "conceding" to the demands of the defense. But the fundamental demands of the defense and of the Negro people and white and Negro workers they reject. It is no accident that the U. S. Supreme Court in its decision, wrested from it by the mass fight, ordering new trials for the boys brushed aside as of no significance the fundamental issue raised by the defense, of the deliberate and habitual exclusion of Negroes from the grand and petit juries in Jackson County, in which Scottsboro is situated. So, too, Judge Hawkins, acting on this broad hint given the lower lynch courts by the U. S. Supreme Court on Monday refused to rule on the defense motion to quash the indictments against the Scottsboro boys based on the exclusion of Negroes from the grand jury which indicted them and from the petit juries which rushed through the death sentences against eight of the nine boys. His refusal to rule on the motion was in itself a decision against the motion, against the most elementary rights of the Negro people.

New York N.Y.

This exclusion of Negroes from juries is one of the fundamental issues in the fight for the Scottsboro boys. It involves an open violation of the constitutional rights of the defendants and of the Negro people. That it is a fundamental issue is recognized by the organ of the Scottsboro lynchers, the Jackson County Sentinel, which on April 23, 1931 openly called for the lynching of any Negro who would dare to serve on a jury, declaring:

"A Negro juror in Jackson County would be a curiosity—and some curiosities are embalmed, you know."

It is also no accident that Judge Hawkins in granting a change of venue, selected the little town of Decatur for the new trials, rejecting the proposal of the defense that the trials be held in Birmingham, an industrial center with a large Negro and white proletariat.

Thus, the ruling class continues its attempts to legally murder these nine innocent working-class children, despite the overwhelming proof of their innocence, despite the letter written to her sweetheart by Ruby Bates, one of the state's two star witnesses, repudiating her lying testimony that the nine boys had raped her and her companion, Victoria Price. The Negro and white workers and all sincere intellectuals must answer this brazen attempt to carry out the legal lynchings with a new thunder of protest, with the strengthening of the mass fight which alone can free the boys.

On with the mass fight for the unconditional freedom of the Scottsboro boys! Organize protest meetings and demonstrations! Rush telegrams and resolutions to Governor B. M. Miller, Montgomery, Ala., to Judge A. E. Hawkins, Scottsboro, Ala., demanding the release of these innocent victims of capitalist justice.

The New Scottsboro Trial

The Nation

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NATION:

This is a cry for help from the death cells of Kilby Prison, Montgomery, Alabama, where eight of the Scottsboro boys are awaiting a new trial. The ninth, who was fourteen at the time of his arrest, is in a nearby jail. The new trial, which is set for this month, offers a ray of hope, but it must be prepared for with vigilant care. All witnesses must be investigated; every vestige of evidence must be tracked down; documentary material must be gathered; all of these must be welded into a powerful defense weapon.

Vol. 136 no. 3532

The defense has gained signal victories in having snatched the boys from the electric chair four times and awakened world-wide protest against their execution. But now it is endangered by lack of funds. Already many thousands of dollars have been spent in defense of these boys—dollars made up of the pennies and dimes sacrificed by poor and unemployed workers. Now we call on those socially-minded persons who can do more. Please send your contributions to the International Labor Defense, Room 430, 80 East Eleventh Street, New York City, and send them today. Later may be too late.

The Scottsboro Case

3-11-33

Eight Negroes were convicted of rape and sentenced to die at Scottsboro, Ala., in March, 1931. They were tried shortly after the commission of the alleged crime at a time when public sentiment was inflamed. Counsel were appointed to defend them on the morning of the trial. No time was allowed to prepare for their defense. And violence was prevented only by the presence of armed militia.

Macon Ga.

The conviction was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that trial under such circumstances was not a fair trial. Last Tuesday the court at Scottsboro changed the venue of the next trial, providing that it be held at Decatur, 50 miles west of Scottsboro. Counsel for the defense wanted the trial to be held at Birmingham, objecting that the same need for military protection will exist at Decatur as existed at Scottsboro. Whereupon Attorney General Knight, of Alabama, heatedly said: "There'll be protection for them. If it's necessary to call out every company of militia in Alabama to give them a fair trial, we'll do it."

The Telegraph protests against the point of view implied in this utterance of the attorney general of Alabama that any trial can be a fair trial where the lynching of the accused is prevented only by the presence of armed troops. A judicial trial at which it is necessary to call out the army to protect the prisoner from the passion of a mob is not a judicial trial. It is nothing but a lynching under the form of judicial process. It affords the shadow of law but denies the substance of justice. A mob in a courthouse, presided over by a judge and held in check only by threatened bayonets and bullets is no better than a mob in the woods uncompelled by military force to observe the outward forms of decency. The courthouse mob in fact is worse. It gets the same results almost as quickly. But it pats itself on the back for its restraint and thus adds the vice of hypocrisy to that of bloodthirstiness.

The South plumes itself upon the decrease in lynchings. It has yet to realize that court convictions under the guns of the military are judicial lynchings more reprehensible than the old kind. A recent magazine writer doubts that the days of lynchings are over and fears that the South has just "gone legal". Utterances like those of the attorney general of Alabama lend color to such a view. Spasms of righteousness over statistical decreases in lynchings can always be discounted when it is necessary, as so frequently it is, to call out the militia to protect persons on trial for their lives. No such trial can ever be anything but a mockery. Justice is more than guns and courts and forms and ceremonies. It is a thing of substance. And it cannot ever exist by the mere force of military compulsion. No man can be dealt with justly where it takes the militia to give him a so-called "fair trial".

Defense Attorney Says Change Of Venue Will Be Sought Tomorrow

3-5-33

SCOTTSBORO, ALA., March 4.—(AP) —Removal of the trials of seven of nine negroes indicted in the "Scottsboro, Ala. case" from Jackson Circuit Court to Jefferson County Circuit Court, will be sought here Monday, when the cases are called for retrial.

Montgomery Ala.

George Chamlee, of Chattanooga, chief counsel for the negroes, has announced that removal of the trials to Birmingham will be asked of Judge A. E. Hawkins.

There was every indication that Judge Hawkins was expected to act favorably, as from Birmingham came word that preparations were going forward for holding the trials there and that Judge J. P. McCoy had been designated to preside.

The seven negroes were sentenced to death here April 9, 1931, after being convicted by juries of attacking two young Huntsville white girls, but the U. S. Supreme Court reversed the judgment of the Jackson Circuit Court and remanded them for new trials.

The defense contended in the first trials that, due to feeling in the County, fair hearings could not be held here and sought a change of venue, which was denied.

The negroes are accused of attacking the two girls aboard a freight train on which the girls were "hoboing" their way home from Chattanooga, where they had sought unsuccessfully for work on March 25, 1931.

When called to trial the negroes were represented by voluntary counsel, but later the International Labor Defense retained Chamlee and four New York attorneys to represent them. This staff has since been augmented.

Unlike the first trials, when national guardsmen were called here to maintain order, as hundreds were attracted by sensational charges, Monday not even the negroes will be present.

Arguments probably will be heard during the forenoon by Judge Hawkins and the State is expected to consent to the removal, as Atty. Gen. Knight, who has assumed charge of prosecution, has said he would interpose no objection to the motion.

Knight entered the case when it was appealed to the Alabama Supreme Court, where the death sentence for Ozie Powell, Olin Montgomery, Heywood Patterson, Willie Roberson, Andy Wright, Charles Weems, and Clarence Norris, were confirmed.

The other two negroes, Eugene Williams and Roy Wright were both held to be juveniles and will be tried in Juvenile Court before the Circuit Court will have jurisdiction in their cases.

Since the negroes were convicted Gov. Miller has received more than 2,000 protests, ranging from postcards to lengthy petitions, and cables from foreign countries.

Threats also were received by the Alabama Supreme Court before decisions were rendered in the cases.

Knight Going To Scottsboro Today

Atty. Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., will leave today for Scottsboro to be present in circuit court there tomorrow morning when the cases of seven negroes convicted last March a year ago of criminally assaulting two young white girls in Jackson County, will be called for retrial.

Each of the defendants was sentenced to death, the judgments being affirmed by the Supreme Court of Alabama. On appeal to the U. S. Supreme Court, however, reversals resulted and new trials were ordered.

Mr. Knight who represented the State at the submission of appeals to the two high courts will personally direct the prosecution of each case on second trial. He will take with him to Scottsboro to aid him in the prosecutions, Assistant Atty. Gen. T. S. Lawson.

Counsel for the negroes has announced that when the cases are called, he will file application for a change of venue. Should it be granted by Circuit Judge A. E. Hawkins, it is thought that the trials will probably take place in Birmingham, according to press dispatches from there Friday.

In the event a venue change is requested and granted, the Attorney General has stated he will not oppose trial of the defendants anywhere in Alabama that the court may designate.

The cases to be called for retrial are those of Haywood Patterson, Charles Weems, Clarence Norris, Ozie Powell, Willie Roberson, Andy Wright and Olin Montgomery.

SEE LITTLE GAIN IN VENUE CHANGE FOR NEGRO TRIAL

Defense Counsel Would "About as Soon" Conduct Case at Scottsboro.

MOVED TO DECATUR, ALA.

"Same Class of People There," Says Attorney—Birmingham Sought as Scene.

By the Associated Press.

SCOTTSBORO, Ala., March 8.—Scene of the fight for freedom of seven Negroes facing charges of attack in the "Scottsboro case" today was shifted to Decatur, seventy-five miles west of here, by Judge A. E. Hawkins, who granted to defense motion for a change of venue.

Hopes of the defense for an early trial were checkmated, unless a special term of court is called, as the Mogan County Circuit Court which now has jurisdiction, does not meet again until June.

"I had just about as soon try the cases here," said Irvin Schwab, of New York, member of the counsel employed by the International Labor Defense to defend the Negroes. "They are the same class of people there."

Wanted Trial at Birmingham.

Mr. Schwab, who made the motion for a change of venue yesterday, asked Judge Hawkins to designate the Jefferson County Circuit Court, at Birmingham, as the scene for the trial of the Negroes, whom the United States Supreme Court saved once from the electric chair.

The defense motion to quash the indictment against the Negroes, because no Negroes ~~were included in~~ the Grand Jury returning the true bills were held in abeyance until the trials are called in the new court of jurisdiction.

Jackson County was commended by Thomas E. Knight, Jr., State Attorney General who is directing the prosecution, for being "even tempered."

Hits Outside Organizations.

"The people of Jackson County have done less to swerve the course of justice in the courts of Alabama," said Knight, "than have outside organizations."

Knight interposed no objection to the motion for a change of venue, saying:—

"I want these cases tried anywhere in Alabama that the defense believes it can obtain a fair trial."

The Negroes, Ozie Powell, Olin Montgomery, Charlie Weems, Heywood Patterson, Andy Wright, Clarence Norris and Willie Roberson, were not brought here from Kilby Prison at Montgomery, where they have been held since April 9, 1931, when they were sentenced to the electric chair.

The New Trial at Scottsboro

The new trial opened yesterday in Scottsboro, Alabama, under conditions which should be a great improvement over those which existed in April, 1931, when sentence of death was passed on the seven Negro youths. The defendants now have competent counsel, and ample time has been allowed for the preparation of the case for court. There can be little danger of a repetition of the injustice found in the first trial by the United States Supreme Court on the ground that life was to be taken without respect for the "due process of law" provision of the Constitution.

Yet with the passage of time, the difficulties in the way of a fair trial have not been wiped out. The counsel for the boys is employed by the International Labor Defense of New York, and with this outside interest injected into the case the complications are increased. In the beginning the "atmosphere of tense, hostile and excited public sentiment," which the Supreme Court decision describes, was based only on racial prejudice. Today to that emotion is added hostility to those who came to the aid of the Negroes. The prejudice against them may be intensified by prejudice against Yankees, against city people, against "foreigners," and by violent opposition to radicals, especially to anti-Christian communists.

This is an immense handicap for the defendants. It will be indeed an achievement if the trial is carried on without reflection of these emotions of the local people. But nothing less than this is expected by the rest of the United States. Americans, who are not "foreigners" or city people or radicals look for conformity to the Constitution. By failing to preserve reasonable standards two years ago, the court is now called upon to demonstrate its capacity for dealing justly under far more difficult circumstances.

Temper and Venue. In the Scottsboro case a change of venue has shifted the new trial ordered by the United States Supreme Court fifty miles from Jackson County, Ala., to Morgan County, in the same State. It is not to be supposed that fundamentally there is much difference in public sentiment between the two places in a case involving charges of criminal assault on white women by Negro men. But the difference ~~of fifty~~ miles hardly measures the change for the better that has come over public feeling everywhere in Alabama since the intervention of the Supreme Court.

It was all very well to protest against interference by outsiders and in particular by "radicals" from New York. Chief Justice HUGHES and his associates are neither outsiders nor radicals. Their caveat against imposing wholesale death sentences in a doubtful case could not but bring even the people of Scottsboro to a soberer state of mind. The change of venue was probably welcomed in Scottsboro. It averted a formal recantation.

SCOTTSBORO "JUSTICE".

The New York Times is rendering a great public service by sending a staff representative to Alabama to write impersonal and impartial observations on the Scottsboro case which has aroused the interest of the civilized world. While the saying goes that there are always two sides to every question, such an aphorism has no application in fact to backwoods sections of the South where ignorance and intolerance are rife and it is worth one's life to speak the truth if sentiments expressed are not in keeping with public clamor.

Four months have passed since the highest court in the land set aside the death sentence imposed on the eight boys accused of attacking two white girls on a freight train in 1931, yet they are guarded in death cells in Kilby Prison, Montgomery, and no one can converse with them unless a prison official is standing by—not even their parents or lawyers.

The New York Times correspondent was privileged to interview Roy Wright, 15 years old, who, because of his youth, was tried in the Juvenile Court for the alleged crime. The jury disagreed, but the lad, who was barely 14 when arrested, is a prisoner in Birmingham. Irving Schwab, New York lawyer, representing the International Labor Defense, who is to be commended for his rare courage in going to Scottsboro and aggressively officiating as one of the defendants' counsel, was present when Roy told his story.

The youthful prisoner charges that when he and his companions were taken from the freight train by an armed posse and carried to the Jackson County Jail he was assaulted by a member of the militia who jabbed a bayonet through his cheek. A scar substantiates the boy's statement that he was mistreated by those supposed to be his protectors. At the first trial at Scottsboro, Roy said he was whipped in court by a deputy sheriff.

> "I was sitting in a chair in front of the judge and one of those girls was testifying. One of the deputy sheriffs leaned over to me and asked me if I was going to turn State's evidence, and I said no, because I didn't know anything about the case.
> "Then the trial stopped a while and the deputy sheriff beckoned to me to come out into another room—the room back of the place where the judge was sitting—and I went. They whipped me and it seemed liked they were going to kill me. All the time they kept saying, 'Now will you tell?' and finally it seemed like I couldn't stand no more and I said yes.
> "Then I went back into the courtroom and they put me up on the chair in front of the judge and began asking a lot of questions and I said I had seen Charlie Weems and Clarence Norris in the gondola car with the white girls."

Roy Wright is emphatic in the assertion that he gave false testimony at the trial to keep officers of the law from giving him another severe whipping.

Neither the lawyers for the defense nor the public-at-large have voiced approval of Circuit Judge A. E. Hawkins' actions in naming Morgan County, Alabama, as the place for a new trial. There is only a difference of fifty miles between the two county seats, and the rural folk of the county are just as benighted and eaten up with race hatred as the other. The temper of the people in these communities where lynchings are popular, is evidenced by the experience of Stephen Roddy, a white lawyer of Chattanooga.

At the first trial in Scottsboro Mr. Roddy appeared before the court, explained that he was there not as a paid attorney, but because people interested in the defendants had spoken to him about them, and asked if he might appear as voluntary counsel. Judge Hawkins replied:

"You don't appear if I appoint counsel."

"I would not like your Honor to rule me out of it," Mr. Roddy said.

"If you appear for these defendants then I will not appoint counsel, and if local counsel are willing to appear and assist you under the circumstances all right, but I will not appoint them," commented Judge Hawkins.

Mr. Roddy inquired: "Your Honor has appointed counsel—is that correct?"

Judge Hawkins replied: "I appointed all the members of the bar for the purpose of arraigning the defendants, and then, of course. I anticipated them to continue and help them if no counsel appears."

Mr. Roddy answered: "Then I don't appear as counsel but I do want to stay in and not be ruled out of this case," an arrangement to which the court made no objection.

Then a lawyer by the name of Parks, one who had been assigned to represent the Negro boys, protested against acting as their counsel unless no other lawyer had been obtained. He declared he could be induced to take the case only by the "high sense of duty I owe the State and not to these defendants."

Milo Moody, a 70 year old lawyer, finally consented "to go ahead and help do anything I can," which he did. The only defense witnesses he called to the stand were the defendants themselves.

This was the "fair and impartial trial" these colored Americans were given for their lives in a community where the residents say with pride: "You know, nigger we don't let no darkies 'hang' around here, and if we catch you anywhere near here after dark we'll shoot you."

Doubtless The New York Times has received letters of protest for giving the other side of the Scottsboro case, for there are those who do not look upon it as primarily involving the question of justice in the courts but of race. In opening the eyes of the world to conditions which should not be permitted to exist where people call themselves God-fearing and civilized, a timely service is being performed which is most helpful to the entire South—not merely the Negro.

During these days when radicalism is spreading throughout the nation and an organized effort is being made to arouse the Negro to more than passive resentment against the many injustices to which he is subjected in some of the Southern States, something must be done to crystalize a strong public sentiment for law and order. Lawlessness and disregard for the rights of others will only play into the hands of those who would incite violence and revolt. Scottsboro "justice" only adds fuel to the flames.

ASSAIL PRISON RULE IN SCOTTSBORO CASE

Defense Lawyers Will Seek Private Interview With Negroes, Thus Far Denied.

INDICTMENT ACTION ASKED

State's Attorney Urged to Agree on Date for Argument—Venue Change Again Sought.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., March 14.—A legal tilt in the battle to free nine Negroes, once condemned to death ~~for an alleged~~ attack on two white girls, is expected tomorrow when Samuel Leibowitz of New York, chief of defense counsel, demands the right to interview privately the eight defendants confined in the death house of Kilby prison.

Thus far the privilege of consultation with their clients beyond the earshot of officials or prison guards has been denied to other lawyers associated with him in the defense of the Negroes, who have been in prison for the past two years.

Up until the present, prison officials have given no indication of relaxing that rule and it was expected that Mr. Leibowitz would meet with the same rebuff as George W. Chamlee, Irving Schwab and Joseph Brodsky, the other lawyers in the case.

Mr. Leibowitz declared today, however, that he would not take "no" for an answer without appealing to the courts for a writ of habaes corpus, demanding the immediate presence of the eight men who, he holds, are illegally incarcerated in death cells, since the United States Supreme Court set aside their death sentences and ordered the courts of Alabama to grant them a new trial.

Warden Walls of Kilby prison, in refusing earlier requests of defense attorneys to see their clients, privately asserted that he is merely holding them for safekeeping for county officials, whose prisoners they are.

Interview Unconvicted Youth.

Not without an order from the court in which they will be tried, he has said, will he relax the rules of his prison, which prohibit private conferences with death house inmates.

Thomas E. Knight Jr., Attorney General, considers that the whole thing is an academic question anyway, on the ground that conversations between lawyer and client are privileged and could not be used in court, even though an effort were made to present the testimony of an eavesdropper.

Accompanied by Mr. Chamlee and Mr. Brodsky, Mr. Leibowitz came here from Chattanooga today and spent the afternoon in consultation with Roy Wright, the 15-year-old Negro, who alone among the nine accused by Ruby Bates and Victoria Price was not convicted of the crime, which in this State carries a penalty of death in the electric chair.

Wright was tried as a juvenile and the jury which heard the evidence against him was unable to agree upon his guilt, dividing eleven to one for conviction. Since he never was placed under sentence, he was not transferred to Kilby prison.

The defense lawyers say they never have experienced any difficulty in seeing him alone.

Wright Reiterates Charges.

Although they had about decided to abandon their fight to have the trial moved to Birmingham, their interview with the Wright boy caused them to continue the effort.

Young Wright charged in an interview last week that militiamen called out to protect him and his fellow-defendants from a lynching mob at Scottsboro jabbed him in the cheek with a bayonet and repeated the charge to Mr. Leibowitz today.

He said also that a deputy sheriff knocked out one of his teeth and he asserted that the testimony he gave against two of his fellow prisoners was false and obtained under duress while the trial was in progress.

The young Negro was wearing a frayed waistcoat which he said was the same as the one he was wearing when he was taken off the freight train on which the alleged attack on the two girls took place nearly two years ago. It was stained on one side with what Mr. Leibowitz said undoubtedly was blood.

Mr. Leibowitz said he was convinced that Wright told the truth in his charges of mistreatment.

"It convinces me also that we must make every effort to have the trial moved to some city such as Birmingham, where it will not be necessary to depend upon the State militia for their protection," the lawyer said.

The argument over the place where the re-trial shall be held could be opened up again only by the consent of Judge H. E. Hawkins, who allowed a change of venue to Decatur.

To Visit Prison Today.

The defense attorneys planned to go to the State capital at Montgomery tonight and make their attempt to see the eight men in Kilby prison the first thing in the morning.

While they are there they intend also to try to reach an agreement with the Attorney General on an early date for hearing on their motion to quash the indictments.

This motion is based on the contention that Negroes are systematically excluded from jury service in Alabama in defiance of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

It will be heard before Judge Horton in Circuit Court in Decatur where the trial is to be held.

SCOTTSBORO BOYS FACE LYNCH DANGER

DECATUR ADMITS THE NEW YORK "

, IN "TIMES"

NEW YORK. — The New York Times in a dispatch from its special staff correspondent in Alabama admits that "the success of the defense in obtaining a change of venue from Jackson County seems a little like a pyrrhic victory (a victory bringing with it new dangers) in view of the comments made here today by officials and average citizens."

New York

The I.L.D. has charged that the moving of the trial to Decatur was the result of a careful plot between Attorney-General Thomas E. Knight Jr., of Alabama, and Judge A. E. Hawkins of Scottsboro, who conducted the original lynch-trial and to whom the case was sent back by the U. S. Supreme Court. The purpose of this plot was to create an illusion of fairness by moving the trial from Scottsboro, while actually increasing the authorities' chances of lynching the boys, legally or extra-legally.

"Residents of Decatur, which is fifty miles south of Pulaski, the birthplace of the original Ku Klux Klan of reconstruction days, assert that the defendants will get a fair trial, but they warn that they will stand no nonsense, either from the defense or its sympathizers, white or black," the Times dispatch said.

"The townsfolk don't care to listen to legal arguments about race equality or the rights of Negroes to serve on juries, the man in the street will tell the visiting stranger.

". . . Another county official, who refused to permit the use of his name, insisted that the Negroes received fair treatment at their first trial, and asserted they 'would get the same kind of treatment here.'

"He remarked a little regretfully that 'if this thing had happened twenty-five years ago there would not have been any trial.' When he was asked if he thought the trial might be interrupted by violence, he said: 'I don't know. If any Niggers come around the court-house and start acting up, something might happen. But if the Niggers and the outsiders mind their business, there won't be any trouble.'

"Then he added:

"'Most of our officers and a lot of people in Morgan County were raised in Jackson County.'

". . . Court officials and old inhabitants affirm that they cannot remember a time when anyone hereabouts even suggested that a Negro might be qualified to serve as a juror."

Purpose of Times' Articles

"Only mass action can defeat the lynchers," Patterson said. "The U. S. Supreme Court decision, aimed at lulling the workers into a sense of security, and smashing the mass defense movement, has in part succeeded. Mass action has subsided.

"The purpose of the New York Times articles now being published daily, on the Scottsboro case, is to further this demoralization. Their purpose is to create the illusion that the bourgeoisie will help save the Scottsboro boys."

For Conscious Fight

"Governor Miller of Alabama has received more than 150,000 protests against the legal-lynch plans of the Alabama bosses. He must receive a million. And every protest must be the expression of militant, fighting, conscious demand for the immediate unconditional release of the Scottsboro boys.

"Demand a change of venue to Birmingham for the trial.

"Demand safeguards for the lives of the Scottsboro boys.

"Fight, consciously and militantly, against the lynch-preparations of the Alabama bosses."

Girl Who Accused Negroes Cannot Be Found—Change of Venue to Birmingham Urged.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., March 23.—The question of whether to ask National Guard protection for the trial of the Negroes accused of attacking two white girls when it opens here Monday remained undecided today.

The advisability of calling upon Governor Miller to supply the troops was being considered by Sheriff Bud Davis of Morgan County and Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., who arrived here this evening to make final preparations for the trial.

The sheriff, however, was out of town and a final decision will not be reached until tomorrow. Representatives of the militia units at Hartselle and Athens, neighboring towns, called at the sheriff's office in the morning in quest of information, but were unable to obtain it.

They explained that if their troops were to be called out they would like to know it far enough in advance to be able to make the necessary arrangements to be on hand with full complements of men on the day the trial opens.

The absence of Sheriff Davis from the county was in connection with the approaching trial of the Negroes, who once were condemned to death for their alleged attack upon Ruby Bates and Mrs. Victoria Price. The sentences were not carried out because the International Labor Defense carried an appeal to the United States Supreme Court which ordered new trials.

Among the subpoenaes which the Sheriff and his deputies were serving was one for the Bates girl who disapepared from her home in Huntsville, thirty miles from here, on Feb. 28. Sheriff Ben Giles of Madison County, which includes Huntsville within its borders, said that all efforts to find the girl had failed.

The coming trial was the chief topic of conversation in Decatur tonight. The facilities of the local hotel, it was said, will be taxed to the utmost after Sunday night. The Western Union and Postal Telegraph Companies have rented space in buildings near the courthouse and extra operators are being sent here to handle the press reports of the proceedings.

Although it is regarded as unlikely that Judge A. E. Hawkins of Scottsboro, Jackson County, where the original convictions were omtained, would reconsider his decision to transfer the trials to Decatur in granting a defense motion for another change of venue, agitation for removal of the proceedings to Birmingham was gaining momentum.

A mass meeting was to be held in court to reconsider. Attorney General Knight said he had received a communication from the American Civil Liberties Union asking him to use his influence to take the trial to Birminghan and several residents of this Tennessee River city let it be known that they would have small objection.

No action can be taken, however, unless Samuel Leibowitz, chief of defense counsel who now is in New York, decides to ask for reconsideration of the motion to change the venue and it was regarded as unlikely that he would do so for fear of losing the plea and then having to try the case in a community aroused by the allegations of prejudice that would be necessary to support the request.

TO CONSIDER TROOPS FOR NEGROES' TRIAL

Attorney General of Alabama and Sheriff Will Confer at Decatur Today.

CALL FOR MILITIA LIKELY

Opinion in Town Where Case Will Be Reopened Monday Is That "Precaution" Is Needed.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 22.—Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr. announced today that he will leave tomorrow for Decatur to discuss with Sheriff Davis of Morgan County the advisability of providing military protection for the Scottsboro Negroes who will go on trial for their lives there Monday.

The Negroes—there are nine of them—are accused of attacking two white girls who were hoboing on a freight train bound from Chattanooga to Memphis, Tenn., nearly two years ago. Eight of them were found guilty and sentenced to die in the electric chair under the Alabama laws, which decree that rape shall be punishable by death. The United State Supreme Court reversed the verdict and ordered new trials for all.

Mr. Knight, it was understood, was still open-minded on the question of whether it would be necessary to ask Governor Benjamin Meek Miller to order units of the State militia to Decatur for the trials. He was said to feel that such action was unnecessary to protect the accused Negroes from mob violence, but before making a definite decision he wished to consult the Sheriff regarding the security of the jail.

Sheriff Davis's deputies said last week that he was in favor of calling upon the Governor to provide military protection, not so much against violent outbreaks among the townsmen, but to prevent any jail break which might be attempted by the prisoners.

At the same time there was an undercurrent of opinion in Decatur that it would be as well to take all possible precautions and it was believed that the outcome of the Attorney General's conference with the Sheriff would be a request from one or the other for a military guard.

All the defendants are now in the Jefferson County Jail in Birmingham for "safekeeping," pending their second trial. Eight of them, who have spent the last two years in the death house of Kilby Prison here, were moved last night, and the ninth, a juvenile who never was convicted, has been there all along.

Seven, who have been adjudged adults, will be placed on trial next week, although only Roy Wright, 15 years old, who was not convicted, was tried as a juvenile the first time.

Attorney General [redacted] prosecute the Negroes [redacted]st trial, having entered the case only when lawyers for the International Labor Defense raised the question of the right of Negroes to serve on Alabama juries, in connection with an appeal which ultimately reached the Supreme Court.

Mr. Knight, who has been occupied for the past few days in defending an injunction suit designed to tie up $20,000,000 in outstanding State warrants, has had but little chance to familiarize himself with the issues in the Scottsboro case.

Although the injunction suit still is pending before the Alabama Supreme Court, Mr. Knight said he would be free tomorrow to leave and begin final preparations for the approaching trial. In addition to consulting with Sheriff Davis on measures of protection for the trial, he expects to interview Mrs. Victoria Price, one of the accusers of the Negroes. The other alleged victim of the attack, Ruby Bates, has disappeared.

In the prosecution of the case Mr. Knight will be assisted by Solicitor Bailey of Jackson County, who was the prosecutor in the first trial. Samuel S. Leibowitz of New York will be chief of defense counsel.

ASKS 26 SUBPOENAS IN SCOTTSBORO CASE

Defense Lawyer Seeks to Prove Exclusion of Negroes From Alabama Juries.

STATE MAY AVOID ISSUE

Rumor in Capital Is That Some Negroes Will Be Called for the Trial Jury Next Week.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MONTGOMERY Ala., March 20.—G. W. Chamlee, one of the attorneys retained by the International Labor Defense to defend at their second trial the nine Negroes once sentenced to death for an attack upon two white girls, announced today that he had requested twenty-six subpoenas for witnesses through whom the defense hopes to establish that racial discrimination keeps Negroes off juries in Jackson and Morgan Counties.

Included among the subpoenas which Mr. Chamlee asked Sheriff Davis of Morgan County to issue for next Monday morning is one for Peter Jarman, Secretary of State, calling for the production of records of the Federal census of 1930, which shows the proportion of Negro and white citizens in the two counties. The other subpoenas were for jury commissioners and Negroes who, the defense will attempt to show, are qualified to serve as jurors except for the color of their skins.

Not one of these witnesses is wanted in connection with the charge on which the accused Negroes are to be tried for their lives. The trial itself probably will not start until Wednesday of next week, because both sides expect that the argument and submission of proof of systematic exclusion of Negroes from juries in Alabama, in support of a motion to quash the indictments, will consume the first two days.

First Actual Test of Issue.

While the Supreme Court of the United States has held that Negroes cannot be excluded from jury service because of their race, the issue never has been the basis for a reversal of the lower courts, chiefly, according to the defense lawyers, because no actual proof of exclusion has ever been offered before, the litigants relying in the past on contentions and affidavits. This time it is regarded as certain that direct evidence on the question will be offered.

Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, upon whose young shoulders has fallen the task of prosecuting the nine defendants and at the same time defending Alabama's jury system, intends to enter a denial of the allegations of exclusion, leaving it to the defense attorneys, headed by Samuel S. Liebowitz of New York, to assume the burden of proof.

It has been rumored here for days that the State might avoid the issue by arranging to have the names of a few Negroes placed upon the venire which will be called up for the trial, while at the same time preventing their serving as jurors by the exercise of peremptory challenges. Persons close to Mr. Knight, however, said he intended to meet the issue squarely and attempt to prove the defense charges unfounded.

The placing of Negro names upon the jury roll in Morgan County where the trial will be held, it was said, would have no bearing on the validity of the indictments which were returned two years ago in Jackson County. The motion now before the court is to quash the indictments, but it will be followed, if it is lost, by a motion to dismiss the venire from which the petit jury will be selected, unless it contains Negroes a. well as whites.

Negroes Still in Death House.

Eight of the nine defendants are still prisoners in the death house of Kilby prison, but it was expected that they would be transferred to the Jefferson County jail at Birmingham for safekeeping until their trial next week. Prison rules of Kilby prohibit private interviews with inmates of the death house, and it is for that reason that the defense attorneys want to effect the transfer.

Mr. Chamlee said that Sheriff McBryde of Jackson County had signed the order requesting that if the prisoners must be moved they be held at Birmingham because of the "present insecurity" of the jail in his county. Judge A. E. Hawkins, who granted a motion for a change of venue in the case, also has signed the order and it has been forwarded to Judge James Horton, who will preside over the new trial at Decatur.

As soon as the order is returned to him, Mr. Chamlee said, it would be forwarded to Montgomery for service upon Warden Walls at Kilby prison. As soon as possible and consistent with the secrecy which officials hold necessary for the safety of the prisoners, they will be moved to Birmingham, it was said.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 21.—Eight of the nine Scottsboro Negroes were taken from the death house cells which they have occupied for nearly two years, loaded into a prison van after dark tonight and transferred to the Jefferson County jail in Birmingham to await a second trial for their lives next week at Decatur.

The transfer was carried out in accordance with an order signed by Circuit Judges A. E. Hawkins and James A. Horton of Jackson and Morgan Counties, respectively, in accordance with a request from defense attorneys concurred in by the Attorney General, Thomas E. Knight Jr.

The purpose of the transfer was to permit the defense attorneys to hold unsupervised interviews with their clients, an impossibility at Kilby prison.

The transfer places all of the prisoners under the same roof, for Roy Wright, the 15-year-old juvenile who alone was not convicted at his first trial in Scottsboro, has bene there for as long as his codefendants have been in Kilby prison.

The nine prisoners who are accused of attacking two white girls, Ruby Bates and Mrs. Victoria Price, on a freight train from Chattanooga to Huntsville on the afternoon of March 25, 1931, will remain in the Birmingham jail until just before the new trial, ordered by the United States Supreme Court, opens before Judge Horton in Decatur next week.

The order for the transfer of the prisoners was served upon Warden Walls at Kilby prison late this afternoon. Scarcely a soul in Montgomery knew that it had been received or that the prisoners, who had to be saved from a lynching mob at Scottsboro by the militia, were about to be taken outside prison walls for the first time in

Opinion in Town Where Case Will Be Reopened Monday Is That "Precaution" Is Needed.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., March 22 —Attorney General Thomas E Knight Jr. announced today that he will leve tomorrow for Decatur to discuss with Sheriff Davis of Morgan County the advisability of providing military protection for the Scottsboro Negroes, who will go on trial for their lives there Monday.

The Negroes—there are nine of them—are accused of attacking two white girls who were hoboing on a freight train bound from Chattanooga to Memphis, Tenn., nearly two years og. Eight of them were found guilty and sentenced to die in the electric chair under the Alabama laws, which decree that rape shall be punishable by death. The United State Supreme Court reversed the verdict and ordered new trials for all.

Mr. Knight, it was understood, was setill open-minded on the question of whether it would be necessary to Ask Governor Benjamin Meek Miller to order units of the State Militia to Decatur for the trials. He was said to feel that such action was unuecessary to protect the accused Negroes from mob violence, but before making a definite decision, he wished to consult the Sheriff regarding the security of the jail.

Sheriff Davis's deputies said last week that he was in favor of calling upon the Governor to provide military protection, not so much against violent outbreaks among the townsmen, but to prevent any jail break which might be attempted by the prisoners.

At the same time there was an undercurrent of opinion in Decatur that it would be as well to take all possible precautions and it was believed that the outcome of the Attorney General's conference with the Sheriff would be a request from one o rthe other for a military guard.

All the defendants are now in the Jefferson County Jail in Birmingham for "safe-keeping," pending their second trial. Eight of them who have spent the last two years in the death house of Kilby Prison here, were moved last night, and the ninth, a juvenile who never was convicted, has been there all along.

Seven, who have been adjudged adults, will be placed on trial next week, although only Roy Wright, 15 years old, who was not convicted, was tried as a juvenile the first time.

Attorney General Knight did not prosecute the Negroes in the first trial, having entered the case only when lawyers for the International Labor Defense raised the question of the right of Negroes to serve on Alabama juries, in connection with an appeal which ultimately reached the Supreme Court.

Mr. Knight, who has been occupied for the past few days in defending an injunction suit designed to tie up $2,000,000 in outstanding State warrants, has had but little chance to familiarize himself with the issues in the Scottsboro case.

Although the injunction suit still is pending before the Alabama Supreme Court, Mr. Knight said he would be free tomorrow to leave and begin final preparations for the approaching trial. In addition to consulting with Sheriff Davis on measures of protection for the trial, he expects to interview Mrs. Victoria Price, one of the accusers of the Negroes. The other alleged victim of the attack, Ruby Bates, has disappeared.

nI the prosecution of the case Mr. Knight will be assisted by Solicitor Bailey of Jacpson County, who was the prosecutor i nthe first trial. Samuel S. Leibowitz of New York will be chief of defense counsel.

As soon as darkness fell, prison guards went to the death house and unlocked the eight separate cells one after the other. The eight Negroes had been told by G. W. Chamlee when he visited them last week that they were to be moved to another jail and they were not surprised at the unaccustomed action. The only time they have been permitted outside their cells has been on the twice-weekly occasions when they were taken to the shower rooms for baths.

A black prison van rolled up to the prison which is situated some distance outside this city. It was dark and the van could scarcely be seen from the highway running past the prison, but if it had been it would have occasioned no undue interest because the van often is there unloading prisoners and hardly a person in Montgomery outside of officials knew that the Scottsboro Negroes were being moved.

Under cover of armed prison guards riding in automobiles before and behind the van, the Negroes started on their 104-mile drive across the country to Birmingham shortly before 7 o'clock. It was estimated that the trip would take about three hours and a half and it was hoped that the prisoners would be delivered to the Jefferson County jail before 11 o'clock.

DECATUR CROWD ORDERLY

New York, N.Y.

Defendants Brought to Court From Birmingham for Preliminaries to New Trial.

WITNESSES PUT ON STAND

Four White Men Testify They Do Not Recall a Negro Juror but Deny Systematic Exclusion.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, March 27.—An orderly courtroom crowd saw nine Negroes, accused of a crime which the South regards as more heinous than murder, brought into court here today to stand trial for their lives, and listened apathetically as their lawyers tried to prove that Negroes are excluded from jury duty as effectively as though the law drew a color line.

Fourt white witnesses, fidgeting uncomfortably in their chairs facing Judge James E. Horton, who presided, admitted that for as long as they could remember they had not seen or heard of a Negro sitting upon a jury in Jackson County, where the defendants were indicted and convicted two years ago by juries composed entirely of white men.

One after another, however, they denied that the absence of members of the colored race was the result of a systematic scheme of exclusion, but one, J. S. Benson, editor of the Progressive Age, a Scottsboro weekly, said that it would be well night impossible to convince him that any but a white man possessed that "sound judgment" and "training in law and justice," which he regarded as essential for a "fair and impartial verdict."

"They'll all steal," he said once when Mr. Leibowitz sought to find why he rejected the idea of a Negro serving upon a jury in his county.

Unable to Name a Negro Juror.

Jeff Moody, chairman of the Jackson County Jury Commission, conceded that he could not name a single Negro whose name appeared on the jury roll of his county, which, according to census figures presented by Mr. Leibowitz, contains 666 Negroes of voting age out of an adult male population of 8,801.

Pressed for an explanation why the name of a certain Negro, who Mr. Leibowitz sought to show was qualified for service, had been passed over, Mr. Moody rubbed his nose, scratched his head and said "It was common talk in Scottsboro that he had had relations with his wife before he married her."

It was late in the afternoon just before the court, at 5:30 P. M. Central Time, declared a recess until tomorrow morning at 8:30 that Mr. Leibowitz called the first of some twenty Negro citizens of Jackson County, who, he contends, are qualified in every respect save the color of their skins to serve as triers of the facts in civil and criminal cases.

The witness was John Sanford, a 50-year-old father of a colored family of Scottsboro. He took his place in the witness chair diffidently with downcast eyes and answered questions regarding himself and colored men of his acquaintance in a voice that was barely audible. His cross-examination by Thomas E. Knight Jr., the Attorney General fighting to defend his State's jury system, was deferred until tomorrow, after Sanford had testified that he regarded himself and certain others of his race as fitted to act as jurors.

Law on Juror Qualifications.

The text of the Alabama statute describing the qualifications of jurymen is as follows:

"The jury board shall place on the jury roll and in the jury box the names of all male citizens of its county who are generally reputed to be hnoest and intelligent men andn are esteemed in its community for their integrity, good character and sound judgment; but no person must be selected who is under 21 or over 65 years of age or who is an habitual drunkard, or who, being aflicted with a permanent disease or physical weakness is unfit to discharge the duties of a juror; or cannot read English or who has ever been convicted of any offense involving moral turpitude. If a person cannot read English and has all the other qualifications prescribed herein and is a freeholder or householder his name may be placed on the jury roll and in the jury box."

The proceedings were late in getting under way. Court convened at 9 A. M. and adjourned after an hour's session that was as silent as a Quaker meeting when it was discovered that the defendants were not present and had not even left the jail in Birmingham, where they were being held for safekeeping.

Thirty National Guardsmen patrolled the lawns around the court house and its rickety adjoining jail which has been condemned as unfit for white prisoners. A fair crowd of about 500 lined the sidewalks near the jail, sprawled on the green lawns under budding trees. The crowd consisted of about an equal number of blacks and white and the blue denim overalls and cowhide boots of the countrymen was the most common costume. The younger men amused themselves by doing gymnastic stunts in a cow pasture across from the court house.

Nothing Threatening Develops.

There was nothing threatening in the demeanor of the crowd and when it was learned that the prisoners would not arrive until about 2 o'clock it dispersed to gather again in somewhat greater force after lunch. When the nine prisoners arrived just in time for the opening of the afternoon session there was not a sign of a hostile demonstratio. The patrol wagon in which they were transported from Birmingham to Decatur was followed and preceded by two carloads of Deputy Sheriffs armed with automatic shotguns.

The crowd which filled the 325 seats in the second-floor courtroom was silent as the nine Negroes, handcuffed together were marched into the courtroom to be unshackled and seated behind the table at which sat Mr. Leibowitz, G. W. Chamlee, Chattanooga attorney associated with their defense, and Joseph Brodsky, chief counsel to the International Labor defense, a Communist adjunct which led the fight resulting in the reversal by the United States Supreme Court of their original sentences of death.

All but one wore the blue denim overalls and jumpers which are the prison uniforms of Negro convicts. Roy Wright, the 15-year-old prisoner, who alone of the nine was not found guilty at the first trial in Scottsboro, wore civilian clothes. He swaggered with boyish pride as he sat down, carefully arranging the crease in his bell-bottomed trousers and adjusting the necktie knotted under his spotless white collar. He wore no jacket.

Negroes Joke Among Selves.

The Negroes were chatting and joking among themselves as Judge Horton called the court to order. One section of seats was reserved for Negroes and every seat was taken. The white spectators in the ohter three sections slaked their thirst with soda water and most of the minority wearing coats shed them as the proceedings opened.

Judge Horton, a Lincolnesque figure, settled back in his chair behind his high bench as Mr. Leibowitz delivered a diplomatic little speech thanking the officials of the State for their "unfailing courtesy" and expressing faith in the fairness of the "God-fearing people of Decatur and Morgan County."

Hands were cupped behind weather beaten ears as Mr. Leibowitz opened his fight to quash the indictments aganist the accused Negroes by citing ninteen allegations of discrimination on racial lines. Asking the court to permit him to produce proof of his statements, the New York criminal lawyer said:

"For twenty-five years past the officials of Jackson County have systematically refused and neglected to place the names of Negroes on the jury rolls although some 600 of them residing in that county are qualified to serve and are barred solely because they are members of the African race."

He annexed the affidavits of F. A. Mathews, the Rev. W. C. Crutcher and Robert James, all alleging systematic exclusion and listing qualified Negro citizens, to his motion to quash.

Attorney General Denies Charges.

Attorney General Knight answered with a denial that the Alabama statute prescribing the qualifications of jurors made any specific discrimination against Negroes as such and declared he would defend its administration. As he finished his Brief denial Mr. Leibowitz was on his feet. In a courtroom hush, he said:

"The State can't hide behind that law because it is not honestly administered. These Negroes as well as 40,000,000 others in the United States can only look to your honor to uphold the constitution of the United States and give it force even as that great President of ours, Franklin D. Roosevelt has sworn to do."

Mr. Knight continued:

"The statutes do not work an effective discrimination against Negroes and the courts have so held. The State will show further that there has been no such administration of the law as would justify the conclusion that Negroes are systematically excluded from jury service because of color."

Mr. Leibowitz asked whether Mr Knight denied that no Negroes had served as jurors in Jackson County in more than two decades.

"Prove it," challenged the Attorney General.

This Mr. Leibowitz sought to do. The rotund sheriff, Bud Davis, called off the names of about thirty witnesses who had been subpoenaed by the opposing lawyers. They gathered inside the rail that separates the spectators from attorney's and defendants and with upraised hands all swore together to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth."

Mr. Benson was the first witness called by the defense. As editor of The Progressive Age, Mr. Benson said he had been in almost daily attendance at the court in Scottsboro during the greater part of the thirty years he has lived there. His examination began in this fashion:

"Have you ever known the name of a Negro to be placed upon the jury roll of Jackson County or have you ever heard of one being called upon to serve as a juror?", asked Mr. Leibowitz.

"Never heard of one—Never noticed one," replied Mr. Benson, smiling apologetically toward the table at which sat Mr. Knight, his chief assistant, Thomas E. Lawson, and the solicitors respectively of Jackson and Morgan Counties, J. G. Bailey and Wade Wright.

Witness Bridles at Objection.

Mr. Benson said that he could not tell of his own knowledge whether the present jury roll contained the names of any Negroes. He bristled angrily when Mr. Knight demanded when he had talked matters over with Mr. Chamlee and explained, in answer to an objecetion from Mr. Leibowitz, that he was trying to show that "the witness was biased."

"All right," said Mr. Benson, if you are trying to show bias, I'll just make a statement that so far as I know there are no Negroes on the jury roll."

The courtroom joined Mr. Leibowitz in the laughter which followed and the defense attorney resumed his examination. He asked if out of the 666 Negroes between the ages of 21 and 65 there were not some suited to serve on juries.

"I know some good Negroes as far as Negroes go," said Mr. Benson. But I think that sound judgment part of the statute—I think they can't get around that. But we have some good Negroes—As many as anywhere else.

Mr. Benson said that he knew of no Negro doctors in Jackson County except "one quack that we put in jail," and he declared that in his belief the Negro preacher whom he knew best was lacking in "sound judgment."

"What do you mean?" demanded Mr. Leibowitz.

"In the first place," replied the weekly editor, "I don't think Negroes have been trained for jury duty. I might say the same thing about women but I know Negroes haven't been trained. You could not depend on their judgment. They haven't made a study of justice and law and such."

Says Negroes Lack Training.

"Would you make a general statement," demanded Mr. Leibowitz, "that no Negro is qualified to sit on a jury, that they have not the sound judgment required by law?"

"I don't believe there are any Negroes in our county that I'd care to risk in any case whic hinvolved justice and law. Some have the education and they might have character, but they would not have all the qualifications."

It developed from further examination that jurymen in Jackson County derive the "training" which results in sound judgment from "attending court, listening to cases and discussing public questions at the country store and at cross roads all the time."

"Do you know any Negro merchant?" Mr. Liebowitz continued.

"Well, there's Bud Moore, he has a little store."

"Is he honest?"

"I don't know. I never heard that he wasn't. But he would not do."

"Why, because he is a Negro? Isn't that it?" demanded Mr. Liebowitz.

"Because he never studied jury duty a day in his life," replied the witness.

None Wants to Serve, He Says.

Mr. Benson said something to the effect that no Negroes in Jackson County "want to be jurors," and at the defense lawyer's request, Judge Horton ordered the remark stricken from the record. Mr. Benson, it developed, knew another Negro, Abe Joseph, who was honest, intelligent, the head of a family and not suffering from any permanent diseases. But the editor said, shaking his head:

"I don't think he'd know anything about jury duty."

"So you'd exclude him, too," asked Mr. Liebowitz. "On what grounds?"

"That he is lacking in sound judgment."

Later Mr. Benson conceded that the Negro in question was "pretty intelligent for a Negro," that he was a "decent, law-abiding citizen, well-though of in his community." He just had not had the necessary training, Mr. Benson asserted, and an objection from the defense saved him the necessity of answering whether an otherwise qualified Negro was not as suitable material for jury duty as "a white man called for the first time," or "an illiterate teamster from the backwoods."

Moody, the next witness, declared that he could not recall any Negro jurors, but he denied that he inquired into the color of a citizen in preparing the jury rolls. Under examination by Mr. Liebowitz on his knowledge of the law he is called upon to administer, Mr. Moody ventured the opinion that the kind of disease mentioned in the statute as disqualifying a juror, was "contagious disease," but that "consumption" would not exclude him.

Discrimination Is Denied.

John Hunt Stuart, a member of the commission which prepared the roll from which the grand jury which indicted the nine Negroes was chosen, was the next witness.

He could not recall whether the list contained the names of any Negroes he said, but he confessed that he never had seen a Negro in the jury box at Scottsboro at any time.

"I don't know of any time when there were Negroes on juries there," he said, "but I am 48 years old and I never served myself. I don't know whether I could make the qualifications."

"Did you exclude any Negro because of his color?" demanded Mr. Knight in cross-examination.

"Not that I know of," said the witness.

"It was a matter of selection rather than exclusion!" suggested the Attorney General.

"Yes, sir, selection," replied Stuart.

"Isn't it a fact that there are more white men disqualified to serve on juries in Jackson County than the total Negro population," pursued Mr. Knight.

Mr. Leibowitz objected, but Judge Horton let the witness answer that such was the case.

Resuming his cross-examination, Mr. Leibowitz asked Mr. Stuart whether he had ever excluded a Negro from service because of any of the disqualifying clauses in the statute.

"No," said Mr. Stuart. "The matter never was discussed."

"Did you ever personally examine a Negro for jury service?"

"No, the matter was never discussed."

Kelly Morgan, clerk of the Jackson County Jury Commission, testified that he knew of no instance of a Negro serving on a Jackson County jury, and then Mr. Leibowitz called the first of his long string of Negro witnesses.

DECATUR, Ala., Mar 28.—Just before court adjourned today, the prosecution arraigned Haywood Patterson on the indictment charging "rape" of Ruby Bates, and announced that it would arraign the remaining six together under the indictment charging attack on Victoria Price. Eugene Williams and Roy Wright were excluded from the arraignment on the ground that the State wants time to investigate their ages. No sooner had the indictment against Patterson been read than defense lawyers filed notice that they will move to quash indictment on the ground that no Negroes were in the jury box from which Judge Horton has picked 100 prospective jurors.

Arguments on the defense motion will begin Thursday, when the selection of the jury of 12 will begin. There will be no session of court tomorrow. The question of separate or mass trials is still to be settled.

DECATUR, Ala., March 28. Without granting an opportunity for argument, Judge Horton, presiding at the second trial of the Scottsboro boys, at the opening of the afternoon session today, summarily denied the defense motion to quash the indictment against the defendants.

The motion was based on the defense contention—supported by a number of Negro witnesses—that Negroes are systematically excluded from jury service in Alabama and that not a single Negro was allowed on the grand jury which indicted the innocent Scottsboro boys.

The prosecution contended Negroes are not barred from jury duty in Alabama, but that none ever qualified. In the midst of arguments Judge Horton announced he had reached a decision. "The motion is denied," he said.

Leibowitz, defense counsel head declared he believed the court "has committed a reversible error." An appeal to the State Supreme Court probably will be taken, he said.

In the meantime, while the prosecution sought to prove that no discrimination exists against Negroes in relation to jury service, the courtroom itself presented living evidence of the whole system of white ruling class oppression.

Like yesterday, scores of Negroes filled the courtroom, but they were jim-crowed in benches set separately for them. Two Negro newspapermen were not permitted to sit at the regular tables reserved for the press, but were also jim-crowed.

To Continue Fight

Early in this afternoon's session the defense had won an important legal point when Judge Horton granted the motion of Attorney Liebowitz to subpoena the guardian of the Jackson County rolls of the Scottsboro from which the Scottsboro grand jury was picked, as well as the guardian of the jury boxes from which the jury men in the first frame-up trial were picked.

The ILD lawyer said that he would call—if necessary—all those listed on the rolls to prove that not a single Negro was called for jury service.

Negroes Testify On Jury System

The defense questioning of witnesses aimed to prove the systematic exclusion of Negroes from Alabama juries was followed by the cross-examination of John Sanford, a Negro, whom ILD lawyers had placed on the stand. Prosecutor Knight addressed him paternally as "John," at the same time seeking to bulldoze him. Attorney Liebowitz for the defense sprung to his feet and demanded: "Call him Mr. Sanford, Attorney-General." Knight replied, "I am not doing that."

The Negro witness retained his composure throughout, despite the continual bullying by the prosecutor. At one time Liebowitz leaped up to demand that Knight "remain at a distance" and keep his finger "out of people's eyes."

"Even If It Takes 15 Years"

By questioning Sanford and three other Negro members of the Jackson County school board, the defense showed indisputably that Negroes were not permitted to serve on juries. The defense declared that if the prosecution does not want to admit this point "we will bring every living man in the county into court if it takes 15 years to prove it."

A vicious pamphlet entitled, "The Unpublished Inside Story of the Infamous Scottsboro case," written by J. Glean Jordan, city editor of the Huntsville Times was being sold in front of the courtroom today.

Denounces Slanders

Demanding that Judge Horton order the arrest of the writer and hold him in contempt of court, Liebowitz declared: "This is a damnable, contemptible attempt to inflame the minds of the jurors. If it were not for the International Labor Defense these boys would now be dead."

At the same time the ILD attorney demanded the court order the arrest of the printer of the pamphlet, Edward White of Huntsville. The judge granted his request, in view of the obviously vicious character of the pamphlet.

Reads from Pamphlet

The ILD lawyer in denouncing the pamphlet as a slander on the ILD read the last paragraph which referred to the European tour of Mrs. Wright, mother of two of the defendants, and concluded with the lying declaration that the "Communists will make the last grand-stand play in behalf of the Negroes in order to win new members and enrich their coffers, and then Alabama and the world will finally see justice claim its own—will see the Negroes receive their just desert—death in the electric chair!"

The court confiscated the pamphlet which two boys were selling outside the courthouse. Attorney General Knight was enraged, declaring that he and the judge were receiving "hundreds of protests and nobody has tried to deprive these defendants of a fair trial. In retaliation, he threatened to submit what he described as "ILD red protest leaflets, etc."

Vol. 16, No. 14

After the two years which have elapsed since their alleged crime the nine Scottsboro Negroes accused of rape are being brought to trial by the State of Alabama. During the first trial, which took place amid passionate emotion and racial bigotry, eight of the Negroes were convicted and sentenced to die in the electric chair; the United States Supreme Court, however, intervened and ordered a new trial. The elements involved in the second trial, which will be held at Decatur, are complicated, and no less so are the currents of popular opinion. Alabama, which in one or two recent cases involving Negroes has officially shown a disposition to rise above race prejudice, still seethes with dislike of the "outsiders" who come down from the North to defend these boys; injected into the situation is the prevailing animosity toward communism. Yet the International Labor Defense, whatever its earlier errors, has rallied vigorously and today constitutes perhaps the chief legal hope of the accused. The case is celebrated in much the same way as the Sacco-Vanzetti case, because a host of unbiased investigators have concluded that the whole affair was a rank frame-up on the conventional Jim Crow lines. Not a little appears to hinge upon the recent disappearance of Ruby Bates, one of the alleged victims; a hard-fought question will be centered in her previous testimony, which the defense will insist must be ruled out and which the prosecution will of course undertake to preserve.

While the Scottsboro Negroes are facing a grave crisis along with Alabama justice itself, Tom Mooney's friends have injected a surprise into this second cause célèbre. Mooney was convicted on one indictment, but a second one was dropped. A new trial has now been granted on the old untried indictment, and this will afford a golden opportunity for Mooney's defenders to bring out the striking falsehoods, inconsistencies and prejudice which ruled over his first farcical trial, as well as to arouse public opinion anew to the incredible miscarriage of justice that has made Mooney's name known around the world, to the shame of the American legal system. Foes of freedom for Mooney are now complaining that the new trial will be nothing but a stage setting, with the outcome foreknown. But if this is true, what could be a sterner indictment of the hypocrisy and political chicanery that have, from the first, characterized this unsavory episode?

A CRIMINAL TRIAL

Advertiser 3-27-33 Montgomery, Ala.

The Scottsboro case will be called for retrial today in Decatur.

"This," says The Birmingham News, "is going to be an unpleasant ordeal for Alabama. Under the best possible circumstances a thing of this kind is bad enough. In this instance an unpleasant situation has been aggravated by elements which should not have entered into it. Alabama has been viciously maligned in connection with the affair by unscrupulous agitators who have been more interested in creating propaganda for radical causes than in seeing justice done. This had been unfair and it has been hard to bear with patience."

But, reminds The News, "For its part, Alabama's sole interest is in seeing justice done."

This should be borne in mind by Alabamians.

They need not be reminded that this is a criminal trial which sole purpose is to decide the innocence or guilt of the prisoners.

There is no racial question involved.

The question of capital punishment does not enter the case.

The wisdom of such heavy punishment for the charged crimes is not on trial.

The State of Alabama and its people are not on trial.

The Scottsboro case is strictly a criminal case and as such is held in open court with the world looking on to see that justice is done.

Army Guard Demanded at Attack Trial

By TOM CASSIDY.
(Staff Correspondent of The News)

DECATUR, Ala., March 26—On the eve of the re-trial of the world-famous Scottsboro case, now making a new chapter in the history of colored Americans, the defense of the seven colored youths accused of attacks ~~on two~~ white girls sprang a surprise tonight by threatening to call on President Roosevelt for protection of witnesses.

Invoking the famous Fifteenth Amendment, which grants equal rights to white and colored citizens, Samuel S. Leibowitz of New York, chief counsel for the defense, declared colored witnesses have been intimidated. He added he would formally request the White House to protect them tomorrow, unless conditions here change.

Samuel S. Leibowitz

Ultimatum Causes Sensation.

The defense ultimatum caused a sensation here because the Fifteenth Amendment never has been enforced in Alabama. Leibowitz said he would demand Federal enforcement by force of arms, if such a step proves necessary.

Leibowitz has scheduled witnesses who will testify that, although they are eligible for jury duty, they have been excluded from service in this case because they are colored.

These witnesses, the attorney charges, have been told it will be "unhealthy" for them to give this testimony on the stand in the ancient yellow brick courthouse here tomorrow.

Leibowitz made his announcement when he learned local authorities intend to have thirty Alabama National Guardsmen on duty at the courthouse when the session opens.

"Unofficial Jury" Feared.

The local officials took this action because they declared the International Labor Defense and other radical organizations intended to have a formidable "unofficial jury" of white and colored men and women assemble in the neighborhood of the courthouse.

The Morgan County courthouse where the seven defendants are to go on a second trial for their lives—those guilty of attacks on women are executed in this State—fronts on a spacious green lawn. And here groups with bitterly hostile convictions about this case will assemble when court opens.

The defense's most spectacular weapon is a replica of the slow and easy freight train on which Ruby Bates and Victoria Price, two girls in overalls, say they were attacked by twelve colored men in the dusk of March 25, 1931.

Story Told by Girls.

The girls' story, told at the first trial of the colored youths at Scottsboro, near where the supposed crime occurred, was to the effect that the dozen youngsters attacked them after chasing a group of white boys from the gondola car in which they were riding.

Of the twelve accused by the two young women, one of whom, the Bates girl, is reported missing on the eve of the second trial, three left the train before the other nine and the two girls were taken into custody at Paint Rock, near Scottsboro, after the disgruntled white youths had given the alarm.

Two of the remaining nine claim to be under 16 and therefore are subject to trial in the juvenile court, and the seven who face a second battle for their lives tomorrow do so by virtue of a United States Supreme Court decision.

Miniature Train Donates.

The miniature train, which Leibowitz induced the Lionel Corporation of New York to donate to the defense of the penniless defendants, will be used to contradict prosecution testimony in the first case. The defense will seek to show that it was impossible for the twelve accused colored youths to have been in the gondola, or open car, during the period and in the manner testified to.

The prosecution is being handled by Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., whose father wrote the opinion in the original case, which was reversed by the Federal Supreme Court.

Absence Of Ruby Bates May Delay Scottsboro Negroes' Trial At Decatur

DECATUR, ALA., March 26.—(AP)—Whereabouts of a missing witness tonight caused speculation [illegible] the probability of beginning tomorrow new trials for seven negroes indicted in the "Scottsboro attack case," who once were under sentence of death.

Speculation of the [illegible] of [illegible], one of the two alleged victims of the attack aboard a Southern Railway [illegible] train as it rumbled through [illegible] Mountains in Jackson County on March 25, 1931, overshadowed the pending motion to quash the indictments.

The girl who also is the alleged author of a letter repudiating her testimony in the first trials two years ago has been missing from her home in Huntsville since Feb. 27, and officers thus far have been unable to find a trace of her.

Mrs. Mary Bates, who confirmed street rumors that the girl was missing 10 days after she disappeared, told officers she believed her daughter kidnaped and did not report to police because she feared harm would befall

Meanwhile, Victoria Price, other victim of the alleged attacks has repeatedly asserted that her testimony in the first trial was true and that through fear that harm would befall her, she had remained in her home at Huntsville at night, and went on the streets during the day time only when she was accompanied.

The motion to quash the indictments that must be disposed of tomorrow before any other proceedings can be undertaken was filed at Scottsboro on March 6 when the cases were called in Jackson Circuit Court for retrial.

The action of Judge A. E. Hawkins, original trial judge who passed sentence of death on the negroes nearly two years ago, in granting a change of venue automatically transferred the motion to the Morgan County Circuit Court for disposition.

Judge James H. Horton who will preside over the new trials will rule on the motion before any other steps are taken. The motion alleges that absence of negroes from the Grand Jury returning the indictments deprived the defendants of their constitutional rights.

A resolution urging a [illegible] change of venue in the trial of seven negroes on charges of attack in the "Scottsboro cases" bringing the trial from Decatur to Birmingham, was adopted at a mass meeting at Birmingham today, attended largely by negroes.

Adoption of the resolution followed several talks by speakers of both races in which justice and a fair hearing were urged upon officials connected with trial of the charges against the negroes.

Speakers included Dr. Henry M. Edmonds, pastor of the Independent Presbyterian Church of Birmingham and Chairman of the Alabama Interracial Commission; Dr. Kenneth E. Barnhart, professor of sociology at Birmingham-Southern College; Dr. Ernest W. Taggart, president of the Birmingham branch, National Association for Advancement of Colored People; Rabbi Benjamin Goldstein, of Montgomery; and Allen Taub, of New York, a member of the defense counsel for the seven negroes.

TO ASK NEW SCENE FOR NEGROES' TRIAL

Defense Attorneys Will Move That the Scottsboro Case Be Taken to Birmingham.

DECATUR FEELING FEARED

Lawyers, Meeting in Chattanooga Map a Fresh Campaign to Quash the Indictments.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., March 8.—Attorneys defending the nine Negroes for whom the United States Supreme Court ordered new trials after they had been condemned to death for an attack on two white girls on a freight train passing through Jackson County, Ala., two years ago, met here today and planned their campaign of action.

Although Circuit Judge A. E. Hawkins granted their motion for a change of venue and selected Decatur, in Morgan County, as the place for the new trial, the defense attorneys were not satisfied at the outcome of the hearing in Scottsboro, where the first trial was held under conditions which the highest court in the United States held to have been unfair.

Irving Schwab, the young New York attorney whom the International Labor Defense sent here to cooperate with George W. Chamlee, former Chattanooga prosecutor, in preparing the defense, indicated tonight that an attempt would be made by him and his colleagues to reopen the hearing on the motion for a change of venue to permit the introduction of evidence of prejudice against the defendants, even in Morgan County.

The chief objection of the defense to Decatur as the place of trial is that, like Scottsboro, it is a rural centre, and that it will be necessary to surround the court house with militiamen as was done in the first trial, held two weeks after the alleged attack on Ruby Bates and the thrice-married Victoria Price.

This could be avoided, Mr. Schwab contended, by transferring the trial to Birmingham, the seat of Jefferson County, where there is adequate police protection and where the detention cells are in the same building as the court room.

Racial Feeling to Be Cited.

Should Judge Hawkins consent to a rehearing of the argument, the defense attorneys will present evidence to show that feeling against the Negroes is almost as strong in the county selected for their trial as it was and is in Jackson County. Morgan County is contiguous to Madison County, where Huntsville, the home of Miss Bates and Mrs. Price, is located.

A date has yet to be set for the new trial, although Circuit Judge Horton, who probably will preside, has indicated a willingness to convene a special session of court at the earliest date satisfactory to counsel.

Attorney General Thomas E. Knight said over the telephone from Montgomery today that he believed the State could be ready by March 20. The defense group, which is planning several preliminary skirmishes, showed less desire for speed.

The prisoners, with the exception of Roy Wright, now a prisoner in Birmingham, are in the State Penitentiary at Montgomery, and they probably will remain there until the day before they go on trial for the second time. Their arraignment for pleading will be delayed until the last minute before the trial opens for the sake of safety and order.

Mr. Knight said today that he didn't want to have the militia called out for the arraignment alone and did not want to risk transporting the prisoners back and forth between Montgomery and Decatur more than once.

Meanwhile, the defense attorneys are planning an active campaign. It is their intention, in support of a motion to quash the indictments, to summon witnesses to testify that qualified Negroes were barred from service on the grand jury which indicted the nine accused men.

Law on Jurors Quoted.

This motion, originally filed with Judge Hawkins, was passed on for decision by the judge who will preside at the trial. Although Negroes never serve on juries here, it is the contention of the defense that the law intends that they should.

Section 1806 of the Alabama Code, defining the qualifications of jurors, says:

"The Jury Commission shall place on the jury roll and in the jury box the names of all male citizens of the county who are generally reputed to be honest and intelligent men and are esteemed in the community for their integrity, good character and sound judgment, but no person must be selected who is under 21, over 65 years of age, or who is an habitual drunkard, or who, being afflicted with a permanent disease or physical weakness, is unfit to discharge the duties of a juror, or who cannot read English, or who has ever been convicted of any offense involving moral turpitude.

"If a person cannot read English and has all the other qualifications described herein and is a freeholder or householder, his name may be placed on the jury roll and in the jury box."

Two other motions will deal with the cases of two of the prisoners who were only 13 years old when they were arrested. These are the Wright boy and Eugene Williams, the latter one of those originally sentenced to die by the verdict of the jury. Under the Alabama law a jury may prescribe the punishment as well as decide the guilt or innocence of persons accused of rape, which is only one of several capital offenses under the statutes of the State.

The defense will demand that Wright and Williams be tried in a juvenile court.

Separate Trials Demanded.

All the Negroes found on the freight train when it was stopped by an armed posse just outside of Scottsboro on the night of March 25, 1931, when the attack is supposed to have taken place, were indicted jointly, but the defense will demand that each be tried separately, as was not done in the first trial.

It was pointed out by one of the defense attorneys that four of the Negroes were in different box cars from that occupied by the girls.

At the first trial none of the prisoners admitted his own guilt, but in several cases pointed an accusing finger at one or more of his companions. Since then those who gave testimony against their fellow defendants have repudiated that testimony with the explanation that they were afraid that if they didn't testify as the "white folks" wished they would be shot down in the court room.

In this connection a passage from an affidavit by Clarence Norris, one of th[illegible]ners, is regarded as significant. After denying that he saw any "white girls in overalls" on the train, he said in an affidavit forming part of the record submitted to the Supreme Court:

"I was slapped and kicked and told that if I did not tell that the other Negro boys who were arrested had something to do with those white girls, that they would kill me; that they would shoot me down in the court house."

Although it has been [illegible] since the Supreme Co[illegible] the death sentence im[illegible] eight who were convic[illegible] still held in death cells [illegible] not even their parents [illegible] yers, is allowed to tal[illegible] except in the presence [illegible] or prison official.

Parents Live in Poverty.

Mr. Chamlee said he would insist upon private interviews with the prisoners before trial as a vital necessity in preparing the defense.

In Chattanooga's Negro district, under conditions of the most direst poverty, live the parents of four of the accused youths. They are Mamie Williams, mother of Eugene Williams; Ada Wright, widowed mother of Andy and Roy Wright and Mr. and Mrs. Claude Patterson, mother of Haywood Patterson.

All have become ardent converts to communism since the International Labor Defense came to the aid of their boys. They read a Communist newspaper regularly and are helping to organize their neighbors in support of the cause.

Sitting before a coal grate in her two-room cabin, which she rents for $1 a week, Mrs. Williams said it had been so long since she had seen her son that she could not remember just when it was.

Her husband deserted her after the "Scottsboro trouble," and she is having difficulty providing food and shelter for herself and her six children, the youngest a babe in arms.

"The rent man has been here today," she said, "and he took away my back porch and tried to carry off my kitchen. Things is awful bad, but if my boy gets off, everything's going to be all right."

Landlords, it should be explained, find direct action more economical and effective than lawsuits in ejecting tenants who fall behind in the payment of their rent for the little cabins.

Mrs. Williams said her son Eugene never had been in trouble before "except once he was arrested for staying out late" and once for stealing a bicycle, which, she added quickly, he didn't really steal.

Mother "Sassed" Officers.

According to her, a friend of her son stole the bicycle and was in her backyard when the police caught up with him.

"I sassed the officers and they says to me, 'You wait, we'll fix you,' and I didn't know what they meant until the next thing my boy was doing eleven months in the jail."

Mrs. Wright, who is still bubbling over with reminiscent pleasure over her expedition to Europe on a tour financed by the International Labor Defense to win sympathy from labor groups abroad, had just finished baking two cocoanut cakes to send to her boys.

She, too, insisted that neither of them had been in trouble before, and she declared that she had seen the Bates girl in Chattanooga, her arms full of packages, on Feb. 28, the day after she is said to have disappeared.

"I knowed her right away because I saw her in court at one of the hearings after the trial," Mrs. Wright explained.

Claude Patterson was downtown conferring with Mr. Chamlee about his son's defense this afternoon. His wife had just received a letter from her son in prison and she was happy, because he said he was well and had no complaints to make about his treatment there. She, too, declared that her son had always been a good boy.

None of the parents attended the first trial. They admit that they were afraid even to think about it.

"Land's sakes," said Mrs. Pattersen, "I was afraid even to show my face outside the house in those days."

Something of the atmosphere that ervaded the court room in Scottsoro when the Negroes were placed n trial is shown in the transcript f the proceedings at the opening, when the question of counsel to defend them was being discussed.

Stephen Roddy, a Chattanooga attorney, appeared and explained that he was there not as a paid attorney, but because people "who are interested in them have spoken to me about it."

"I would like to appear voluntarily with local counsel of the bar your honor appoints, on account of friends that are interested in this case," said Mr. Roddy. "I would like to appear with counsel your honor appoints."

Judge Hawkins replied:

"You don't appear if I appoint counsel."

"I would not like your honor to rule me out of it," Mr. Roddy said.

"If you appear for these defendants," returned the judge, "then I will not appoint counsel. If local counsel are willing to appear and assist you under the circumstances, all right, but I will not appoint them."

Mr. Roddy inquired:

"Your Honor has appointed counsel—Is that correct?"

Judge Hawkins replied:

"I appointed all the members of the bar for the purpose of arraigning the defendants, and then, of course, I anticipated them to continue and help them if no counsel appears."

Judge Gave Right to Aid.

Mr. Roddy's answer was:

"Then I don't appear as counsel, but I do want to stay in and not be ruled out of this case."

"Of course I would not do that," Judge Hawkins assured him.

"Just appear through the courtesy of your honor."

"Of course," said Judge Hawkins, "I give you that right. Well, are you willing to assist?"

At this point in the colloquy, which went on before the prospective jurors, a lawyer named Parks, one of those assigned by the court, rose up and protested against the assignment of counsel by the court unless it was clear that no other counsel had been retained.

He declared that he could be induced to take the case only by the "high sense of duty I owe the State and not to these defendants."

The outcome was that Milo Moody, 70-year-old veteran of the [illegible] bar, finally consented to "go ahead and help do anything I can do."

The only defense witnesses called to the stand were the defendants themselves.

Alabama Cries for the Blood of the Scottsboro Boys

Amsterdam

Birmingham

IN AN INTERVIEW last week ~~with a daily news-paper~~ reporter, Gov. Benjamin Meek Miller of Alabama defended the laws of his state and their administration and promised the Scottsboro boys protection from lynch mobs and a square deal when they are again placed on trial. "Constantly," the reporter also wrote in his article, "it is iterated that the Negroes will receive a fair trial, YET NOWHERE IS THERE THE SLIGHTEST DOUBT THAT THEY WILL BE CONVICTED A SECOND TIME BECAUSE NOWHERE IS THERE ANY DOUBT OF THEIR GUILT."

THUS, IT IS MADE QUITE CLEAR that a square deal in Alabama—at Scottsboro, or Decatur, to which city a change of venue has been granted, or at Birmingham, which is about the only city in the state where the International Labor Defense believes it has a ghost of a chance—presupposes a guilty verdict for the defendants.

WHILE GOV. MILLER WAS DEFENDING the administration of the law in his state, sitting in his office in the Capitol at Montgomery (the first capital of the Confederacy and where Jefferson Davis was inaugurated President), he proved conclusively that there is no such thing as justice in Alabama for the Negro. In the two years he has been governor there have been ten persons put to death in the electric chair at Kilby Penitentiary, and all ten were colored. At least one colored person was lynched in the state last year and several persons have been ruthlessly shot down by posses led by white deputy sheriffs, including Negro farmers, whose only offense was to form an organization for the purpose of getting the fruits of their own labor.

NOT ONLY IS THERE NO JUSTICE in the State of Alabama for the black man, all movements from the outside looking towards that end are strenuously resented and fought. In the Scottsboro case the attempt of the Communists and the International Labor Defense to see that justice is done has not received the co-operation of white people of the state. Instead, it has served to arouse in them a determination to put the boys to death at any cost. The conservative element of Negroes in Birmingham recently petitioned the principal authorities of the state and city for protection from the merciless treatment they are receiving from police authorities and suggested that this protection would be a means of curbing the Communistic sentiment, which is growing at an alarming rate. We quote from this petition:

"We wish to call your attention to the inroads being made among people of this city and state, white and colored, by the insidious propaganda for Communism which we are being called upon to curb and looked to for resistance . . ., but we find ourselves handicapped on every hand because the 'red propagandists' use the very things herein pointed out to attract followers and to create and incite mob violence. . . . This radical organization . . . knows no color line, and wherever it finds it possible it breeds upon the grievances of a discontented people."

AND YET, IF THE I. L. D. or some other outside organization had not gone to the defense of the Scottsboro boys they would surely have been put to death. Gov. Miller admitted that he has received over fifteen thousand communications from radical and labor organizations throughout the world protesting against the injustice of the Scottsboro verdicts, but he pointed out with pride that scarcely any of these protests came from persons or organizations in his state or in the South, for that matter. These protests he looks upon as an effort to intimidate the courts of his "fair" state. The reversal of the case by the United States Supreme Court is looked upon, not as an opportunity to correct the injustice which has been done but as a decision which hurts the "prestige" of the Alabama Supreme Court, which upheld the convictions. When the boys are placed on trial a new set of convictions must be anticipated. We have already seen to what length the defense attorneys had to go to get copies of the Ruby Bates letter, in which she wrote that the boys were innocent of the charges; but if she had confirmed their guilt the letter would have been surrendered with keen delight. Alabama cries aloud for blood! Black blood! The blood of the Scottsboro boys.

ALL OF THIS IS WRITTEN in an effort to bring home to the Negro in Harlem and elsewhere the fact that the Scottsboro fight is his fight and that no sacrifice is too great for him to make in saving the lives of these defendants. Their defense must not be deserted until every means of saving them is exhausted. It is the fight of the Negro everywhere for his life against legal lynchings in the courts of the South, and he must win it. Otherwise, the evils of this iniquitous system are bound to project themselves into the North and other places now partially free of them.

Defense Lawyers in First Private Interview; Change of Trial to Birmingham to Be First Motion: Negro Witnesses terrorized

BULLETIN

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., March 26.—With hundreds turned away, more than 1,000 jammed the First Congregational Church at a mass meeting here today called by the City Committee on the Scottsboro Case.

New York

DECATUR, Ala., March 26.—A demand that the Scottsboro trial scene will be moved from here to Birmingham will be the first move of defense attorneys when the case opens here tomorrow, attorneys for the International Labor Defense announced today.

The defense will then make a motion to quash the indictment on the ground that Negroes—although eligible for jury service—were not called on the grand jury that handed down the indictments against the innocent Negro boys.

This will be in the form of a preliminary hearing before the actual trial begins—with the selection of the jury and the taking of testimony. The boys will not be brought to court from the jail until the actual selection of the jury begins.

Just how long the hearing will last is not certain, depending on how many witnesses the defense succeeds in bringing to Decatur in the face of widespread intimidation and threats of retaliation against many Negroes from Jackson County who are being called by the defense to testify. Some of these witnesses will take the stand and swear that despite the fact that they are freeholders and property owners and possess other qualifications required by the Alabama law, that they have never been called to serve either on the grand or petit jury. Incidentally, Negroes comprise ont-third of the population of Jackson County.

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., March 26.—Lawyers for the International Labor Defense today held their first private interview with the Scottsboro boys, exactly two years—to a day—after they were arrested on a framed-up "rape" charge.

The boys, peaked and thin from the long months of imprisonment, filed into the bertillon (fingerprinting, etc.) room especially prepared for the interview. For four whole hours, in the presence of the writer, each boy in turn related to their lawyers details of the frame-up and the brutal treatment they have received since they were first jailed.

All bore scars, attesting to vicious and brutal beatings. Some had their teeth knocked out, others showed knife stabs and lacerations of the scalp inflicted with blunt instruments.

Tell of Beatings.

The Negro boys gave their lawyers detailed descriptions of beatings in Scottsboro, Adrsden and Kilby prisons. "We were told several times," they said, "that we would burn in the electric chair in ninety days if we didn't drop the I. L. D. and take up with the N. A. A. C. P. (National Association for the Advancement of Colored People), but we know we are innocent, and the I. L. D. is our friend, and has fought for us, and will not go back on us."

Continuous efforts have been made to get them to turn state's evidence against each other, the defense attorneys were told.

NEW YORK.—Hailing the International Labor Defense in its militant defense of the nine innocent Scottsboro boys, hundreds of workers, responding to an appeal sent out together with 100 "Save the Scottsboro Boys" penny stamps now being circulated throughout the country by the thousands, are sending warm appreciations along with their contributions. Typical of these is a letter received recently by the Scottsboro New Trial Emergency Fund of the I.L.D. from a worker in Raleigh, N. C.:

"Dear sirs: Enclosed please find check for $2, which I should like you to accept as a small contribution to the defense fund of the Scottsboro boys.

"I cannot close this letter without thanking you for the courageous defense of those unfortunate boys. Through your effort the case has been taken out of the category of a mere trial in which a colored man's life is at stake. The issue which you have raised is whether human justice shall prevail not only in Alabama but throughout the United States. The 12 millions of colored people in this country as well as the other minority groups must forever be grateful to you. May your organization continue fearlessly to defend the rights of the oppressed."

This is one of the many Negro workers whose eyes have been opened by the heroic struggle of the millions of workers throughout the world led by the I.L.D. and its sympathetic organizations. In order to carry on the struggle and prepare the appeal from the vicious lynch verdict of Haywood Patterson, funds are needed desperately by the Scottsboro New Trial Emergency Fund of the I.L.D., 80 East 11th St., New York City.

Decatur Jury's Verdict in the Scottsboro Case

By Jacob Grossman.

THE verdict in the trial of the first of the Scottsboro defendants, Haywood Patterson, bids to become another of America's famous miscarriages of justice. From the very start it was evident that the defendants have little to do with the case—in fact, without the testimony of one witness there was no case.

These nine Negroes picturesquely portray their actual position. Unknowingly, seemingly uncaring, they were made symbols in a far greater case—one in which Alabama itself, with its barbarous lynchings, inhuman chain gangs, the K. K. K. and virtual slavery of black and white alike, is compelled to prove its right to existence. Also on trial are the American people, whose apathy is astounding and which permits the carrying out of such high-handed methods.

The editors of the World-Telegram can do very well in awakening the inert sense of justice of the public by leading the fight against the execution of the Scottsboro boys.

New York.

By Norman Neblett.

Justice and law and order have triumphed in Alabama. Twelve "men good and true" have upheld the noble tradition of the South. The chastity of Southland's daughters must be preserved.

But it seems to me that, much as we sneer at Alabama, she stands not alone guilty of this perversion of justice. Congressmen and Presidents and forty-seven other States stand convicted of collusion; they stand in the prisoners' dock guilty of being accessories after the fact. Only a few weeks past we heard the cry of "Lynch him! Lynch him!" raised against a black man in the streets of Brooklyn. Our Congressmen, pleading the lame excuse of States' rights, remain mute before the lynching parties. Our Presidents, like Pontius Pilate, wash their hands while with rope and faggot the murderous hoodlums run amuck throughout the land.

For America is like a hypocrite who seeks to pluck the mote from her neighbor's eye while she heeds not the beam which is in her own eye.

The blood of murdered black men and women and children cries out to high heaven against this latest outrage on their brothers. Yes, America may yet again have to shed her blood for the remission of her sins.

New York.

By, Maurice Le Frak.

In a perusal of the evening papers of Saturday, April 8, 1933, I was more than shocked at the open, flagrant display of racial hatred and unethical conduct as enacted by some grossly ignorant circuit solicitor, of Wade County, Ala., who is known as Mr. Wade Wright.

At this time when a national and world feeling of resentment has risen against Hitler's persecution of Jews throughout Germany this very American, Mr. Wright, has the audacity and gumption to make a remark pertaining to a certain Jewish lawyer who is chief defense counsel in the Scottsboro case, then being heard in Decatur, Ala. The gist of the remark was an appeal in an impassioned manner to the jury to show the above learned counsel "that Alabama justice cannot be bought and sold with Jew money from New York."

I cannot conceive that such remarks could have been emitted by a man who, perhaps in the knowledge of the fact that he was among friends, allowed his sense of discretion and toleration to be overcome by a statement more befitting of a Nazi Hitlerite than a citizen of the United States, who at the same time presumably is vitally interested in the welfare of a great many people in his community. To think that the true administration of justice, which is the firmest pillar of good government, could be so atrociously distorted to convince a jury is appalling and unbelievable to the mind of any righteous thinking human—race and creed aside.

God knows that if Wade County, Ala., cannot do without men who have the perspicacity (?) and the un-Christian-like attitude of a man like Wright, then truly the scales of justice and religious intolerance have deeply been steeped and warped in the rotten mire of race hatred and miscarriage of justice.

Brooklyn.

By M. Renevais (a Southerner).

It seems that the World-Telegram and Heywood Broun can always be depended upon to rise to eloquence in favor of Negroes.

Your attitude and his are ridiculous. If Negroes were treated in the South with the leniency you and Broun seem to suggest—that is, permitted to go scot-free no matter what crime they commit—the South would be immediately catapulted into race warfare on a huge scale as a consequence of widespread rape, roguery, murder, robbery and so on—crimes committed by Negroes. The South knows Negroes, and knows how to deal with them. The North does not!

New York.

[The World-Telegram has never suggested that persons guilty of crime, whether white or black, should "go free." It has advocated a fair trial for all accused. The question whether a trial has been "fair" is a matter of public opinion as well as of judicial decision.—Editor's note.]

By Vox Populi.

"No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." That is the Fourteenth Amendment.

Now look at the Scottsboro case. One boy out of the accused nine has already been convicted, and they call that justice! If ever one wanted a good example of race prejudice and discrimination, let him take this case and have a perfect model! All the evidence points toward their innocence and yet the jury turns in a verdict of guilty in the case tried. Let us hope that this decision will soon be set aside and that Alabama will not be known as "the" State that sent innocent Negroes to their death.

Brooklyn.

By J. Namsorg.

The verdict at Decatur speaks rather loudly of the mentality of Southern jurors. Heywood Patterson has been convicted in a case in which the State which prosecuted him was guilty—guilty of producing such conditions whereby mere children are compelled to leave their homes to find work in other towns, of breeding slums and poverty which result in the growth of prostitution, of harboring chain gangs and permitting (even encouraging) lynchings.

If anyone deserves to die it is the real rulers of the South, large plantation owners, who seize this opportunity to assert their authority in suppressing the Negro.

They are the guilty ones for whom tarring and feathering is too good.

Attorneys For Nine Negroes Will Ask Change of Venue For Heywood Patterson

11-20-33

Macon Ga

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 19 (AP).—A new chapter in the now nearly three-year-old "Scottsboro case" legal battle tonight was ready to be turned as attorneys for the nine Negro defendants gathered their evidence on which they will advance a motion for a change of venue.

The motion will be offered tomorrow, as Heywood Patterson, first of the nine to be tried for an alleged attack on two white girls in April, 1931, is arraigned for his third trial.

Samuel S. Liebowitz, chief of defense counsel for the Negroes who entered the case just before Patterson was brought to trial here under a change of venue from Jackson county in April, arrived today.

In Birmingham yesterday, Liebowitz said he had affidavits to support contentions of the defense that a fair trial could not be obtained here and when it was pointed out Alabama law provides for only one change of venue said he could only make the effort.

To Oppose Change

Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, Jr., who assumed charge of the case for the state when it was brought to the Alabama supreme court on appeal in January, 1932, said he would oppose further change of venue to avoid delay in the trials.

Final decision, however, will rest in the hands of Judge W. W. Callahan of Decatur, who will preside since Judge James E. Horton of Athens, the other judge of the circuit, has excused himself.

It was Judge Horton who reversed a Morgon county jury that convicted Patterson here last April and fixed his punishment at death, on the grounds that the state had not established sufficient proof to warrant the verdict.

If Judge Callahan overrules the motion for a change of venue, a venire of 100 will be drawn for the jury and Patterson will face trial for his life a third time on Nov. 27.

Lynch Murder Lies in Wait

Daily Worker

ONLY quick and decisive action by the toiling masses, black and white, can defeat the ghastly conspiracy of Alabama officials to turn the Scottsboro boys and their attorneys over to a lynch mob on the eve of the new trials, scheduled to take place in Decatur, Ala., Nov. 27. President Roosevelt, Gov. B. M. Miller, Montgomery, Ala., and Judge W. W. Callahan, Decatur, Ala., must be flooded with vigorous protest wires, demanding the safety of the Scottsboro boys and their defenders. The Public Inquiry and Anti-Lynching Conference in Baltimore this Saturday and Sunday must be made a tremendous success in mobilizing the masses and all sincere intellectuals against this hideous conspiracy.

11-20-33

The "Daily Worker" has presented irrefutable proof of the Scottsboro conspiracy. This proof includes over 300 sworn affidavits of Negro and white residents of Morgan County, Ala. The capitalist press, both South and North, admit that the stage is set for one of the bloodiest massacres in the violent history of capitalist persecution and oppression of the Negro People. The Birmingham "Age-Herald" describes the situation in and around Decatur as "tense and explosive."

New York

In the face of these admissions, what is the attitude of the Alabama officials? From Governor Miller down, they refuse to afford any protection to the Scottsboro boys and the International Labor Defense attorneys, Samuel Leibowitz, Joseph Brodsky and General George W. Chamlee. Even the pretense of calling out the militia to "protect" the boys and their defenders is to be dispensed with. The Alabama officials are following the murderous example of Gov. Ritchie of Maryland, who threw George Armwood to the Eastern Shore lynchers, refusing to order his removal from Princess Anne, or to send troops to protect him in the face of universal knowledge that a lynch mob was gathering to murder him.

The attitude of these officials gives sinister emphasis to the proof already presented by the "Daily Worker" that they are in league with the Ku Klux Klan and other terrorist groups in preparing a bloody pogrom against the boys and their defenders.

* * * *

WHAT is behind this hideous conspiracy against the lives of these innocent boys and their defenders? The Alabama lynch lords, although in full control of the machinery of capitalist justice, are in deadly fear that the world-wide defense, which four times wrested the Scottsboro boys from their bloody hands, will ultimately defeat the plans of the lynch courts. The lynch lords have seen the toiling masses of the whole world rallying to the defense of the Scottsboro Boys and of the oppressed Negro People. They have seen the masses indignantly reject the original Scottsboro lynch verdicts, sentencing eight of the boys to burn in the electric chair. They have seen the innocence of the boys proved in the Decatur trial, at which Ruby Bates fearlessly retracted her original testimony against the boys. They have heard the angry thunder of protest which swept over the world when the grinning all-white jury returned last Palm Sunday a death verdict against Haywood Patterson.

And for what purpose? To teach the Negro masses, who are becoming increasingly more militant, a bloody lesson. To fling the charred bodies of nine innocent boys and their defenders into the face of the Negro People and the white workers rallying to their defense! In the words of those who are organizing a massacre of the boys and their defenders, the Negro masses are "becoming cocky and too damned uppity!"

The Negro masses, assured of the support of broad strata of the white toilers, mobilized against the lynchers by the Communist Party and the International Labor Defense, are more and more resisting the attacks of the white ruling class and the devastating effects of the crisis. They are fighting back against starvation and misery, against the lynch wave now raging throughout the country! This struggle is taking the form, not only of spontaneous resistance, but of an organized fight for Negro liberation. In the heart of the Alabama terror, over 500 Negro share croppers have organized into the Share Croppers Union, and twice, with arms in their hands, defended their union against the armed attacks of the landlords and their sheriffs.

The white and Negro masses must intensify the fight against lynching, whether legal or extra-legal; for the safe and unconditional release of the Scottsboro Boys.

Defend the Scottsboro Boys and the Negro Masses!

Demand full protection for the Scottsboro Boys and their attorneys.

Deluge President Roosevelt, Governor B. M. Miller, Montgomery, Ala., and Judge W. W. Callahan, Decatur, Ala., with protests against the lynch conspiracy!

9 BOYS ARRIVE IN DECATUR TODAY; LYNCHERS OPENLY CALL FOR BLOODY ORGY

Attorneys Wire Demand to Roosevelt to Intervene to Prevent Massacre; Protests Pouring Into Decatur

By JOHN L. SPIVAK

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 19.—While this town waited tensely for the arrival of the nine Scottsboro boys and their International Labor Defense Attorneys, Samuel Leibowitz and Joseph Brodsky, against whom open threats of death have been made the Defense Counsel made a final plea to President Roosevelt for his intervention to prevent "a massacre of both defendants and their Attorneys."

Roosevelt Asked to Intervene.

This plea was made after Governor Benjamin M. Miller had refused to order out troops to provide adequate protection. The telegram to the President follows:

"We earnestly ask you to persuade Governor Miller of Alabama to order out sufficient National Guardsmen to provide adequate protection for the nine Scottsboro boys and their attorneys, who are to appear in Decatur tomorrow morning for the arraignment of the defendants and for trial on Nov. 27th.

"In previous trials this Spring, Circuit Court Judge Horton, presiding, took judicial notice of incipient mob action to lynch defendants and attorneys by ordering the soldiers in open court to shoot if necessary, to preserve the peace. Shortly after the trial, Judge Horton, who has since been supplanted, adjourned court on his own motion because of the temper of the citizens. Since the last trial, two Negroes in the custody of the Sheriff were recently lynched in the Tuscaloosa case. A Negro, named Royall, was lynched in the very City of Decatur in August, and a mob visited the Decatur jail to lynch a Negro prisoner named Brown. Only his removal to Huntsville jail before the mob arrived, prevented his assassination. The situation now is infinitely more tense.

"Have affidavits naming many persons in Decatur and neighboring towns who have openly voiced their intention of 'getting the niggers' and the attorneys. Editorials today in the Birmingham Age Herald and Post show their appreciation of an imminence of danger and urging the officials to call the militia. Despite this extremely grave situation, the Governor has rejected the plea for State Troops to guard prisoners and attorneys. The probability of a massacre of both defendants and their attorneys is extremely grave. We urge your intervention."

Decatur Tense as Hour of Hearing Nears

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 19.—This town is tense as the hour approaches for the appearance of the nine Scottsboro boys for their arraignment in the Morgan County Court here tomorrow morning and the arrival of the International Labor Defense Attorneys Samuel Leibowitz and Joseph Brodsky, against whom open threats of death have been repeatedly made.

Rumors that the Scottsboro boys will never reach the court house alive are all over town.

State officials are still standing pat in their refusal to call out the National Guard in anticipation of trouble.

Protests From Workers Pouring In

Photographers from the Birmingham newspapers and one from the New York Daily News, are keeping vigil outside the Birmingham County Jail to follow Sheriff J. F. Hawkins and his deputies, when he transports the boys to Decatur late tonight or tomorrow morning.

Telegraph condemnation of the State's refusal to provide the military to protect the nine boys and their attorneys, is flooding this town. They are coming from all over the country and abroad.

Simultaneously, the Birmingham newspapers have written strong editorials condemning the state officials for their refusal to supply adequate protection, and urging a reconsideration of their stand 'before it is too late.'

Daily Worker

In last desperate efforts to prevail upon the state to provide the military, George W. Chamlee, Southern Counsel, associated with the defense, telegraphed a personal message to Gov. Benjamin W. Miller, urging him to order out the National Guard. Gov. Miller refused. 11-20-33

Boys Await Ordeal of Removal

While last minute conferences were being held at the Tutwiler Hotel in Birmingham, by defense counsel, the Scottsboro boys waited fearfully for the ordeal of being transferred to Decatur from the Jefferson County jail.

New York N.Y.

Both Sheriff Hawkins and Sheriff Davis of Morgan County, state that they have made no alterations of their plans to provide a few deputies as the only means of protection.

Leading Papers Score Refusal of Protection

This morning's Birmingham Age Herald's leading editorial, urging that the military be called out to protect the Scottsboro boys and their defendants, gives an accurate picture of the seething tension which the local newspapers realize exists.

The editorial follows:

"So far as this paper has been able to ascertain, the Scottsboro Negroes are to be taken to Decatur for arraignment on Monday without military protection. It is, as we see it, exceedingly unwise to fail to give these prisoners the fullest protection the state can command. The responsibility which is thus being thrust upon Sheriff Hawkins and Sheriff Davis, impose on them a burden they should not have to carry. What is true with respect to the arraignment is true of the trial of the week following.

"If this is not a juncture when the authorities should strain a point to make sure of the safeguarding of defendants, there has never been an occasion in the history of Alabama for protecting prisoners against the possibility of an attack by would-be lynchers. If anything is left undone to protect the Negroes accused in this case, and the official optimism proves unwarranted, then the state will be under an imputation it should not have to wear. It is a risk too great to be taken."

Common Belief that State is Preparing Massacre

The "imputation" that the editorial refers to, is the common belief current throughout the state that Alabama has prepared what seems to be a set-up which is virtually an invitation to mob action.

The Birmingham Post yesterday also spoke strongly on the question of protection.

"Our recollection," it says editorially, "of secret indignation meetings and of reports of incipient mobs at Decatur and Huntsville in the last trial of Haywood Patterson, leads us to believe, however, that Judge Callahan underestimates the seriousness of the situation.

"A judge cannot wait until mob violence is upon him to provide protection for defendants in his court. Mobs show a serpentine ability to rise suddenly from nowhere in particular.

"Adequate protection must be afforded the defendants and their attorneys. Whether this protection be in the form of uniformed guardsmen or special sheriff's deputies of proved courage, is unimportant."

Chamlee Wires Demand to Governor Miller

General Chamlee's personal telegram to Gov. Miller said, "The Birmingham News Age Herald and the Birmingham Post, of Saturday and Sunday morning, say in substance that the Scottsboro Negroes are to be taken to Decatur for arraignment on Monday morning without military protection, and in substance that is is exceedingly unwise to fail to give these prisoners the fullest protection the state can command.

"As the Southern attorney I have been in this case two and one half years and I am a citizen of this part of the country and have affidavits and reports from many sources that there is already a movement on foot to lynch the Scottsboro Negroes and to intimidate and embarrass the trial and attorneys involved in this case, unless the state of Alabama will furnish troops to protect the prisoners, attorneys and officers of the court in Decatur on next Monday and throughout the trial of these cases.

"The trial judge and the Attorney General may think troops are unnecessary, but mobs do not advise the trial judge or the Attorney General of their intentions and in many instances they are utterly unable to detect them and capture them after a lynching, irrespective of the disgrace brought on the good name of the state.

"As a friend of yours and a citizen bordering your state with relatives scattered throughout Alabama who cherish the good name of your commonwealth, I want to appeal to you to provide troops to escort these prisoners to and from the courts from Birmingham to Decatur and return to the end that the trial may be orderly, fair and consistent with real true administration of justice."

Governor Miller replied this morning, declining to send troops.

Feeling against the boys and their defenders, already tense, was further inflamed today by printed attacks on the "intrusion" of the I. L. D. in aiding the boys. A 54-page pamphlet is being openly circulated, calling for the lynching of the boys and their attorneys.

It is written by Woodward Mabry, local attorney, and is entitled:

"A reply to slanders in re the Negro question, lynch law, etc., being an invitation to the International Labor Defense and all other associations advocating political equality to get out and to remain away from the State of Alabama."

"If it turns out that any of these names are superimposed over the red lines," he continued, "they must have been written in after you took office or after the commission which made up the 1931 roll went out?"

N.Y.

Judge Callahan sustained an objection from Attorney General Knight and Mr. Leibowitz took an exception. Braddus Mosely was the next Negro found upon the jury roll. Before getting the others into the record Mr. Leibowitz asked Judge Callahan to impound the book, which he hopes to prove has been tampered with since Patterson's trial last Spring.

"I'll let the clerk take custody of it," said the judge, directing John Green, the clerk, to "take this book and lock it up down there in the office when we get through with it today."

Denials Precede Disclosure.

The disclosure of the names of Negroes on the jury roll came after C. A. Wann, clerk of the Circuit Court of Jackson County, had testified that he could not recall a single instance of a Negro being included on a jury.

New York

In that he was supported by the testimony of several white citizens of Jackson County who testified at the trial last Spring that they never had seen a Negro on a jury there.

Notations on the jury roll also showed that while the names of the seven Negoes appeared on the list of those available for jury duty, none of them ever had served.

At the morning session Arthur J. Tidwell, a Morgan County jury commissioner, testified that J. J. Sykes, a Negro who the defense contended was excluded from jury service on racial grounds, was left off the rolls because of physical infirmities.

Then Judge Callahan denied the defense motion to quash the venire on the ground that there werer no Negroes on the panel from which it was drawn. He said he was not convinced on the evidence before him that the Fourteenth Amendment had been violated.

Soon after that Mr. Leibowitz returned from a brief sojourn in Louisiana. His appearance had an electrical effect. The empty benches began to fill. He took over the conduct of the case and within five minutes, with Mr. Moody on the stand, came the first intimation that the Jackson County jury rolls might contain the name of some Negroes.

"I'll show you the name of K. B. Snodgrass," said Mr. Leibowitz, "and I ask you whether he is white or colored."

"The only man I know by that name," said Mr. Moody, "is a Negro."

With the hearing on the motion to quash the indictments threatened with unexpected prolongation, Judge Callahan, determined that Patterson's trial shall be under way on Monday, ordered the counsel to return for a night session. It would last, he said, until the one court stenographer cried for mercy.

SCOTTSBORO JUDGE BARS TROOP GUARD

Times 11-19-33 N.Y.

But He May Revise Decision Not to Ask for Guard at New Decatur Trial.

LEIBOWITZ PLANS PLEA

He Will Urge Protective Steps for Negroes Upon Prosecutor —To Ask Change of Venue.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 18.—Despite reported threats of mob violence, seven of the nine defendants in the Scottsboro case are to be brought here Monday from the jail in Birmingham without a military guard.

Judge W. W. Callahan, who was assigned to try the cases after Judge James E. Horton reversed the verdict of guilty returned against Heywood Patterson last Spring, is understood to feel that the display of military force at the last trial helped engender bitterness among the townsfolk against the Negroes.

Times 11-19-33 N.Y.

His decision not to request Governor Miller to summon a detail of the National Guard, however, is subject to revision. It was believed that he may ask for the militia after hearing the evidence which Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief counsel for the defense, is prepared to offer Monday in support of a motion for a second change of venue.

Mr. Leibowitz has in his possession seven affidavits from private investigators listing the names and addresses of nearly 500 individuals who, he says, not knowing that they were to be queried, expressed the opinion that the "Jew lawyers from New York" and their Negro clients should be lynched.

Affidavits to Be Presented.

It is his intention to offer the affidavits in court on Monday to support his contention that a fair trial for the Negroes accused of attacking Victoria Price on a freight car near Scottsboro almost three years ago, is impossible anywhere in Morgan County.

The cases were transferred to Morgan from Jackson County, where the alleged crime occurred, after the United States Supreme Court set aside the original verdicts of guilty and the sentences of death imposed by Judge A. E. Hawkins, on the ground that the first trials were unfair.

The Alabama statutes permit only the change of venue, but Mr. Leibowitz is planning to attack the constitutionality of the law on the ground that it deprives the defendants in the Scottsboro case of their right to a fair trial, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. He will attempt to show that there is more animosity toward him and his clients here than there ever was in Jackson County.

The New York attorney, who has been retained by the International Labor Defense, a Communist adjunct, to defend the Negroes, left home yesterday but he did not come to Decatur. He went instead to Birmingham, where he hopes to confer tomorrow with Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., the prosecutor, regarding protective measures which he holds necessary to safeguard the lives of the accused Negroes.

Pamphlet Attacks Defense.

Soon after his arrival in Birmingham, Mr. Leibowitz obtained a copy of a fifty-four-page pamphlet which contains a suggestion of mob violence and which has been circulated widely throughout the State, according to reports. The pamphlet, which purports to have been written by Woodford Mabry, attorney at Grove Hill, Ala., is entitled "A reply to Southern slanders in re the Negro question, lynch law, &c., being an invitation to the International Labor Defense and all other associations advocating political equality to get out of and to remain away from the State of Alabama."

Times 11-19-33 N.Y.

"We regard your teachings as dangerous and a menace to our State," the pamphlet states.

Among the more inflammatory passages was the following:

'I have never been, am not now and never will be an advocate of mobs but; when a lot of outside Negroes and white people send lawyers into our State, who set themselves up insolently and lawlessly to defeat the law and cheat justice, I believe then, that within certain limitations, the people who authorize court executions retain the power themselves to put down crime.

"Within those limitations all peoples enforce lynch law. Why does the law give you the right to expel trespassers with just such force as you find necessary? And to kill a man to prevent him from stealing your horse or burglarizing your house? Or to anticipate and slay the assailant who manifestly means to attack your life? It is because the law is too slow to save you.

Community Urged to 'Save Self.'

"You must save yourself. In like manner the law may be too slow and uncertain to save a menaced community because of outside lawyers and the unscrupulous methods employed by them. Then that community must exercise its inherent right to defend itself."

Notwithstanding the widespread talk of lynching embers of this Tennessee River community minimize the danger of actual violence. Taxicab chauffeurs, store keepers and public officials all are positive there will be no trouble. Negroes however, look frightened and give evasive answers when they are askd for an opinion about the case. The third trial of the twice convicted Patterson will not start for a week after his arraignment. A considerable part of the interim probably will be consumed by argument on the motion for a change of venue.

Times 11-19-33 N.Y.

Attorney General Knight has requested subpoenas for all the witnesses who testified for the State at the last trial. In addition he ordered the issuance of a subpoena for Ruby Bates, the girl who testified that she was attacked along with Victoria Price, at the Scottsboro trials and then, appearing as a surprise witness for the defense at the last trial, recanted and charged that the whole case was "a frame-up."

White Hobo to Be Summoned.

The Bates girl, however, has informed Mr. Leibowitz in a letter made public by him in New York a few days ago that she does not dare to return to repeat her testimony in Decatur. According to the defense counsel she is beyond the process of the Alabama court in New York or New Jersey.

Times 11-19-33 N.Y.

Of even more interest than the subpoena which Mr. Knight requested for the Bates girl, was the Attorney General's request for a subpoena for Orville Gilley. Gilley, a white hobo, was on the freight car in which the alleged attack took place, and presumably saw all that happened.

Although held in jail until the trials at Scottsboro were ended, Gilley never, from the witness stand, told the story of the alleged crime. Since the last trial, according to Mr. Knight, he returned voluntarily to Alabama and swore to an affidavit supporting Victoria Price's charge of a mass assault upon her and Ruby Bates. Whether Mr. Knight will be able to produce Gilley in court, has ont been revealed.

GETS COMMUNIST THREATS

11-23-33 N.Y.

Flood of Telegrams Assail the Prosecution and Demand Release of Negroes.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 22.—With the hearing on defense motions in the Scottsboro cases in recess today, Circuit Judge W. W. Callahan let it be known that he hopes to try at least four of the seven Negroes before Christmas.

Then, if the Negroes accused of attacking two white girls on a freight train near Scottsboro in March, 1931, are convicted, Judge Callahan intends to recess his special term of court to await the results of appeals by the defense.

According to close friends of the jurist, he hopes in that time to "debunk the Scottsboro cases."

The words are supposed to have been his. He feels, it was said, that the simple question of the guilt or innocence of the defendants has become involved in a tangle of extraneous matters relative to Communist activities among the Negroes, interference of outsiders with Alabama justice and local pride.

This motive was behind his ban upon photographers in the courtroom and his refusel to provide facilities for representatives of the press assigned to cover the third trial of a case that has attracted international attention.

He has relented a little in his attitude to reporters since the hearing opened and has allowed a press table to be built. Reporters, however, remain outside the rail which separates jury, judge and counsel from the spectators.

Will Set Other Cases.

Thus far the case of Haywood Patterson, which was ordered retried by the United States Supreme Court, is the only one set for trial. It is on the docket for Monday.

Judge Callahan has ordered the arraignment of another defendant, probably Charlie Weems, tomorrow, so that his case may be set down for trial a week from Monday. On that date, the judge informed the State, he expected to set the trials of two more of the Negroes.

While defense attorneys have been crying out against dangers they face in trying the case here, where public sentiment is alleged to be bitterly against them, it became known today that the prosecution and the judge himself have been threatened in letters and telegrams from Communist sympathizers.

So many messages have been received by Judge Callahan, according to his friends, that he thought seriously of instructing the Western Union and Postal Telegraph Companies to deliver no messages to him except in case of a death in his family. He decided not to do so, however, adopting the policy of receiving and ignoring the telegraphed "demands" for the "unconditional release" of the prisoners.

The "mass action" represented by the sending of telegrams to Alabama officials has been one of the factors complicating the Scottsboro case. Governor Miller, it was said, has received 25,000 messages, 8,000 of them since Patterson's conviction here last Spring.

Court Officials Summoned.

Tomorrow, when the hearing on a defense motion to quash the venire from which a jury will be chosen to try Patterson is resumed, Arthur J. Tidwell, a jury commissioner, is to be recalled to answer a question as to why a Negro was excluded from the jury roll, which Judge Horton, who presided at Patterson's last trial, refused to let him answer.

As soon as the court has ruled upon this motion, another to quash the indictment against the Negroes will be argued.

Times

11-23-33

Among officials subpoenaed as witnesses for the defense motion are Probate Judge J. M. Money and his clerk, J. M. McBride, Sheriff; C. A. Wann, clerk of the Circuit Court; H. G. Bailey, Circuit Solicitor, and [illegible] C. Thompson, County Solicitor. Each will be asked whether he has ever seen a Negro on a jury in Jackson County. The answer is expected to be "No."

N.Y.

With the court in recess, Decatur spent a quiet and pleasant day. Attorney General Knight, still limping from gunshot wounds he received accidentally while investigating a lynching at Tuscaloosa in the Summer, went quail shooting, while G. W. Chamlee and Joseph R. Brodsky, defense lawyers, conferred at Chattanooga.

Although Samuel S. Leibowitz indicated when he left here Monday night that he might not return until the trial opened Monday, it was reported here tonight that he might be in court tomorrow. With his return, the tension of the trial is expected to increase.

Judge Callahan Confesses

DOWN at the Scottsboro trial at Decatur yesterday, in a few hastily expressed words dropped in private conversation, Judge Callahan confessed the grim lynch purpose that lies behind his careful phrases of judicial "impartiality."

Daily Worker

11-24-33

Judge Callahan confessed in private that he hopes "to debunk the Scottsboro case."

And in the sound of these words one can recall a similar wish expressed over six years ago by the New England Judge Thayer, who told his friends that he hoped "to get those Anarchist bastards, Sacco and Vanzetti."

New York

Not only does Judge Callahan hope to "debunk" the Scottsboro case, but he hopes to do it before Christmas, five weeks from now.

Which, in plain words, means that Judge Callahan confesses the hope of having the nine innocent Scottsboro boys ready for execution by the end of next month!

• • • •

The presence of Negroes in the Decatur court, in defiance of the gruesome menace of lynch terror; the growing rebellion and militancy of the oppressed Negro people, inspired and encouraged by the world fight of the International Labor Defense and the Communist Party around the Scottsboro case—all this has caused the ruling class masters in the South to determine to crush, once and for all, what they call the "uppityness" of the rising Negro people.

And Judge Callahan's expressed desire to rush the execution of the Scottsboro boys and to "debunk" the case is nothing but the avowed expression of a loyal supporter of the whole lynch Jim Crow system, one who is determined to fling the charred and burned bodies of the Scottsboro boys into the faces fo the rising Negro people as a bloody warning that they must not attempt to break the bonds of their slavery.

It means that Judge Callahan sets himself the task of destroying the fight for the right for Negroes to sit on juries in the South.

It means that Judge Callahan sets himself the task of protecting the whole lynch Jim Crow system of ruling class oppression of the Negro people.

To Judge Callahan, the proved innocence of the Scottsboro boys, the fight for the social equality of the Negro people, the fight against lynching and Jim Crow oppression, is all "bunk." And this is natural, for Judge Callahan is part of the whole official machinery of ruling class landlord oppression in the South.

• • • •

The fight for the safety and freedom of the Scottsboro boys must not, cannot, relax for one single moment!

Judge Callahan's desire to "debunk" the Scottsboro case is a brutal challenge thrown to that whole world opinion which has thus far prevented him and his lynch associates from carrying their official lynch execution.

This bloody challenge must be met! Renewed vigilance! Ever mightier demonstrations of protest! Mass meetings, resolutions, telegrams, letters, must let the lynchers know that the eyes of the world are upon them! Safety and immediate release of the Scottsboro boys! Save the Scottsboro boys!

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — "We're not going to get lynched in Decatur. We refuse to move a peg without we have the military to protect us at that there trial."

From behind the bars of Jefferson County Jail in Birmingham, the nine young Scottsboro boys spoke to Ben Davis, Jr., International Labor Defense attorney, and through him "to all our people and their friends." With simple bravery and outstanding determination, these boys, who have become symbols of the most determined struggle of the workers throughout the world for Negro rights, await this new threat after two years and seven months behind prison bars.

Can't Tell Whole Truth

"We've been through hell," one of the boys said. They told of the "tightening up" by the authorities ever since the new trial date was set. Mail is consistently withheld from them. They are given bad food. At times they are even made to sleep on the concrete floor of their cell. They are constantly threatened by guards and "visitors" in an attempt to break their spirit. It is impossible to learn the full extent of this brutal terrorization, for the boys cannot speak even, to their attorneys without fear of worse torture in the long days and longer nights when they are entirely at the mercy of their enemies within the thick walls of the prison.

"We can't tell the whole truth now," one of the boys explained, and went on, "We don't never want to live in the South no more when we go free. Don't want to even think what would a been of us if it hadn't been for the I.L.D."

"We have faith in the I.L.D.," Haywood Patterson told the attorneys. "Please send our greetings to the Negro people and to all their white sympathizers."

It has been only a relatively short time since Haywood Patterson was released from a month in solitary confinement. And it is this steady faith of all the boys which has kept them from despair even under the hot words of Warden Dan Rogers, who told them: "I wouldn't give 50 cents a pound for you if you ever go to Decatur," and the regular cursings of "Captain" K. C. Dement, who once tried to rouse other prisoners to kill the Scottsboro boys.

Anti-Lynch Conference

News of the wave of lynchings throughout the South promises that they, too, will surely be lynched in Decatur.

The Southern District of the I.L.D. issued a statement following the interview, calling for intensified activity in preparation for the new trial on November 27, for protests to be sent to the warden, Jefferson County Jail, Birmingham, Alabama, against the withholding of mail and reading matter from the Scottsboro boys, and against their persecution and mistreatment. "The widest possible representation at the Alabama Anti-Lynch Conference right in Birmingham on November 26, and similar actions throughout the country, are the only means for withstanding the lynch preparations of the ruling class for the coming Decatur trial," the statement says.

• • • •

NEW YORK.—The Scottsboro boys are in immediate danger. To organize the mass defense which alone can save them, to prepare the necessary legal steps, to save them and their attorneys and defense witnesses from lynching, the International Labor Defense needs immediate funds, today.

That was the appeal made by William L. Patterson, national secretary of the I.L.D., to the toiling masses, Negro and white, of America.

The announcement that Governor Miller and Attorney General Knight of Alabama will send no troops shows that the lynch preparations, which the I.L.D. must thwart, are in full swing, Patterson said.

The Scottsboro defense is endangered momentarily by lack of funds, he said. Thousands of dollars are needed to carry on this fight. Every hour, every day, counts. Funds must be rushed immediately, from every working class and sympathetic organization and individual, to Room 430, 80 East Eleventh Street, New York City.

Renewed Fight on the Scottsboro Case

3-11-33

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., March 10.—In the presence of a reporter for the New York Times, and Irving Schwab, one of the International Labor Defense attorneys in the Scottsboro case, little Roy Wright, one of the youngest of the nine framed-up Negro children, related today how he was brutally beaten up by deputy sheriffs in an attempt to make him testify falsely against the eight other boys. In addition, he showed a nasty scar on his right cheek, the result of a bayonet wound caused when one of the militiamen, ostensibly called out to "protect" the boys, jabbed a bayonet through his cheek just before he was locked up.

New York

Negro Reformist Betrayal

Wright declared that Stephen Roddy, NAACP attorney, had urged him to plead guilty "and get a life sentence instead of the chair." The NAACP leaders have never repudiated Roddy, although it has been proved that he is a member of the Ku Klux Klan.

Roy further stated that while sitting in the court at the opening of the trials he was asked by a deputy sheriff if he intended to turn state's evidence. Upon his refusal, he was taken into a room back of where the judge was sitting. "They whipped me and it seemed like they was going to kill me. All the time they kept saying, 'Now will you tell?' and finally it seemed like I couldn't stand no more and I said yes."

Judge Aids Torturers

During this third degree torture, the trial judge, Judge Hawkins, conveniently delayed the trials. Roy denies that he saw the two white girls on the freight train or any of the seven white boys who were whipped in a fight with another group of Negro youths.

The ILD attorneys are now fighting for a new hearing on the motion for a change of venue in the Scottsboro case which has been shifted to Decatur, Ala.

NEGRO JURORS.

In Alabama a number of Negroes await trial on a charge of assaulting two white girls who were hoboing on a freight train.

In Virginia the law is trying to obtain extradition of a Negro who butchered two elderly white women, confessed the crime and escaped from the state.

The fate of all of them rests with the supreme court. The court has been asked to decide whether a Negro is tried by a jury of his peers, as guaranteed by the Constitution, when members of his race are barred from jury service.

You hear little about it, but on that decision rests the destiny of a race and the peace and dignity of the south.

At first glance the case seems simple. Any person of sound reason sense knows that a private soldier isn't tried by a jury of his peers in a general court martial. He is tried by officers, as he was accused by an officer, and his testimony is worthless if an officer contradicts it.

The trial of a Negro, is similar. However just it may be, it is not a trial by his peers. It is a trial by his superiors. And if you allege that those who try him, while socially superior, are in fact his peers before the law, how will you get around the fact that he and his kind are not "equal" enough to get on a jury?

The logic of it is clear. If Negroes are not permitted to serve on the jury, then an accused Negro is not tried by a jury of his peers. And if he isn't tried by his peers, the method of his trial violates the highest law of the land and his conviction cannot stand.

You know what that means. It means that the south has a hard choice. It must reconcile itself to Negro jurors, or face the fact that every Negro convicted will be turned loose if he can raise money enough to appeal his case to the supreme court.

It isn't a pleasant prospect. For the south will not permit Negroes on its juries; and if a Negro cannot be convicted by law under the present system, he will be convicted in another way and sentenced without the aid of a court. That means barbarism.

Of course there may be a way out. The supreme court may decide the other way. And that decision, also, could be justified by logic. Women are tried by men in districts where no woman's name appears on the jury list. Young criminals must face trial by jury though none of their age is accepted for jury service. It isn't hard to find precedents:

A man or class that isn't acceptable for jury service must nevertheless stand trial, and a man who isn't qualified to serve may still be equal before the law, within the meaning of the Constitution, to those who are.—Robert Quillen in Fountain Inn (S. C.) Tribune.

The Scottsboro Case

A SENSIBLE suggestion in connection with the Scottsboro case comes from Dr. McPherson, secretary of the Birmingham branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. He thinks justice for the remaining young negroes awaiting a second trial is more likely to be obtained by the use of sane and dignified methods "in the future handling of the defense."

General details of the case are known to newspaper readers. Seven negro boys were travelling in a box car. In it were two white girls. The latter complained they had been assaulted. Arrests of the boys followed, excitement ran high, trial came quickly and all were convicted and sentenced to hang. If the accused are guilty they deserve that fate. But on an appeal to the United States Supreme Court the verdicts were set aside and another trial ordered.

WITH separation of the defendants, the first of the new trials began a couple of weeks ago at Decatur. In the meantime Northern agitators continued an international movement in behalf of the accused, with the idea of overawing the Alabama authorities. They raised funds and sent a New York lawyer to Alabama to defend the prisoners. The International Labor Defense was interested. During the trial the Governor, the judges and other officers were threatened if the accused was convicted. Military intervention became necessary to protect the court, the prisoners and the Eastern lawyer.

The fact that the jury deliberated for twenty-two hours before reaching a verdict is evidence that it tried to reach a fair verdict. But the conclusion is inescapable that its finding was influenced by the communistic, racial and revolutionary issues raised by the defense.

IT MUST appear to many people who followed the case that there was a reasonable doubt developed by the evidence, sufficient to warrant less than a capital verdict. The two girls were hardly of good reputation. One of them at the second trial repudiated the testimony she gave at the first. She said their statement that they had been assaulted had been manufactured to conceal an offense against morality and law. A white witness testified he had been on an adventure with them and they were travelling in the box car on their return from it. If there was an assault by the negroes his testimony of course would not have justified it; but the question arises whether there was an assault at all.

Since this second conviction there has been a lot of agitation in Harlem, negro borough of Greater New York, and threats of a march of 50,000 on the national capital, which could not possibly be of any avail, for Alabama is a sovereign State, not subject to interference in the administration of its criminal laws, as the late Gov. Nicholls of Louisiana pointed out to Secretary Blaine when the latter overstepped his authority in cabling Italy in the case of the outbreak in New Orleans following the assassination of Chief Hennessy.

IT IS AGAINST this Harlem movement that Dr. McPherson protests, and, as we have said, very sensibly. He wants to save the seven negroes if they are innocent. He fears that may be impossible if racial, communistic, and intimidatory issues are again raised. He probably has in mind the stalwart stand of Massachusetts against international anarchistic interference with its right to carry out the judgment of its courts in the Sacco-Vanzetti case.

We hope Dr. McPherson's view will prevail with those to whom he appeals. If the Eastern propagandists keep their hands off, if they do not insist on the march to Washington, if they will desist from sending Northern attorneys into Alabama, if they put a stop to the attempt to bulldoze judges and juries of that commonwealth, if they will let the redoutable leaders of the colored people of Alabama handle the situation, they will stand a better chance of saving the Scottsboro negroes from the gallo

"History Is One Thing And 1933 Another"

5-13-33

Montgomery Ala.

In one of his recent "This Morning" columns in The Age-Herald, John Temple Graves II discussed the implications of the Scottsboro case in a spirit of fairness and liberalism epitomized in his expression, "history is one thing and 1933 another." What Mr. Graves had to say about the qualifications of Negroes for engaging to a greater extent in the activities of citizenship in the South is echoed by many other thoughtful Southerners whose devotion to the welfare of this, sunny region is not open to question.

Another significant utterance of a similar type is that of Charlton Wright, for 16 years the thoroughbred editor of The Columbia (S. C.) Record, whose remarks currently stand on the pages of The Virginia Quarterly Review. In addition to his notice of Mr. Wright's attitude, Mr. Graves also cited the liberal convictions of the dean of a Virginia law school "whose Southern ancestry runs back to the Revolution."

Such points of view are strongly supported by the investigative efforts of such men as George Fort Milton, Howard W. Odum and Julian Harris. Their arraignments of "Judge Lynch" have been based upon scientific data of considerable weight. What these men, and other far-sighted Southerners, have been attempting is more than a mere gesture of chivalry toward the black man. They have in mind the larger welfare of the South. The question which they set up is whether a continued tolerance of abuses related to the racial problem would not, in the end, be far more dangerous to the South's integrity than would a more liberal attitude toward civil privileges of the Negro.

During the "tragic era", as Mr. Graves pointed out, the situation was entirely different. Then the respectable Ku Klux Klan and the Order of the White Camelia had to defy the fourteenth amendment in self-protection. That they succeeded nobly in doing so is one of the most glorious accomplishments of Southern history. But even during the times of Henry W. Grady and the illustrious father of the present John Temple Graves the conditions were beginning to show a change.

That alterations have been great enough to inspire representative Southerners, of the highest qualifications in both mind and breeding, to say that "history is one thing and 1933 another" is surely enough to make the rest of us sit up and take admiring cognizance of the dawn of a new day in our beloved Southland. The fullest enjoyment of such a realization is bound to increase the reverence which Southerners feel toward that stern and beautiful past, which has made the present an even more promising reality.—Birmingham News.

A SANE VIEW OF THE PROBLEM

Nothing more direct and homeward-going has been written to size up the aftermath of sentiment on the Decatur trial than that which came from the pen of John Temple Graves II in "This Morning" column of last Saturday's Age-Herald. He says:

Reporter

"Anent the protest that the contest in Alabama over repeal of the eighteenth amendment is not necessarily a struggle between "wets" and "drys" but merely one between repealists and anti-repealists, Publisher Harry M. Ayers, of The Anniston Star, says the real question is "whether Alabama shall have the right to tell New York or Wisconsin that it cannot be wet." And this provokes Editor Julian Hall, of The Dothan Eagle, to say that the same question is involved when Massachusetts or New York undertake to tell Alabama and Virginia that Negroes must be called and selected for jury duty. "The truth is every state should decline to interfere with the states, and this applies in respect to the eighteenth amendment as well as the fourteenth and fifteenth."

5-13-33

"Amen, but it seems to us that in the matter of allowing Negroes t serve on juries the time has come for the South, without failing to trus itself while other sections are doubting it, to make allowance for their doubting, too. The Southern objection to having Negroes on juries is an inherite thing rather than one acquired under current circumstances. It is inherite from the "tragic era" of reconstruction when the South was forced to giv all the rights of citizenship to newly emancipated Negroes who were utterl lacking in education or experience for the exercise of those rights. The result was a reign of terror for which the North was responsible and which th South has never been able to forget.

Birmingham, Ala.

"This is something for Northern critics to bear in mind, just as the should bear in mind that the Northern slave-dealers who introduced Negr slaves in the South gave this section its race problem. But something fo Southerners to bear in mind is that history is one thing and 1933 anothe The "tragic era" is dead these 60 years now, and all of us who are hones with ourselves know that there are many Negroes today perfectly qualifie in education and outlook for jury service. The social question is in no wis involved. It is merely a question of competence and of justice. In Virgini the other day we heard a law school dean whose Southern ancestry run back to the Revolution say that the South has come to a point now wher it can and should admit qualified Negroes to juries and that in spite of th hands of holy horror, the thing is likely to work very satisfactorily for a parties concerned. The same position is being taken by another Southerne of ancient lineage—South Carolina's R. Charlton Wright, for 16 years owne and editor of The Columbia Record."

There is a sensible way to see "what is" in spite of any feeling or for boding that "it ought not to be."

To deny the existence of "what is" because one is possessed by a fee ing that "it ought not be" is the genius of the galling chains of traditio The truth about the "tragic era" or reconstruction brings up appalling r membrances to all of us who are able to realize and appreciate its nauseou ly humiliating aspect, we might say the same thing about the cruel regim of human slavery that preceded it. The queer fact is that the Negro wa not the offender in either case, but, worse, the sufferer in both. This oug to make it easier to be forgotten on account of his inoffensiveness.

By whatever means the race problem came, it did not come throug Negro offensive; and the quarrel between Northerners and Southerners o account of it has never generated any more bitterness in the Negro than man's love for the liberty of which he is deprived should warrant—not eve as much.

We inherit traditions in the sense that they are passed from one generation to another in the form of practices or teachings; the genius of our social institution makes that inheritance difficult to overcome.

[illegible] social amenities are one thing and political privileges another, and the differences between them are wide enough to reserve the one and permit the other. The matter of social caste is reasonably well and naturally fixed. We doubt that there ever was any danger to the white race of social amalgamation. It has never happened in history except as among uncivilized peoples, and to the most limited degree at that. But political rights and privileges cannot be bound by unforgettable traditions in a democracy where civilized progress depends on the forward march of justice toward political equality and economic opportunity.

Sixty years is more time than one needs to forget anything that he is willing to forget. It is also less time than one needs to establish ancestor worship.

If there were a disposition in Alabama to give the Negro political rights and privileges on the show of qualification, what effect should a suggestion from New York or Massachusetts have on the temper of those so disposed? Perhaps, it is annoying to be prodded by outsiders with the shameful truth.

It seems that the white Southerner's revenge against the Negro for the part suffered by him and imposed by the white Northerner might find an end in sober thinking if there is nothing deeper than that.

We believe that the Negro has beat the Southern white man all too far in forgetting the wrongs incident to erring humanity and by that token he is happier in the little a great democracy affords him than is this superior man in the much that taxes his energy and burdens his conscience to keep himself satisfactorily adjusted to a reasonable philosophy of life.

Noted Liberals Will Talk on Negro in South at Scottsboro Meet

New York, N.Y.

John L. Spivak, author of "Georgia Nigger," will draw upon his own experience in his talk on "Chain Gang Convict Stories" which he plans to deliver at 8:30 this evening at Radamsky's Studio, 66 Fifth avenue near Thirteenth street. The meeting is under the auspices of the National Scottsboro Committee, of which William N. Jones, managing editor of the Baltimore Afro-American, is chairman.

Other speakers include Malcolm Owley, editor of the New Republic, who will give "A Yankee's Impressions of Negro Tenant Farmers"; William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense, who will offer his viewpoint on "The Human Aspect of Camp Hill and Tallapoosa, Ala."; Joseph R. Brodsky, chief counsel in the famous Scottsboro case, who will speak on "Intimate Glimpses of Scottsboro and Other Southern Cases," and Allan Taub, whose subject will be "Kentucky Colonels and Tennessee Generals."

An additional feature will be the showing of a short Scottsboro newsreel, portraying the conditions of Negro workers in the South.

Marchers Back After Journey To Washington

Planet

Philadelphia, Pa.

5-13-33

Philadelphia's delegates to the big Scottsboro protest parade staged through the streets of the nation's capital last Monday afternoon returned to this city a joyful group having aided in one big accomplishment, letting the leaders of the nation know that they mean to save the Scottsboro boys.

Richmond, Va.

The local delegation, headed by William Powell, district leader and James Watson, member of the executive board, both of the International Labor Defense, left here Sunday night for the capital. They arrived in Washington Monday morning and made preparations to join more than 5,000 other comrades who staged a mammoth parade by the executive building of the federal government in a great protest. More than two-thirds of the marchers were Negroes, five hundred of whom were from Philadelphia, the cradle of liberty, the birthplace of independence.

RUBY BATES SPEAKS

The executive committee whose membership includes James W. Ford, William L. Patterson and Leah Thompson, made futile attempts to visit the offices of the nation's chief and interview him. President Roosevelt sent out the message that he was "in conference".

Ruby Bates, one of the girls who was supposed to have been raped, spoke at an open air meeting in behalf of the Scottsboro boys and told the truth of the affair to more than seven thousand persons who came from every section of the capital to hear her address.

Delegates to the march came from as far west as St. Louis, north to Buffalo, and south to Birmingham, Ala.

Mass Energy Misdirected

Journal and Guide

THE Communists are bellowing to Negroes the necessity for "mass pressure" to free the Scottsboro boys. They very conveniently neglected to point out that mass pre[illegible] released Tom Mooney from San Quentin and did not save Sacco and Vanzetti nor Euel Lee. Money, not demonstrations, will free the innocent youths.—Pittsburgh Courier.

5-13-33

The JOURNAL AND GUIDE very earnestly commends the above comment. It is our firm conviction that "mass pressure" in behalf of the unfortunate Scottsboro boys as exemplified by noisy demonstrations and open threats will indefinitely obstruct their chances to receive a fair trial in Alabama. The South is not ready to yield to the forces and aims behind Communism and all its affiliates, and it is useless to sacrifice the lives of nine boys, who, if given an opportunity to be tried in a court not influenced by passions and prejudice, most likely would be acquitted upon the facts as they now stand.

Norfolk, Va.

This is not meant to express any lack of understanding or appreciation of the splendid legal defense of the boys by the International Labor Defense, which is generally admitted to be an affiliate of the Communist party. It is precisely the same view which made the soft-pedaling of Communistic demonstrations a condition of Mr. Leibowitz's entrance into the case.

THE SCOTTSBORO BOYS

Argus 4-28-33
St. Louis, Mo.

It has been suggested by a Raleigh, South Carolina newspaper that "the lovers of justice" in the South would be willing to employ the best legal talent in the South to defend the Scottsboro boys if the International Labor Defense would withdraw from the case.

The echoes from the press, North, East, South and West, strongly indicate that the boys, yes, the innocent boys, will never be able to receive a fair trial in the South as long as the International Labor Defense plays the leading part in their defense. We think these echoes are significant, and should be given careful consideration by all persons interested in seeing justice done in this matter. Already, the Commission on Inter-Racial Cooperation has expressed its deep interest in this case, and at its last meeting, among other things, issued the following statement: "We reaffirm our deep interest in the Scottsboro case and our continued willingness to render any service that may be found possible toward a fair unprejudiced settlement of this case by the courts."

Further action by this Association was the appointment of a committee to inquire "whether an opportunity for effective service in the case can be found." This looks to us like an offer of a most valued service by a group of people who are earnest and sincere in their desire to work out plans whereby the Negroes of the South will receive an equitable portion in the distribution of law and justice.

The Committee on Inter-Racial Cooperation is, undoubtedly, made up of the most fair minded white and colored people of the South. Any suggestion of assistance coming from that organization surely is worth serious consideration.

BELOW THE MASON-DIXON LINE

By JESSE O. THOMAS

Courier
Pittsburgh, Pa.

ATLANTA, Ga., Apr. 2[illegible].—There is another side to the Scottsboro case that needs to be taken into consideration in order to have a balanced judgment. The jury representative of the legal machinery of the state, has a position that needs to be understood. From our point of view, the Scottsboro case is no different from hundreds and thousands of other cases that are disposed of daily in like manner by ninety-nine and almost ten-tenths [illegible] cent [illegible] the courts in this whole area [illegible] evidence much more flimsy than the evidence in the Scottsboro case; in other words, they wonder why all this ado about the Scottsboro boys when all about us Negroes are, almost daily, being convicted without substantial evidence and Negroes are denied their rights as guaranteed by the Constitution. In addition to that, there are two grades of justice. Justice for a white man is a different thing than justice for a Negro. Practically the whole South is committed to a double economic standard. A Negro is paid one salary for a job or a position and a white person is paid another. One would have to look a long time before he would find anybody who would say that this wasn't true. The Superintendents of Education argue that the Negro is getting more than he pays in taxes, therefore, he is getting more than he is entitled to. Those same superintendents or public officials do not feel, however that the white child with an impoverished background or of poor parents should be limited in its educational opportunities to the tax paid by his father. They vote in some special measures in some few localities. Everybody knows that. On the other hand, no community feels outraged or no people are at all disturbed. The attitude of the average citizen is that the Negro may be trusted to adequately and justifiably look after the welfare of the Negro. If some one should suggest to these same people to disfranchise white people and let Negroes legislate for them, this would be considered unjust and impossible.

There is a Negro named "Down" who has been twice convicted for assaulting a white woman and sentenced to die on the 28th day of this month in the State of Georgia. In some respects the evidence upon which he is convicted is much more questionable to the unprejudiced mind than even that which seems impossible as evidence in the Scottsboro case. This Negro "Down" is alleged to have held a revolver on this woman's escort, which would require the use of one of his hands, while he assaulted the woman. This escort is alleged to have stood there helpless while this crime was being committed. The escort married the woman the following day. One could go from one court to another and from one state to another and get records of similar cases occurring over and over again in the majority of the courts. The only reason the Scottsboro case seems atrocious and horrible is because it has had a lot of publicity. Again, from the point of view of these local citizens, any one who is acquainted with the facts can understand why they would wonder at all of this hullabaloo, excitement, comment and whatnot about the Scottsboro case.

"I was in a city not long ago where a young man came to take the principalship of a school. As he boarded the street car and gave the conductor a one dollar bill, the conductor inadvertently short-changed him. He asked for the right change. The conductor stopped the car, called the policeman and had him arrested. The policeman called the patrol wagon and took him down to jail. This principal would have been locked up except that a friend of his who had gotten the word signed a bond for him. At the trial the following day, the conductor said the Negro cursed and used the most vile language and threatened him. The only thing that kept the Negro from having to pay a fine was that we got hold of the superintendent of education and a number of prominent Negroes to give this man's history and field of education; so, the judge finally dismissed the case after lecturing to this Negro principal as to how to do the next time. If this Negro had not been an outstanding educator, or if we had not had a chance to get his case in the hands of the judge before the court convened, he would have had to pay a fine, or being less prominent and unable to secure the type of white and Colored people to testify for him, he might have gone on the chain gang. This happened in one of the large cities in the South. If the same thing had transpired in a small town in some rural district, it would have had a different ending.

I, am writing this from the Georgia State Industrial College at Savannah, where I am spending a couple of days as guest of President B. F. Hubert and the institution. I spoke this morning to the regular assembly. Among the student body, there are a number of mentally alert, wide-awake promising young men and women.

In spite of having to revise his budget to meet the retrenchment in the state's appropriations for schools, President Hubert and his faculty are still carrying on with high morale. Like most of the educational institutions, the Georgia State Industrial College has been affected by the depression in so far as the student body attendance is concerned. There has been a little falling off in the student body as against the school year of 1931-1932.

On the way down in my "Depression" Ford, I stopped at Macon with my friends, Dr. and Mrs. J. S. Williams. Dr. and Mrs. Williams, without pretense and affectation, represent the heartihood of solid, congenial, hospitality and comradeship that one so rarely finds as he moves about here and yonder. From Macon, I went over to Dublin, a city of which I had heard a good deal but had never visited.

There is a Negro business man there by the name of H. H. Dudley, funeral director, who is remarkably successful and who has an uncanny sense of economic values. He started a little grocery store with a hundred dollar start, and in a few years he had developed the business to where his gross turn-over represented $75,000 per year. In addition to his undertaking business, he is interested in real estate and loans and is now building a casket manufacturing concern. He has recently promoted the establishment of a newspaper called "The New Deal." (President Roosevelt to the contrary notwithstanding.) Associated with him is Mr. Johnson Rooks who is editor of this paper, who for the past 11 years has been manager of the Silas Green show. The race relations in Dublin are very cordial—unusually so for a small town. This interracial, understanding, however, does not make itself manifest in the improved status of the Negro school. The Negro children are entitled to, and undoubtedly could have a much better school in Dublin if the Negro leaders would capitalize the interracial goodwill that seems obvious there. The seating equipment as well as other facilities are hardly equal to what you would find in the remote rural districts. Professor Richardson, the principal, and his corps of teachers are doing excellent work under the uninviting and well-nigh depressing circumstances. After spending a busy day inspecting the business interests and visiting with the family of Jenkins, I am spending a good night with Mr. and Mrs. R. L. Mathews. I headed out this morning for the River of Thunderbolt.

The Jess Hollins Case

Scottsboro! Jess Hollins! Both of these cases have the same background. Around the Scottsboro case there has been built a dramatic aspect and the roar of disapproval and dissent resounds around the world.

Right at our door Oklahoma has its Scottsboro. In the city of Sapulpa in the closing months of 1931 an illiterate colored boy was yanked into a star chamber council (not a court) and charged with the crime of rape. Terrorism, intimidation and coercion were adopted as legal implements during the brutal inquisition and in a few minutes a human being had been condemned to the hot seat.

The criminal court of appeals of Oklahoma has said that Jess Hollins was not given due process of law. The high court has commanded that a more decent gesture at justice be made. Several months ago the same court officials started again a rapid fire legal process with which to convict Jess Hollins. They dashed the poor man through an arraignment and preliminary within the space of two hours. The same court officials sought vainly to try Jess Hollins again in Creek county, but in all of this attempt they were halted by able, courageous and competent attorneys, employed by the N. A. A. C. P.

The case then went to Okmulgee on a change of venue. There the N. A. A. C. P. attorneys proved in open court, and for the first time in the case, that even the information upon which Jess Hollins had been convicted and condemned to die, was faulty and did not conform to the statutes and the laws of Oklahoma regarding informations and indictments.

Today the case comes up in Creek county where another information has been filed. The prisoner will be arraigned in district court. He will of course plead not guilty and his case set for trial. Attorneys will immediately file a motion for a change of venue.

All of this is costing time and money. No one could forecast that we would be thrown into all of the legal bypaths into which this case has already gone. Likewise, no one can forecast the distance still to be traveled before justice has been done.

One thing we do know. Most of the battles Negroes have lost, have been failures not because we could not win, but because we lack the perseverance, faith and courage to climb to the top of the hill.

It would be suicide to divulge in these columns the facts in this case. Apparently the frameup is just as ugly and just as much a reality as in the Scottsboro, Alabama, affair. This writer does not believe that Jess Hollins is any more guilty of rape than is Heywood Patterson. But this must be proved in a court of law, and it will take time, money and courage to attain such ends.

The thing which is important just now is money. There is no need to look outside the confines of the state of Oklahoma for a place to spend your strength. Right here in Oklahoma we have our own "Scottsboro" and it is right here that we should seek to strike a blow for liberty.

This writer is penning these lines at four o'clock in the morning, preparatory to leaving in a few short minutes for Sapulpa. He must go on his own expense because such funds as have been raised to date have been used to pay the lawyers and liquidate other expenses which have developed during the course of the many court proceedings. A few dollars have been given each week to Jess Hollins' poor wife ($2.00 each week) while she waits for the day when she must go on the witness stand for her husband.

What is your responsibility? The funds are exhausted. Why not sit down today and mail the Black Dispatch a check to apply on this case. You can do this. Remember what we said a few moments ago: the black man has lost most of this battles not because he could not win, but because he lacked the perseverance, faith and courage to go on to the top of the hill.

"COURIER" LAUDS ALABAMA 'HONOR'; IGNORES 9 BOYS

Repeal More Important to Negro Betrayers Than Scottsboro

PITTSBURGH, July [illegible].—An example of the sort of services for which President Roosevelt made Robert L. Vann, editor and publisher of the Pittsburgh Courier, a special assistant attorney-general in the Department of Justice is contained on the editorial page of the Courier this week.

A headline on this page reads in bold type, spread over two columns: "Alabama to Get Another Chance to Redeem Honor."

Called Scottsboro a "Blot"

Previously the Courier, in company with other Negro reformist papers, has called the Scottsboro case "a blot on the honor of Alabama," in order to hide its character as part of the entire system of oppression of Negroes in the country by the white ruling class.

Does this headline refer to the Scottsboro case? If not that, then does it refer to a lynching? To the present attempt to legally lynch Willie Peterson? To the appeal in the Dadeville frame-ups? You'd be surprised.

"Alabama's Honor"

In the eyes of the Pittsburgh Courier the "honor" of Alabama rests on its vote on repeal of the 18th amendment. Once that is settled, Alabama's honor is washed clean, in the eyes of the Pittsburgh Courier, unofficial organ of the NAACP and official organ of the Democratic lynch party among the Negroes.

The article is from the pen of H. Councill Trenholm, president of the State Teachers College of Alabama. It deals also with a coming vote on extending the income tax downward to put more of the burden on the lower middle class, which is put forward on the excuse that it will help pay the salaries of school-teachers which the state has defaulted.

~~Negro~~ Gets New Trial

Those who have contended—especially the communists—that it was impossible for a negro to get a square deal in Alabama, received a shock when Judge James E. Horton of the Alabama bench, set aside the verdict of guilty rendered against one of the Scottsboro negroes, which he held the trial was prejudiced and unfair—thus flouting local opinion.

If there has been a miscarriage of justice, in an Alabama court, and Judge Horton's decision conveys the idea, an Alabama judge, construing Alabama law, has done his best to rectify it. As a matter of fact the Alabama officials have acted fairer than some of the attorneys for the defense.

At any rate the courts are seeing to it that the negroes have a fair and impartial trial—which is poor propaganda for the communists.

Workers Will Hear New Scottsboro Song Today

"Scottsboro," a new mass song written to help in the struggle to free the Scottsboro boys will be sung by the Flatbush I.L.D. chorus at the Scottsboro demonstration in Union Square Today.

The chorus of the song, whose words were written by Abron [illegible] are:

"The Scottsboro boys shall not die,
The Scottsboro boys shall not die,
Workers of the ILD will set them free, set them free."

The song was written by L. E. Swift, a young composer, member of the Composers Collective of the Pierre Degeyter Club. Swift has won recognition in the music world for his concerts and his compositions.

He became active in the revolutionary movement last year. One of his recent compositions "United Front May Day, 1933" was inspired by the May First demonstration in which he took part.

The song may be purchased for two cents a copy at the Workers Book Store, 50 E. 13th St., or from the Workers Music League, 55 W. 19th St.

The Scottsboro Verdict

The conviction of Haywood Patterson, first of the Negro defendants in the second trials of the Scottsboro cases, will be appealed. And it should be.

It is incredible that a new trial, under fairer circumstances will not be granted. The cheap bigotry and unscrupulous demagogy displayed by the state's attorney is almost without a parallel. "Show them that Alabama justice cannot be bought and sold by Jew money from New York," the prosecutor exhorted the jury in the midst of a long and violent harangue appealing to race hatred as well as religious prejudice. This remark, typical of the prosecution's case, was based on the mere presence of the liberal-minded Samuel S. Lejbowitz, of New York, as defense counsel.

In addition to the unfair setting of the trial the facts fairly bristle with doubt. Two of the three principal state witnesses repudiated their former testimony. The remaining witness is a woman of known character.

Not nine Negro boys, but the south is on trial in Alabama. Has a black man any rights there? Does ignorance and the meanest kind of race discrimination hold the courts in their grip? It would seem so.

But fortunately for justice, prejudice overplayed its hand. There remains an opportunity for a higher and fairer court to point out as the Supreme Court did in the earlier trials, that justice is for all men no matter what the color of their skin.

TARRED WITH THE SAME STICK

Whatever pride Americans have in this nation, they dare not say it is better than Germany which persecutes the Jews. What does it matter if the Revolutionary fathers dedicated it to liberty, equality and justice? These latter day Americans know that not the high principles of its founders, but their own cold calculating cruelty, their own refusal to do justice and keep the faith, is charting the course which the United States is pursuing. That Alabama court sitting in judgment upon the Scottsboro boys is not one whit more fair, nor just, nor humane than the Nazis are toward the Jews in Germany.

As recent events prove, generalizations to justify the pogroms for Jews in Germany and ready-made verdicts for Negroes in Alabama are what the dominant majority depends on to support its claim of a divine right to rule. It has its incompetents, criminals and insane. Somehow or other if it is to rule undisputed, it must lift them also above the people it despises. From this necessity come the sweeping denunciations which exempt no Jew in Germany and no Negro in the United States. Because the majority makes its own rules, it can prove its superiority by pointing out others' inferiority.

Illogical, inhuman, conscienceless relations between man and man within the nation, however excused on the grounds of race and religion, nonetheless strike a true total in results. Giving rein to its hatred of the Negro, the United States has lost its own respect for law. Germany desperately in need of the world commerce it used to enjoy, throws away its chance in exchange for Jew-baiting which is only a handy political expedient good for a day. Fools [illegible]s reap the fruit of their folly.

For the moment the thoughtless mob is following scatter-brained leadership. Soon or late, it will be halted in its folly by finding itself far astray from all the sound policies which man has accumulated since civilization began. The Negro boy sentenced to death ~~in Decatur, Alabama~~ is only one life. The ~~jury system~~ that causes his death involves the state, corrupting everything it touches. Today as has ever been true, wrong hurts its doer more than its victim. Individuals charged with a heinous crime appear to be on trial in Alabama. Actually the culprit is the social system that robs Negroes of every man's birthright and then punishes them for not having made good.

9 Defendants In Scottsboro Case Mutiny In Cells

Negroes Destroy Fixtures In Birmingham Jail And Refuse To Obey Sheriff

Patterson Is Leader

Rioters Say Guard Cursed Them; Are Placed On Bread And Water Diet

BIRMINGHAM, ALA., April 27.—(AP)—The nine negro defendants in the "Scottsboro case" late today were locked in the day cell of the Jefferson County Jail and placed on a bread and water diet when they mutinied and refused to return to the cell blocks.

Armed with pieces of metal ripped from plumbing and light fixtures, they defied jail wardens and refused to return to their cells when Sheriff J. H. Hawkins appeared and told them to drop their weapons and go back to their cells.

Sheriff Hawkins gave them nearly an hour in which to change their minds and return to the cells, equipped with bunks, and, when they were still defiant, ordered the door locked and the bread and water diet. The negroes told the Sheriff they were afraid they would be "beaten up" if they returned to their cells.

The day room in which the negroes staged their rebellion is equipped only with a table on which their meals were served and some chairs. They are taken to it daily to give them room to exercise, but have been returned to their cells at night.

Patterson Leads Riot

Heywood Patterson, 19, of Chattanooga, who, on April 9, was sentenced to death a second time for an alleged attack on Mrs. Victoria Price aboard a freight train in Jackson County March 25, 1931, Warden F. L. Erwin said, was the leader of the rebellion.

Previous to refusing to return to their cells, Warden Erwin said the negroes sent out a piece of card board across which they had printed "freedom for the Scottsboro boys," and made demands for "better treatment."

The mutiny, the warden said, apparently was due to the negroes' resentment over their being locked in a separate room on "visiting day," as hundreds of negroes had called at the jail each Thursday afternoon since they were returned from Decatur. The number of visitors was so great that they congested the passage between the cell blocks, Warden Erwin said, and he was forced to stop it.

It was at the end of "visiting hours" when the warden opened the "day room" that the rebellion flared up.

Two or three of them agreed to lay down their weapons when he talked to them, Warden Erwin said, but Patterson and the others shouted "we'll die first."

To Sheriff Hawkins one of them replied, "we will see the United States Supreme Court and settle everything."

Communist Letters Blamed

The sheriff said the negroes said one of the deputy wardens had "cursed us" but that they had not been mistreated otherwise. The sheriff and chief warden left the jail at 6 p.m. after the day room had been locked. Warden Erwin attributed the rebellion to printed matter and letters "from communists and sympathizers that has streamed into the jail since the trial at Decatur."

Thousands of protests on the sentences have been made to State officials.

Sheriff Hawkins already had asked Gov. B. M. Miller for authority to transfer the negroes to Kilby Prison, where they were confined during the time their first appeals to the Alabama Supreme Court and the U. S. Supreme Court were pending.

The negroes, Patterson, Roy and Andy Wright, Eugene Williams, Ozie Powell, Charlie Weems, Clarence Norris, Olen Montgomery and Willie Roberson, were arrested at Paint Rock, Ala., March 25, 1931, and were charged with attacking Mrs. Price and Ruby Bates, Huntsville textile workers aboard a freight train.

All Sentenced to Die

All except Roy Wright were convicted in Jackson County in April, 1931, and sentenced to death. The Alabama Supreme Court reversed the death sentence for Williams on the ground that he was a juvenile, the U. S. Supreme Court reversed the others on the ground that they were not properly represented by counsel.

A change of venue was granted to Morgan County and the trials set for Decatur. After Patterson was convicted, Judge James E. Horton, presiding, postponed the other trials indefinitely because of a statement attributed to Samuel S. Leibowitz, of New York, chief of defense counsel.

A few days after their arrest and removal to Gadsden the negroes rioted in the Etowah County jail, where they were being held for trial.

Sheriff Hawkins tonight issued a statement in which he termed the "uprising" as "making a mountain out of a mole hill," and but for the publicity attendant on the case, would have gone unnoticed.

The Jefferson county jail, he said, was the best in the South, providing everything essential to safety and comfort.

Resented Delay In Exercising

He said the warden kept the prisoners in the cells today until 2:30 p.m., which they apparently resented and when required to "return their plates and spoons by sliding them under the bars," they refused and became very abusive of the warden.

"When he admonished them, they showed fight and it developed they were armed with pieces of iron, bed springs, and other weapons which they had secured by destroying the springs in their bunks, and otherwise demolishing their cells."

Sheriff Hawkins said he asked their grievances and they "all tried to talk at once," but the only complaint was that a warden had cursed them, which was denied by the official.

"They cursed me and my wardens and howled that they would take the whole matter to the United States Supreme court. Realizing that if I attempted to force them into their cells it would simply excite them, and probably cause trouble. I told them they would be held right where they were, in the day room until they surrendered their weapons and returned voluntarily.

"I expected to carry this out. They have water and I will furnish them such food as I see fit until they agree to abide by jail rules."

TRY TO RAILROAD CYRIL BRIGGS, EDITOR OF HARLEM LIBERATOR

4-24-33 New York, N.Y.

Trial Tomorrow; Charged With Speaking for Scottsboro Boys Without Permit

NEW YORK.—In an attempt to stifle the growing protests against the Decatur lynch verdict, the Tammany police are seeking to railroad Cyril Briggs, editor of the Harlem Liberator, to jail. The charge against Briggs is based on the pretext that the use of a loud speaker in the Harlem Liberator's campaign of exposure of the Scottsboro frame-up is a "violation of city ordinances." The hearing, set for last Thursday, was adjourned to tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock in the Magistrates Court at 170 East 121st Street. Briggs will be defended by the International Labor Defense. Negro and white workers are urged to pack the court in militant protest against this outrageous attempt to jail one of the outstanding leaders in the fight for the Scottsboro boys and the rights of the oppressed Negro people and exploited white workers.

Landlords Withdraw Charge

The charge against Briggs was originally made by Bachrach & Bachrach, landlords of the building at 2149 Seventh Avenue, in which the office of the Harlem Liberator is located. Frightened by the fierce indignation of the Harlem workers, the landlords have sent frantic apologies to the Harlem Liberator, declaring they will not press the charge. The Tammany police, however, are attempting to carry through the frame-up. They have singled out Briggs for their attack on the Scottsboro mass defense in recognition of the tremendous role being played by the Harlem Liberator in rallying the masses of Harlem to the fight for the freedom of the Scottsboro boys and the national liberation of the Negro people.

THE BEST LAWYERS

[illegible] 4-21-33 Montgomery, Ala.

Discussing the question of Negroes on Alabama during the Dadeville trial and the International Labor Defense League and its lawyers, The Demopolis Times says:

Speaking of the I. L. D., there is no special kick over their coming into Alabama and taking up the case of any criminal of whatever race or color or of whatever crime accused. Every defendant is entitled to as good a defense as can be put up for him, and being accused of a crime and being guilty of it are entirely different things. The best lawyers are not generally assigned to the defense of men not able to employ counsel, nor are they in the habit of volunteering to do so. The I. L. D. lawyers can do no more than make the most of the law and the evidence, just what our own best lawyers do when their services are paid for. Let the I. L. D. lawyers come in all they want to. They neither make nor apply the laws; that is a matter for our courts and juries.

No Alabamian who loves justice will disagree with The Times on the point that defendants deserve the best of lawyers when they are on trial—and especially if they are facing death.

Certainly this State would have no reason to protest just because some group outside of Alabama saw fit to hire attorneys for men who could not afford to pay for the best legal talent.

It would be a heartless people indeed who would deprive humble beings of the bost counsel merely because persons other than the defendants were paying the lawyers.

Yet no matter how brilliant a lawyer may be—for instance the Great Leibowitz of New York—his aid to his client cannot rise above his motives.

The best lawyers in the final analysis are the lawyers who have no other motive than to see that their clients receive justice.

In most cases where defendants are unable to employ attorneys, the court appoints young lawyers to defend them.

And these young men always work hard to aid the clients placed in their care by the court. It is to their best interest, of course, to make a good showing.

Of course, young, inexperienced, lawyers can not be of as much value to a client as a Clarence Darrow—or as could be Mr. Leibowitz.

But Leibowitz is more concerned with courting favor in Harlem than he is with saving the necks of the seven Southern Negroes on trial for rape in Alabama.

The Negroes deserve more fairness at the hands of their own attorney than they received.

A young law school graduate, green in the ways of legal battle, would make a better showing for the defendants than has the man who has been primarily interested in making a showing for himself.

SCOTTSBORO DEFENSE FUND.

Age 4-29-33 New York

It is gratifying to learn that something is being done with a view to perfecting a nationwide system of collecting a defense fund for Haywood Patterson and the other eight Negro boys involved in the Scottsboro case. Such a step is absolutely necessary, for unless this is done an opportunity is afforded dishonest and irresponsible persons to take advantage of the public's present state of mind now inflamed against the Decatur, Alabama, verdict.

For two weeks money has been secured in an unorganized fashion. A question has arisen as to whom funds should be directly sent. The New York Age can authoritatively state that Samuel S. Leibowitz, senior counsel for the accused, is desirous that a defense fund be created and deposited in the bank, the money to be available to duly accredited legal representatives whenever needed.

It is perfectly obvious that a central organization must be formed in New York with affiliates throughout the country if those for whom the money is intended are to be the sole beneficiaries. Otherwise any person or body of persons is privileged to make appeals without having to make an accounting or any kind of report to the recognized heads of the movement.

There is no reason why the International Labor Defense and the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People should not both conduct drives in aid of the defense fund. The general public is not interested in the partisan controversies engaged in between the two organizations in the columns of the press, but in the saving of the lives of nine boys who are believed to be innocent of the crime with which they are charged.

The International Labor Defense is entitled to due credit for having interested so able and courageous a lawyer as Mr. Leibowitz to fight for Haywood Patterson's life, and it is doubtful if the verdict would have been otherwise if any other organization had taken an active interest in the case. The bigots of Morgan County, Alabama, resent outside intrusion. Wade Wright, the blatant circuit solicitor, would have disregarded the law and evidence and appealed to baser passions regardless of the racial identity of defendant's counsel. The jury would have been easily swayed had Wright raved and ranted about the "Yankee money from New York" or the "Irish money from New York."

This is time for concerted, united action if a defense fund of at least $10,000 is to be raised. But the collection of money for that purpose is no more important and essential than the proper direction of it. Mr. Leibowitz and his associates should adopt every precaution to prevent racketeering. The public should be acquainted with the name and address of the treasurer of the Defense Fund Committee to prevent misunderstandings and possible unsavory aftermaths.

It is noted that other National Negro weeklies look with disfavor on such ill-advised suggestions as "a march on Washington," and are reminding their readers that funds, not demonstrations and petitions are most needed.

May Day in South to Rally Negro and White Toilers Against Peonage, Lynching

Daily Worker 4-27-33 New York, N.Y.

Over 60 Demonstrations to Be Held, Southern District of Communist Party Announces

BIRMINGHAM, Ala.—The Southern district of the Communist Party reports that over 60 meetings will be held on May First. The international holiday of all toilers was little known only four years ago. But it will find the Southern masses demonstrating against the capitalist rule of lynching and slavery this year.

A meeting is planned for Decatur. This town is well known as the place where Haywood Patterson was tried only a few weeks ago.

A series of meetings will be held in Tallapoosa County. Following it there will be one large mass meeting in this county, where the sharecroppers are leading a heroic struggle against the oppression of the white landlords.

Meetings for May Day are planned in the following places: Bessemer, Cullman, Greensboro, Selman, Walker County, Warrior, Montgomery, Mobile, Citronella, Andalusia. The students in the University of Alabama, in Tuscaloosa, will hold a meeting

South Needs No Outside Interference To Give Justice

Editor, The Post:

Negro blood and tarnished white virtue in an awful mixup is being peddled as a great bargain day sale of slush over the world.

Some of our producers of yellowism do not hesitate to stoop to anything to put on the news stands in glowing colors a fast seller. Not in a long time have such writers, together with certain propagandists been furnished more gruesome facts than those of high churchmen of New York and Birmingham and the Chattanooga hobo jungle, freight train gondola car ride and fights between white and black and forced social contacts.

It would seem that justice to a negro is about the least thing thought of by the photographers and stage setters, that the only thing left to make their book a riot would be a cover page.

The people of the South are the best friends the negro has and he knows it. They will befriend him when others fail. The two races get along here better without outside assistance or interference.

Not long since a negro shot and killed an influential judge in Alabama. A white jury did not send the negro to the chair, but sent to the chair the well thought of son-in-law of the judge who suggested it to the negro. How much of that got over to the critics of the South? Mr. Brisbane says the testimony is one girl against another, but that one's aroused conscience speaks. Who would believe that an aroused conscience would carry one to an utter stranger with money and fine clothes rather than to her home pastor?

Racial Hatreds

"We are a white race and a Negro race here together—we are here to live together. The world at this time and in many lands is showing intolerance and showing hate. It seems sometimes that love has almost deserted the human bosom. It seems that hate has taken its place. It is only for a time, gentlemen, because in the great things in life no matter what they are, it is God's great principles, matters of eternal right, that alone live. Wrong dies and truth forever lasts, and we should have faith in that."

It was an Alabama judge who said that, a white man, a gentleman of the oldest American stock. Judge Horton, in charging the jury, was speaking only of the exhibitions of race prejudice in the course of the trial of the Negroes who were convicted of assaulting two white women at Scottsboro, but he might have been speaking for and to all the world.

Not in many years perhaps not in centuries, have there been such violent outbreaks of racial hatreds as have been manifesting themselves in these troublous times. In Germany the Nazi government has proclaimed its hatred of the Jews to the point of barring them from almost every phase of the national life. Between the Germans and the Poles hatred is so intense that when the shadow of a German flag, on the Polish border, fell upon Polish soil, there was an indignant protest by the Polish government. The Italian people are developing a new national pride which has racial intolerance as its foundation. And we do not need to point to the racial hatreds which have barred the Orientals from Australia and the United States.

We do not by any means advocate opening the doors to all sorts and conditions of men, but we [illegible] racial hatreds are a step back [illegible] forward in the world's progress. We believe that it is possible for all the peoples of the world to get along amicably, since we are all in the world and can't get out of it. If it proves imposible, because of the stirring up of racial hatreds by prejudiced or malicious interests, then we can see nothing ahead but a complete collapse of civilization as we know it and a return to the Dark Ages when every man's hand was turned against his brother.

THE SCOTTSBORO AFFAIR

The verdict of guilty was rendered by a jury of Decatur, Alabama, citizens, with a sentence to death in the electric chair, in the trial of a negro youth charged with rape.

For some years past, there has been a tendency on the part of a large section of our emotional people to question the verdicts of juries in cases of national interest. Without offering any opinion on the merits of the cases themselves, we might quote the Tom Mooney case, the Sacco-Vanzetti case and the present Alabama case.

Probably 99 out of every 100 persons who clamor for "justice" in these cases know nothing of the facts or the evidence. Carried away by writers in the sensational press, by half-baked agitators who have nothing better to do, and by emotional folks who are governed by their sympathies rather than by their intellects, masses of our people who are easily led, join with the agitators in demanding what they call "justice," but what in reality is a demand for acquittal.

The entrance of citizens of New York and other states into what the people of Alabama consider their own domestic affair, was unfortunate, as it aroused keen resentment. The crime of rape in the southern states is one that has always demanded the most extreme penalties because of local conditions, which do not exist in other sections of the country.

There isn't a person in the country who would want to send the negro youth to the electric chair if he is innocent. Nor is there a person in the country who would not demand the electric chair for him if the crime of rape had been committed by him on one of their own women.

Let us be sensible and trust the courts, judges, juries and lawyers to see that justice be done.

The Greatest Loss

OF ALL of the implications of the Scottsboro case, really the most fundamentally disastrous is the damage which the case has done to the intelligent and devoted work which has been under way in the South for the past twenty years in the interest of harmony between the races.

As the Birmingham News points out in a soundly reasoned editorial, which we reprint in another column of this page, "the consecrated life of Dr. Booker T. Washington, and that of his worthy successor at Tuskegee Institute, have been partially nullified by the flaring passions focussed upon Decatur within the last few days."

The attitude of Judge James E. Horton in the Decatur courtroom did honor to his judicial ermine and to the great cause of justice, of which he is a servitor. But the actions of the prosecution and the defense alike inflamed rival passions stirred up deep and bitter hatreds and the danger is that it set back the cause of racial tolerance and good will by many years.

As the Birmingham News points out, the International Labor Defense is a wildly radical organization, as unpopular in the North as it is in the South, an organization dedicated primarily to fomenting class strife, and doing so on the pretext of defending oppressed prisoners. It is part and parcel of the conventional tactics of this International Labor Defense to inflame racial prejudices, to arouse religious hatreds, to stir up the basest group feelings that can exist. If the result of this deliberate incitation should be the conviction of the accused defendant, the International Labor Defense then brazenly proclaims that it is but another example of the injustice of the capitalistic system.

But the South's interest in the Scottsboro case should be far greater than a feeling of intense irritation over the outrageous tactics of the International Labor Defense. A great part of the South's citizenship is of Negroes. The forward march of this section can only start when white and black together catch the signal and fall in step. Justice, toleration, good will, common honesty between the races is an indispensable essential to the real progress of our section. Deliberate attempts to embroil race against race, and to arouse the most heinous prejudices only harm the South by pushing back the day when this fine spirit can prevail.

Should the International Labor Defense succeed in its Scottsboro efforts to cause the execution of these Negroes, it will have done more than to bring to death nine boys of whose guilt there is some doubt. It will also have succeeded in increasing race tensions which were being lessened. It will have set back for decades the arrival of that good spirit and good will which must prevail between white and black in the South.

Scottsboro Points

To the New York Herald Tribune:

This is in answer to the letter by Welbourn Kelley, in which that "Native of Alabama" attempts to vindicate his much maligned state. The theme of that article was that Alabama would have meted out justice, in her leisurely way, had not the Communists stepped in and created a bitter anti-radical prejudice which swayed the Scottsboro case jury to rendering the "guilty" verdict. This, as any one who has followed developments knows, is becoming a familiar and popular opinion.

1. Upon their apprehension, the Negroes were taken to jail for trial, although there existed "a complete setting for a lynching." This, says Mr. Kelley, is to the "undying credit" of the people of Alabama.

2. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, "a liberal body which has used the services of such brilliant attorneys as Clarence Darrow," was never given a chance to defend the Negroes. "There is little doubt, with their Negro clients already given the benefit of the doubt by the armed posse, they would have brought their case to a successful conclusion."

3. The Communists, "their eyes wide with lust for hate-inspired publicity," having persuaded the illiterate defendants to put the case in their hands, created a world-wide protest campaign which left Alabama dazed and antagonistic. The jury, says Mr. Kelley, handed down the verdict against this campaign, rather than on the question of the guilt or innocence of the Negro boys.

In reply:

1. Mr. Kelley should be informed that, upon their arrests, the Negroes were charged, not with rape, but with vagrancy, for the girls, curiously, did not remember having been attacked until after they had spent a night in jail. This, then, was "the complete setting for a lynching": the discovery of nine Negroes who had dared to ride on the same freight train with two white girls. And, undoubtedly, there would have been a lynching had not calmer minds foreseen that the same result could be accomplished more respectably and, incidentally, more profitably, if it were done through the medium of the courts. (The day of the trial was a gala business event in Scottsboro, "Horse-Swapping Day." People swarmed into town to see the fun. They had a brass band out playing "Hail, Hail, the Gang's All Here," and "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," as each verdict of "guilty" reached the streets.)

If it should be to the "undying credit" of the people of Alabama that nine Negroes, arrested for vagrancy were not lynched on the spot, we are led to wonder what is the usual course of events in similar cases in the Sunny South.

2. "There is little doubt, with their Negro clients already given the benefit of the doubt by an armed posse, they (the N. A. A. C. P.) would have brought their case to a successful conclusion." Did Mr. Kelley never hear of the first trial? There was a first trial, before the International Labor Defense or the Communists had even entered the case Eight of the Negroes were sentenced to death, and the youngest, thirteen years old, was given life imprisonment Where was Alabama justice and the "benefit of the doubt" then? Where was the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People then? That organization has bitterly attacked the International Labor Defense at every turn, and has refused to join United Front Scottsboro Defense initiated by the former organization.

3. Can there be any doubt, in the face of the facts previously stated, that the nine boys would have been executed long ago had it not been for the intervention of the International Labor Defense and the Communists? They have been conducting the defense on the theory that only by turning the spotlight of world-wide interest and protest on the little court in Alabama can those boys ever have a chance. The fact that the boys are still alive, and the fact that the protest is growing more powerful daily, proves the veracity of their contention.

Can any one now doubt that the boys have today a fighting chance for their lives? And can any one now doubt that it is due solely to the steady activity of the "left" organizations during the last two years that they now have that chance?

JUSTICE IN ALABAMA

On the day following the verdict in the famous Scotsboro case at Decatur, Alabama, The News and Observer expressed the opinion that the cause of justice would best be served by the withdrawal of Northern council from the case.

Since that time the public declarations marked by the most intense prejudice of Samuel Leibowitz have made that course more imperative. Other Southern papers have joined in the suggestion.

The News and Observer believes that the best chance for justice in Alabama lies in the defense of the Negroes by eminent Southern attorneys.

In making this suggestion, The News and Observer, however, even in view of the violent statements of Mr. Liebowitz, wishes to repeat that it believes that the cause of justice in the South is deeply in debt to the International Labor Defense and to Mr. Liebowitz. Without the entry into the case of the International Labor Defense, there is every probability that the defendants would have been executed long before this hour. The International Labor Defense came to the defense of the Negroes at a time when Southerners were unaware of the danger of injustice in Alabama. Only through the efforts of the International Labor Defense has the situation in Alabama become known to the nation and the people of the South.

It is charged that the International Labor Defense is not interested in justice in Alabama but in propaganda [illegible] Communistic cause. That may be the fact. But it is also the fact that if its aim was propaganda, its service was to justice.

Now, however, The News and Observer believes that the usefulness of the International Labor Defense has come to an end. Its presence only intensifies the prejudice which caused the outrageous verdict not long ago. Judge Horton, whose conduct in the case has been above reproach, very properly postponed the trial of the other Negroes on the grounds that the intemperate statements of Lawyer Leibowitz and Prosecutor Knight precluded the possibility of a fair trial.

The situation today presents an opportunity for the International Labor Defense to prove that what it seeks is justice and not propaganda, and an opportunity to the South to show that the South wants justice. Justice in the Scottsboro case calls for the withdrawal of the International Labor Defense and for the substitution of the most eminent Southern attorneys who will fight for the acquittal of the Negroes with the same vigor that has marked the defense by the attorneys whom the South thinks should retire.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE

To the Editor The News:

No one can discuss the Scottsboro case philosophically or truthfully without the historic background and the scientific dictum. What I am going to say here may not suit some people—nary a damn cent do I care for that; I shall strike at those eternal verities, which [illegible]lone bids for tolerance.

The Negro [illegible] responsible for his presence here. His [illegible] caught out of the African jungles and brought here on English trading ships, or Yankee clippers, after they had rounded the Cape of Goodhope on the homeward stretch, as but little more than "ballast" at first, until it was discovered to be possible of a great trade; then English "My Lords" and Northern capitalists went in for it on a grand scale; when they were brought down South here because the climate made it possible to raise and use them profitably.

The Negro is a great, big man-child—I'm speaking racially, Mr. Editor. His conception of law is a policeman's club, and his idea of liberty is license; basically he is a human negation. His idea of civilization is limited by something he can get into his mouth.

Sex is the dominating quality of his makeup, and he can no more help it than can a monkey or an African gorilla.

Yet, he is susceptible to considerable learning and culture, as is proven in a great many instances by glittering exceptions to the racial standard.

I love the Negro—in his "place." I was "born and raised" with 'em. I have practiced medicine on 'em. I know them from a to izzard. The horrible and unfortunate tragedy on the train near Scottsboro might be said to be almost a natural happening. Ruby Bates and Victoria Price both swore the truth at first; but one of them was spirited off to New York, where she was "wined and dined" till it opened up possibilities of wealth (for her) to the poor Southern farm-factory girl; and she came back and threw a monkey wrench into the trial.

The verdict was just—according to law; but the sad fact remains that had Ruby Bates and Victoria Price been where they ought to have been, the monstrous thing never could have happened. Therefore, there are mitigating circumstances in the case. It is a proper place for executive clemency. Common sense and mercy ought to be above all written statutes.

I have no sympathy with the perverted idea that the Negro is the Caucasian's equal. It isn't so. Forty centuries ago they started out on about the same social plane; he in his jungle, we in our caves—the difference today is the result of cultural education. That's an article the Negro can't take too much of—neither can a great number of "poor white trash." Education ought to be limited to the individual capacity to receive it. Too much "book-'arnin'" has spoiled many a potentially good white man, as well as lots of good Negroes!

Birmingham. E. B. CULLEN.

Highway.

"The Scottsboro case is a blot on the claim of American liberty and justice," he declared. "A man, because his skin is black, was sentenced to death without fair trial before his peers.

"Human nature is a peculiar thing in that it reverts back to a state of barbarism when excited. Perhaps climatic conditions may make the Southerner hot-headed and irrational at times. Perhaps his hatred for the Negro and, in some sections, for the [illegible] and Catholic, may be due to imaginary suspicion.

"It must be admitted that the Southerner is a cultured man as a rule and a gentleman, even though a reconciliation of brute and gentleman, of Klansman and citizen, are things we of the North cannot understand."

Because of intemperate and vitriolic criticism of the Morgan County jury in Alabama which tried and convicted one of the negroes in the noted Scottsboro cases, attributed to the chief defense counsel, presiding Judge James E. Horton has indefinitely postponed the remaining trials. The injection of sectional and race prejudices by outside meddlers unquestionably has and will continue to have an ill effect. Certainly the interference will not enhance the chances of the defendants getting a fair trial. The good people of Alabama may be counted on to see that justice is done if unmolested and uninterfered with by outside buttinskys.

One of the Scottsboro cases has been settled but the end is not yet. Alabama will have a few more weeks of publicity in the daily press of the country. Were Alabama to attempt to dictate court procedure in New York no doubt we would be accused of meddling, but as long as the East and law-abiding Chicago are looking after us no doubt we will be kept in the straight and narrow path.

Dixie's High Taxes Newspaper Reporters Discover

"Decatur, Ala., recently was full of newspaper correspondents from the big dailies of the country, as well as the news associations, and it is interesting to observe that these writers did not confine themselves to the developments in the famous Scottsboro case.

"As a matter of fact, the astonishingly high taxes that the correspondents discovered in Alabama appears to have made about as deep an impression as anything else, and in consequence Alabama is receiving some advertising that is anything but helpful.

"These correspondents found cigarets carrying a three-cent state tax in addition to a license fee for handling them; a tax of $50 per year on the sale of playing cards, which forced the price up to 85 cents per pack, and a tax of 6½ cents on gasoline, 'making the basic price higher than the total price in New York.'

"Had the inquiries been extended beyond the items in which the correspondents became interested because they buy cigarets, playing cards and gasoline, they would have found a similar condition existing in many other lines; would have found, in fact, a taxing system well designed to drive prospective citizens away rather than to encourage their remaining.

"It is this sort of thing that has gone far to nullify the magnificent natural advantages possessed by the great state of Alabama; a state which is among the richest in the nation in point of natural resources and which was on the way to become a formidable rival of Pennsylvania until the tax gouger began to get in his work.

"Nor is Alabama alone among Southern states whose fine material advantages are being sacrificed upon the alter of excessive taxation. The evil has grown to enormous proportions all over the South and must be corrected before another great era of growth and prosperity can be reasonably expected." — The Gadsden Times.

It's a high shame, if not a crime, that Alabama should thus be cursed because of ridiculously high taxes. In the matter of gasoline tax alone here in Madison county the toll is 10 cents per gallon and not 6½ cents as indicated in the above editorial. It's all out of proportion to reason, and especially so when we have had three sessions of an Alabama legislature that should have given relief. The Alabama solons ought to be ashamed of themselves, and it goes without saying that the best and surest cure is at the polls when the next election rolls around.

The Scottsboro Cases

So many elements have been injected into the so-called Scottsboro cases and so many conflicting passions have been aroused over the trial of the nine negroes that one must seriously doubt if the decision rendered yesterday at Decatur, Ala., in the re-trial of the first of the accused group represents the impartial administration of justice.

Heywood Patterson, aged 19, was convicted and sentenced to death despite the complete change in the testimony of one of two young women who brought the original accusations against the negroes. He will die for the crime, unless the court of appeals points to an error in the trial. This is far from the impossible, if the court is to take to heart the villifications which passed between counsel and the permission of the trial judge to permit a display of racial prejudice and partisanship in the final argument. The color question, difficult enough to deal with in the South, is intensified by attacks on Jews who went from New York to Alabama to defend the negroes representing the International Labor Defense, a communist affiliate. It is easy to see and to understand the complications arising from such a combination of circumstances and it is difficult to believe that the trial went to the jury solely on the issue of that hateful sort of attack which invariably stirs Southern blood.

The great blemish which lies athwart the Scottsboro cases is not the success achieved in raising them to the top of an international pedestal designed to paint the treatment of the American negro in lurid colors but the fact that a felony case should be permitted to run for more than two years without being settled. Such a delay is unthinkable in any other civilized country. Principles of treatment, theories on racial understandings, and social policies have no place in a court of law where the Anglo Saxon tradition teaches us to look to the figure of justice holding up the scale for impartial judgment based on the factual evidence. Two years is along time for witnesses to remember facts but it is a fruitful period in which to raise a great public clamor and to inject the entirely foreign issue of communism which plays grotesquely across this new chapter of justice.

The negroes themselves have become the victims of the cause which others have made for them and in which they are not in the least interested. Had they been entrusted to local counsel they probably would fared a great deal better than at the hands of learned men from strange quarters who are engaged in trying to establish a principle rather than to save the collective necks of nine Southern darkies indicted for the cardinal offense.

The Scottsboro Case

The Scottsboro case bids fair to be another thorn in the side o lecent America. An ex parte propaganda concerning it will b spread through radical circles throughout the world. Communists, anarchists and society's enemies of all sorts will use its alleged barbarisms as evidence of their own purity, and as a device to secure publicity.

For the sake of suppressing this crew it would have beer better if the negro now convicted had been freed, regardless o the testimony. But the Alabama jurors evidently were not willing to sacrifice what they considered immediate justice in orde to forestall propaganda.

Whether or not their verdict is justified, sensible men wil concede they do not know. No one who has not passed on al the evidence, has not borne the heavy responsibility of forming judgments with the actual life of a man at stake, is in any reasonable position to criticize the verdict as rendered by the jury. But at least this can be said: A fair trial was given in sc far as a judge could give it. The judicial system of Alabama can not be impugned in this case. If fault exists, it must lie with the 12 men who returned the verdict of guilty.

There are many things about the case to disturb the hones citizen. The defense long since proved that it was more interested in making propaganda for Communism than in the fate o the accused men. It has steadily done its best to inflame Alabama public opinion. It has sent defending lawyers selected, apparently, as best calculated to give offense to the Alabama citizenship.

And there must be strong suspicion that one witness in the case was tampered with. Her long disappearance and reappearance just in time to aid the cause of the defense, bearing every evidence of having enjoyed a marked prosperity in the meantime, will convince most people that a crude form of "fixing" had been dealt in.

On the other hand, the testimony against the negro now convicted, as reported in the news dispatches, is not very convincing. As time goes on, the parts favorable to him will be heralded abroad by a committee making money out of that activity; the parts unfavorable to him will be suppressed, and very likely we will have another Mooney or Sacco-Vanzetti case on our hands.

Perhaps the cool-headed and courageous Judge Thayer will save us from that distress.

Move to Oust Judge Who Freed Negro Victim of Frame-Up: More Support Scottsboro March

Daily Worker 4-22 33 New York N.Y.

WASHINGTON, April 25.—A move to oust Federal Judge James A. Lowell of Boston, who yesterday freed George Crawford, young Negro whom Virginia authorities are seeking to frame up on murder charges, was made known today.

Congressman Howard Smith, Democrat of Virginia, announced that he would at once ask for impeachment proceedings against the judge.

By freeing Crawford on the writ Judge Lowell thwarted the attempt of the Massachusetts authorities to extradite the young Negro. In making his ruling, Lowell based himself on the fact that if convicted Crawford would be unable to get a fair trial, inasmuch as Negroes are not allowed to serve on juries in Virginia.

This is a direct repercussion of the fight of the International Labor Defense in the Scottsboro case, and is a direct consequence of the tremendous mass movement that is developing around the issue of fundamental rights for Negroes. Not only in the Scottsboro case, but also in the Herndon, Orphan Jones and other trials, the I. L. D. demanded that Negroes serve on juries, and exposed the system of systematic exclusion which prevails in most states, especially in the South.

Virginia authorities had indicted Crawford, charging him with the murder of Mrs. Agnes Ilsely, a wealthy sportswoman, and her maid, at Middlesburg, Va., last year.

Word comes from Boston that the prosecution will seek to get a Supreme Court decision on the action of Judge Lowell as soon as possible. To this end, it appears, no contest will be made before the U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals—instead, the case will merely be certified to the Supreme Court.

500 Pledge to Join March.

BALTIMORE, Md., April 25.—Hundreds were turned away here last night when 2,500 Negro and white workers, professionals and students packed the Sharp Street Church at a Scottsboro meeting.

Janie Patetrson, mother of Haywood Patterson, just sentenced to the electric chair in Decatur, Ala., and Frank Spector, assistant national secretary of the International Labor Defense, were wildly cheered when they stressed the necessity for "unity of Negro and white workers in a joint struggle against the ruling class of the South."

Dean Haywood of Morgan College, Rev. Waters, Rev. White and Bernard Ades, Baltimore attorney, were among the other speakers, and all praised the work of the I. L. D. in the Scottsboro fight. Gough McDaniels, a high school teacher, was chairman of the meeting.

In his speech Spector took issue with Attorney Leibowitz and officials of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People regarding the "fairness" of Judge Horton, and characterised Horton as a "pliant tool of the lynchers."

500 Pledge to Join March.

The meeting, which reached high points of enthusiasm, adopted a resolution to Governor Miller of Alabama demanding the release of the Scottsboro boys, and another praising the activities of the I. L. D. in the case.

Spector brought personal greetings from Tom Mooney, and urged support for the Scottsboro-Washington march. Answering his appeal, 600 at the meeting pledged to march and 1,000 signed a petition demanding the release of the boys. A collection of $112 was taken up.

IS ALABAMA ON TRIAL?

The State of Alabama is in the midst of the second trial of the negroes in the famous "Scottsboro cases." The state and its people are again to be held up to the scorn of the world as being unwilling to give justice to those negroes. This time the trial has a new setting, more than a hundred miles from the scene of the alleged offense; the jurors are Morgan county citizens, the presiding judge was in no way connected with the former trial. There has been no move indicative of mob violence and no sinister influence to affect the case in favor of the prosecution. There were some suspicious circumstances concerning the disappearence and re-appearence of Ruby Bates, apparently at the instigation of the defense. A verdict of guilty was given against Heywood Patterson, charged with criminal assault on the person of Mrs. Victoria Price. The state through its prosecuting attorneys, its trial judge and its jury has performed its duty, and reasonable men should be satisfied with the verdict.

But the statement of the attorneys for the negro bristled with salty charges. Leibowitz said: "This is an act of bigots, spitting on the tomb of the immortal Abraham Lincoln, 'We will fight with every drop of blood in our veins to free these men because they are innocent—it is only a pity such race hatred should live." Joseph Brodsky, the other New York lawyer associated with Leibowitz, joined in a statement that "only the presence of the national guard prevented a mob from entering Decatur." These lawyers were apparently convinced before coming to Alabama that justice could not be had for these negroes, and nothing could convince them otherwise. Because Alabama seeks to administer its laws for the protection of its citizens against such outrages as charged to these negroes, its courts, its jurors and its citizens are held up to supreme contempt by these abusive lawyers. We are here given some insight why Germany is ridding herself of her Jewish population, they are too race conscious.

So Alabama and her people are again to be branded as persecuters of negroes from Harlem to Moscow by the International Labor council, and Brodsky and Leibowitz (if you can get the import of this?). In our opinion these lawyers either have their minds inflamed with race hatred themselves, or are cheap publicity seekers wanting to keep race hatreds alive. What a pity there is no legal method of dealing with such characters! ~~But Alabamians must be calm~~ notwithstanding this violent propaganda of communistic organizations and unconscionable lawyers, for Alabama is now on trial.

The cry is abroad in the land, to bring the crooks from the high places to an accounting for their misdeeds. The stock manipulater, the crooked financier is being haled before committees and into courts. People are demanding their punishment and that protection be given against their punishment and that protection be given against their unscrupulous methods of fleecing investors and depositors. And this is as should be. Every agency of this government should give its citizens this protection. Yet we have the strange anomaly of states legalizing race track gambling and entering into a partnership with these nefarious interests, whose main purpose is to beat those who play the game." We would punish one set of crooks and throw a legal protection around the other-because the state would profit by revenue from the latter.

The legislature of Florida has a bill before that body to give the money received from the race track associations to the state school fund. Thus would the state help educate her youth with funds arising for the nefarious race track gambling operators, and we presume would inculcate the idea that the "end justifies the means!" The school teachers of Florida would receive their pay at hands of the race track gamblers, and thus would be linked the great educational to the great gambling interest!

The pari-mutual betting which is legalized makes no pretense of being anything else but gambling, and it is the rankest sort, where the bettor hasn't the slightest chance of winning consistently. We hear it said by thinking men that our present financial condition was brought about largely by over speculation, which was a great mistake, yet states would encourage gambling by giving its share of its proceeds to schools. Great moral idea!

'God give us men. A time like demands
Clear minds, brave hearts and steady hands;
Men whom the lust of office does not kill,
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who have opinions and a will,
Men who have honor, men who will not lie."

BENCH WARRANT IS ISSUED FOR ARREST OF YOUTHS SELLING "INSIDE STORY"

PUBLICATION HOPES NINE BOYS WILL BE ELECTROCUTED

By JOHN L. SPIVAK
(Staff Correspondent)

Tuesday Morning—

DECATUR, Ala., Mar. 28—Two boys selling a viciously sensational pamphlet in the lobby of the Morgan Circuit Court on the Scottsboro case were arrested for contempt of court upon Judge Horton's orders this morning, and a bench warrant was issued for the arrest of a man named White of Huntsville, Ala., who printed the pamphlet.

Courier 4-1-33

The publication was particularly vicious, concluding with a hope that the boys on trial will be electrocuted.

Pittsburgh Pa.

The protest against the dissemination of the pamphlet was requested by Chief Defense Counsel Samuel Leibowitz on the ground that it was "a contempt aand effort to influence public sentiment in this county and possibly jurors who may pass through the lobby."

The pamphlet is called "The Unpublished Inside Story of the Infamous Scottsboro Case," by J. Glenn Jordan, and is published in Huntsville, Ala., the home of Virginia Price, one of the two girls who claim to have been attacked.

The pamphlet attacks the International Labor Defense for defending the nine boys. Leibowitz read the attack to the tense court and, in a voice trembling with anger, shouted that if it had not been for the International Labor Defense these boys sitting there would be dead by now!"

Judge Horton ordered all pamphlets sold in the county confiscated and announced that any attempt to influence public sentiment which might be reflected in the jury would be dealt with sternly.

Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr. at first protested against bring the questions of propaganda up in the court, but finally capitulated and offered to prosecute the boys.

Leibowitz protested against jailing the boys, stating that it was not his intention to have the court proceed against youngsters. The defense wanted the court to proceed against the publisher and distributor of the vicious attack. Judge Horton agreed and ordered the bench warrant issued.

While deputies were looking for the boys, John Sanford, the Scottsboro plasterer, was recalled for cross-examination. It was then that Alabama's official attitude toward a "Nigger" became evident for the first time in open court.

The attorney general shouted at the colored witness until Leibowitz jumped up, protesting "Don't stick your finger in my witness' eyes," and demanded that the court order the attorney general to cease bullying the colored witness.

Knight, during the cross-examination, persisted in calling Sanford "John" with the patronizing air of an upper-class Southern white talking to a Negro. Leibowitz dryly suggested that the State's prosecution call the witness "Mister Sanford" with the same courtesy he uses in addressing a white witness.

Knight, short and angry, looked at Leibowitz. "I'm not in the habit of calling them Mister," he snapped.

Comments are heard on all sides of the bravery of colored witnesses coming from Scottsboro to give evidences of their ability to sit on juries. Both whites and Negroes seem to realize, even though somewhat vaguely as yet, that this juncture of the trial is of far-reaching importance to both races, and upon the decision rendered by the court, or perhaps the U. S. Supreme Court, will affect the lives of millions.

This is the first time in the history of the South that this drama is being fought to decide whether the upper white ruling class is to share the operation of its legal machinery with the colored residents in their States and counties.

CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES

The end of the trial of the first of the Scottsboro youths, Haywood Patterson, came in due form and without any physical violence. So much say we for the Court.

Reporter 3-15-33

The disappointment expressed over the verdict might have been milder if the evidence had not thrown light on the affair in a manner to give the defendant the advantage of all doubt in the public mind.

Birmingham, Ala.

The question of the veracity of two young women, we imagine was the point, in the mind of the jury, on which the case turned. Two young women each alleged victims of assault by nine Negroes told the story in diametrically opposite ways as regards the defendant's guilt. To believe the one was to convict; to believe the other was to acquit. The fact that the jury convicted the defendant is inference enough that they believed that a human being could endure the tortures of so heinous a crime, and, under any circumstances not recoil at the presence of the wretch or could speak a word anywhere, in court or out, mitigating the hell fire that should be heaped on her scoundrel assailants.

4-15-33

It seems that it would take a whole heap of "Jew Money" to overbid this sacred personal thing of violation as against any priced bid to buy "Alabama justice."

NEW YORK CITY TIMES

THE DECATUR TRIAL.

Supreme Court Rulings in Similar Cases Are Cited.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Your editorial on "The Decatur Verdict" discussed very fairly the various aspects of the trial. However, it contained the following sentence: "But the final verdict was 'guilty,' and it is now difficult to see how an appeal could lie to the Supreme Court again, or to any higher power except the Governor."

The Supreme Court of the United States has held in several cases that the systematic exclusion of Negroes from jury duty deprives a Negro tried, convicted and sentenced to death by such jury of his life without due process of law. This right was first enunciated by the Supreme Court in ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, a case in which a Virginia judge was convicted of violating a Federal statute which provided that "no citizen, possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law, shall be disqualified from service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." This statute is still in force and is now Section 44 of Title 8 of the U. S. Code Annotated.

In Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, one Strauder, a Negro, was convicted of murd[redacted] Virginia and duly sentenced to death. He appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that by the laws of West Virginia no Negroes were eligible for jury service. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed Strauder's conviction and declared that the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibited racial discrimination in the selection of jurors.

This case was followed by Carter v. Texas, 177 U. S. 442, where the defendant Negro, sentenced to death for murder, alleged that all Negroes were systematically excluded from the grand juries of Texas. Here again the Supreme Court of the United States unanimously reversed his conviction and held that if the defendant Negro showed proof of such systematic exclusion no conviction against him could be had by such unfairly constituted jury. The Supreme Court said (at p. 447): "Whenever by any action of a State, whether through its Legislature, through its courts, or through its executive or administrative officers, all persons of the African race are excluded, solely because of their race or color, from serving as grand jurors in the criminal prosecution of a person of the African race, the equal protection of the laws is denied to him, contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States."

No squarer holdings or clearer precedents could be desired to show that grounds for reversal by the appellate courts exist in "the second Scottsboro case." Counsel for the defense clearly proved, from the reports issued in THE NEW YORK TIMES, that Negroes were systematically excluded from jury duty in Alabama, and this evidence will be before the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal. In fact, it is difficult to see how that court can avoid reversing the Alabama courts in this case.

ON PAGE 217 of this issue, The New Republic prints a digest of a group of letters received from prominent citizens of Alabama regarding the Scottsboro case. When these letters are considered not only for what they say, but for what they omit, they are, in our judgment, the most shocking piece of evidence yet brought forward in regard to this case. They show these men, who by virtue of their position ought to create the public opinion of their state, as almost completely evading that responsibility. Hardly one of them, by his own confession, has taken the trouble to inform himself regarding the facts, although it was easily possible to do so. Only two of them appear to be aware of the decision of the United States Supreme Court holding that the first trial was unfair, and one of these two mentions it only indirectly and ignores its implications. A Representative in Congress seems to assume that the defendants are now being tried for the first time. It may be, of course, that our correspondents are correct: that the United States Supreme Court was in error, that Alabama tribunals are infallible and that a Negro has an equal chance before a white jury ~~with anyone~~ else; but the complacency of their tone is far from encouraging.

ARE NEGROES DISQUALIFIED?

[East St. Louis (Ill.) Daily Journal]

What are the qualifications for a juror? Point is given to an old question by the efforts to save nine Negro youths on trial for their lives on a charge of rape in Georgia. The defendants moved to quash the indictments on the ground that Negroes, despite the 14th and 15th amendments to the Constitution, are excluded from jury service.

The contention of the state was that Negroes are not qualified to serve as jurors even though they may be honest and have an elementary education. J. S. Benson, editor of a weekly paper at Scottsboro, where the alleged crime took place, was called to testify as to the prevailing sentiment of the community.

"I don't think," said Mr. Benson, "that Negroes have been trained for jury duty. I might say the same thing about women, but I know Negroes haven't been trained. They haven't made a study of justice, law and such. I don't believe there are any Negroes in our county that I would care to risk in any case which involved justice and the law."

Mr. Benson knew a Negro storekeeper against whose character he had never heard anything said. "But he wouldn't do. He never studied jury duty a day in his life."

Objection prevented Mr. Benson from saying whether an otherwise qualified Negro was not as suitable material for jury duty as "a white man called for the first time" or an illiterate teamster from the backwoods.

It was a rather embarrassing ordeal for the witnesses who were trying to strengthen the state's contention that Negroes were not qualified to serve. Assigned reasons for excluding them were, of course, not the real reasons.

The real qualifications of a juror are disinterestedness and an ability to weigh evidence. Something is to be said in behalf of the claim advanced by some of the witnesses that white men get an education in "law and justice" by sitting in courtrooms and by discussion at crossroads and country stores. It is probable that whites have such discussions more than do Negroes, but the idea that an intelligent and literate Negro is not qualified for jury duty while an illiterate white man has the qualifications is an assumption so broad as to be dangerous.

LIVING IN THE PAST.

In one of his informative dispatches from Decatur, Alabama, giving a word picture of the trial of the Scottsboro case now in progress, F. Raymond Daniell, correspondent for The New York Times, injected the following extraneous paragraph:

> "The court-room crowd, many of whom know at first or second hand hair-raising tales of conditions here during the reconstruction period following the war between the states, received the court's decision without a sound or murmur."

4-8-33

[illegible]

The thought unintentionally conveyed to readers was: Lee surrendered to Grant at Appomattox nearly seventy years ago, yet there are white people in Alabama whose thinking and acting are largely influenced by past events of half a century and more rather than by present-day conditions.

Two opposing forces are at work in the South. One element is composed of forward-thinging people who realize the futility of the forces of reaction seeking to hold back enlihgtened progress and the clinging to ancient, unworkable traditions; the other is made up of that mass of uneducated, intolerant whites, upon whose emotions unscrupulous politicians play, who are taught superiority is based on the color of one's skin, and whose credo is: "Keep the Negro down!"

The Southerner so fortunate not to be handicapped and weighted down by provincialism, traditions, bigotry and an artificial concept of his exalted station, knows full well it is as impossible to keep down an aspiring race as it is for parents to treat their offspring, despite the passing of years, in the same manner as during adolescence. The exponent of reactionism, on the other hand, never wants to see the Negro grown up, disregarding the law, truth, right and justice to keep his archaic ideas in vogue.

The latter school of thought is typified by Fred Morgan, postmaster of the little town of Eva, Alabama, who objecting to the manner in which Mr. Leibowitz examined prospective jurors, yelled out in open court:

> "Us jurors in Morgan County are not accustomed to taking the charge from the defendant's attorney, and we don't like it."

A Negro child in elementary grades speaks more correct English.

This exhibition of arrogance and effrontery in a court of law is characteristic of those who believe they are the law, and who lynch, beat, discriminate and intimidate in the name of the law. Educating the Negro is very necessary and most helpful toward the promotion of better race relations; but a very important work to be performed if the South is to advance appreciably, is in the education and mental emancipation of those still living in the past.

JUDGE CALLS CHIEF ATTY MILLSTONE AROUND NECKS OF SEVEN ACCUSED YOUTHS

Norfolk, Va.

Trial of Charlie Weems and Other Boys Continued Indefinitely; Nationwide Sentiment Still Aroused

By P. BERNARD YOUNG, JR.
Journal and Guide Staff Writer

Stunned by the stern rebuke of the press and leaders of the world for the inflammatory speeches of prosecutors in the Scottsboro Case and the weirdly arrived-at Palm Sunday verdict of guilty in the trial of Haywood Patterson, first of the nine boys to be retried on the two-year-old charges of rape brought by two hoboing prostitues, Alabama this week sought an "out" in the remaining trials.

Even the heretofore calm and apparently impartial presiding jurist, Judge James E. Horton, has apparently succumbed to the influence of the aroused passions which endangered the lives of the defendants and their lawyers and made certain the verdict of guilty in Patterson's trial in the Morgan County Circuit Court at Decatur.

Judge Horton went thru the formality Monday of imposing sentence on Patterson and immediately ruled that it was necessary to postpone the trials of the remaining youths indefinitely because of the bitter feeling which he attributed to statements made since the returning of the Patterson verdict by Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief defense attorney.

Leibowitz had characterized Alabama whites as "bewhiskered bigots who guffgaw as they sent an innocent man to his death." Judge Horton in ordering the indefinite continuance of the remaining trials asserted that published statements attributed to Leibowitz were "uncalled for" and that as a result of them the attorney "is a millstone around the necks" of the boys.

The judge also took occasion to join with the prosecutors in asserting that "certain sinister influences" are seeking "to stir up and foment strife between the races in the South" and that as a result of them "it had been difficult to try the Scottsboro cases upon the real facts."

Although refusing to say that Patterson's trial verdict was not based upon the "real facts," Judge Horton held that for the present at least "the statement (by Leibowitz) itself must of necessity make impossible any just and impartial verdict" in the second trials of the other boys.

In contrast to the judge's present attitude was his refusal to grant nearly a dozen defense motions for a mistrial during the last three days of Patterson's trial after prosecutors had made blatant and open appeals to every conceivable type of prejudice, climaxed by an attack on 'New York Jews' whose money was seeking to buy justice in Alabama."

Leibowitz and his associates contended at that time that the injection of these prejudicial remarks had spoiled any chance for a just verdict, but Judge Horton disagreed and merely cautioned the jury to disregard the remarks.

Meanwhile, in New York City, where he left a train Monday after receiving word of the judge's action postponing the trials, Leibowitz says he will stand by his charges that the verdict was a decision of bigots.

"Impaling me on a cross of fancied insult to the citizens of Alabama will avail the partisans of weird Morgan County justice nothing," he asserted shortly after returning to his office. "Nor will it divert me or my associates for one moment from the issue which the sovereign state of Alabama must face in this case—equal justice for the colored race.

"As for the rest, the baying pack, the wolves of bigotry who raised the Hitler cry of 'Jew money from New York' because we dared demand a square deal for men whose skin was black, I stand pat.

"They are bigots. Their very faces betoken it."

It will be recalled also that on Saturday, April 8, while the jury was pondering the fate of Patterson and the other defendants were being arraigned, Leibowitz and Joseph R. Brodsky, also of New York, plead for a change of venue and postponement of the cases because of the mortal danger which they said they and the defendants faced as a direct result of the rabble-rousing summation of Wade Wright, Decatur prosecutor, who assisted Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, Jr.

Both motions were overruled, the judge holding that there should be no further delay.

Just before sentencing Patterson, the judge asked him if he had anything to say. Patterson, staring at the bench, simply replied:

Norfolk, Va.

"I ain't had a fair trial. Ain't seen no girls on that train. I ain't had a fair trial."

The judge then pronounced the sentence, stating that the youth should die in the electric chair at Kilby Prison on June 16.

At once Atty. Joseph Brodsky noted an appeal and offered a partial motion for a new trial. This Judge Horton refused, saying that he would not hear motions "piecemeal."

Following this episode, Judge Horton made the statement from the bench censuring Atty. Leibowitz, telling of his own court experiences, and then declaring that "the case of the State of Alabama versus Charlie Weems is continued, and the court so orders."

Judge Horton explained that his act was prompted by his duty to see that the defendants get a fair trial.

Atty. Leibowitz was on his way to Alabama when the judge made his ruling. He returned at once to New York and gave his views on the court's move.

In Decatur Attorney General Knight also came to the defense of the Alabama jurors and inveighed against the New York attorney.

In the meantime, an aroused opinion over the country continues the campaign to secure funds and sentiment which will bring about a change of venue and the successful appeal of the trials to the highest tribunal in the land.

In Norfolk meetings are being held this week by the International Labor Defense, with Richard B. Moore, of New York, as the speaker. Efforts are also being made to have Norfolkians join with delegates from New York and other cities which are to make a protest march to Washington on Friday, April 28, with a petition signed by one million persons and which is to be presented to President Roosevelt.

Even Alabama citizens of both races have been meeting and passing resolutions on the Patterson verdict. Sunday a mammoth mass meeting was held in Birmingham under the Citizens Scottsboro Aid Committee. Speakers included Bishop B. G. Shaw of the A. M. E. Church; Gaines T. Bradford, editor; P. D. Davis, president of the Birmingham Civic Association and Dr Howard Caster, white, southern di fication in various states and to provide working capital. So far as they are informed the receivers say, no group engaged in the effort to reorganize this business has the necessary cash funds.

Was Judge Horton Fair?

The Planet 4-22-33 Richmond, Va.

Many encomiums have been heaped upon Judge Horton who presided over the mock trial at Decatur for his "fairness" in the conduct of the trial. Deeds rather than words should be indicative of whether or not these encomiums are merited. These are the facts:

This upright judge overruled a motion to quash the indictment because Negroes are barred from jury service solely on account of their race and color, and this discrimination in the administration of justice is openly admitted by the prosecution.

This upright judge overruled a motion to declare a mistrial when a prosecuting attorney delivered himself of the most inflamatory and prejudice-breeding statement ever made to a jury in a criminal case involving the life of the accused.

This upright judge overruled a motion to set aside the verdict of the jury as contrary to law and evidence and sentenced a human being to die on evidence that would not, in the judgment of any fair individual, condemn a chicken thief.

This upright judge, putting his benediction upon the pound of flesh demanded and fixing June 16 as the day of sacrifice, paid the following tribute to the grinning men responsible for this hideous injustice:

"It (alleged statement of Leibowitz) was addressed to a panel of highly intelligent jurors, and men who wished to do what was right in the case."

Regardless of the studied oratory used in the charge to the jury and the high-sounding phrases employed to put a coat of veneer on this infamous travesty on justice, the fact remains that if Judge Horton is fair, then the definition of the term has been radically altered and changed.

"Race Hatred Rules Scottsboro Jurors, Noted Author Says." These were headlines in Monday's paper.

The noted author is Mary Heaton Vorse and I take exception to her statement. I am a Northerner, and not one drop of Southern blood runs in my veins. But I have lived among Southerners and have spent much time in the South, and there is NOT Race Hatred there. There is race LINE; but that should never be confused with race hatred.

I am not writing this as a defense of the Scottsboro jurors. I am simply striving to explain a situation which, while it may result in possible miscarriages of justice at times—as do all systems—is not built on hatred.

The Southerners love their "d....," understand them in a way we of the North never can hope to understand them; and whether or not we are in accord with the Scottsboro Jurors who imposed the death penalty upon the Negroes accused as attacking two white girls, it is unfair to our neighbors across the Mason and Dixon line to accuse them of race hatred toward a people who have been their charge and their problem—NOT OURS—since the very earliest days of slavery.

I picked up a Negro boy the other night and took him home. He was cold and hungry and frightened, and wanted to get back to Memphis. "They take keer o' me there," he said, "they doan let me go hungry or without a roof over my haid." And it was true, what he said. Through this terrible depression—and the South suffered cruelly—the white people of the South have shared what they had with their Negro dependents.

For they are USED to caring for them. They know them to be in need of protection and guidance and care. They know, too, that because of their overwhelming numbers and their need of being wisely controlled, the Negro people of the South require a discipline unlike that which is administered in the North. But to say that the inflexible course of the South's unwritten law is evidence of race hatred is going far afield of the truth.

The South's Background

I hope that many readers of "I Dare Say" tonight have read that classic of Southern history, "The Tragic Era," by Claude G. Bowers.

They will better understand how this inexorable law involved in the Scottsboro trial came into being. During the reign of the Carpet-Baggers, when Negro representatives were hoisted into office and power, and duped into betrayal of their best friends, their former masters, SOMETHING HAD TO BE DONE. The plight of the South was not unlike our national plight today; emergency measures were in order. And they were employed. And some semblance of law and order was restored to the prostrate South.

For the laws of our Constitution after the Civil War, and the laws of its Amendments, were curiously NORTHERN in their aspects. The North did not recognize the problems of the South, and there was no legal provision for their solution. So the South was driven to recourse of evasion which slowly fastened upon its social and political fabric and became an integral part of its warp and woof.

One of these unwritten laws governed the attack of white women by Negro men. An inexorable punishment was fixed. And without exception meted out. No redress. No quarter. And it became a part of the very CHEMISTRY of the South. A deep profound CONSCIOUSNESS in the heart of white and black.

Denies Race Hatred

The North can never understand the implacable nature of this Unwritten Law. I have seen this law operate with deadly, quiet, and inevitable certainty. My Northern heart has frozen; but I had the feeling that its inevitability had its source in something deeper than I could understand, and was performed with curious impersonality and detachment. Race hatre, no! Race pity, rather. I cannot explain it, but I KNOW IT TO BE.

The real Southern Negro doesn't live North, if he can help it. The heart of the Northern white man is too cold for him, never mind its formal, cerebral gesture of friendliness. We have bred an altogether different species of Negro in the North: An ambitious, competitive Negro, who has outstripped his Southern brother by generations, so far as acquired characteristics go. But in the South are millions of Negro people curiously naive, childlike, helpless, totally dependent. Like children, they need guardians; like children they need discipline.

This is not a defense of the Scottsboro jurors. This is a defense of the SOUTH itself; for it stands indicted before the world today, and I say that the charges lodged against it are unfair, and have their roots in Northern ignorance of the South and its curiously isolated problems of social safety.

Conference Maps Fight for Rights of Negro Students

Protest Against Discrimination Adopted by 200 Delegates; Plan Gathering in South

NEW YORK.—About 200 Negro and white students and fraternal delegates, representing schools and colleges from the North and South, convened at the Conference on Negro Student Problems held in Columbia University, April 15-17. The conference was called by the National Students' League.

NEGRO-WHITE UNITY.

The delegates, "brought to the realization of the necessity for immediate joint action by Negro and white students for the solution of their problems," adopted a program of militant action.

National Committee Formed.

Resolutions were passed against discrimination, retrenchment in educational expenditures, suppression of academic freedom, unemployment among students and graduates. A firm pledge was adopted "To support all movements and conferences that struggle against oppression of the Negro people by bringing Negro and white together in the fight for Negro liberation." A permanent National Committee for this Defense of Negro Students' Rights was established for that purpose. The National Students' League pledged its full and untiring co-operation with the committee in carrying out this program of action.

Protest for Scottsboro Boys.

Pledging themselves "to carry on a militant struggle against lynching, Jim-Crowism and similar vicious attacks on Negro workers and students," the delegates "demanded the immediate and unconditional release of the innocent Scottsboro boys."

The Southern delegation from Virginia, Alabama, North Carolina, Tennessee, etc., organized a Southern committee to work for the calling of a conference later this year in the heart of the South.

Elect Delegates to March.

Delegates were elected to participate in the Scottsboro March to Washington, to the Tom Mooney Congress in Chicago and to the International Youth Conference to be held in Chicago June 20-23.

Hit Y.M.C.A. Jim-Crowism.

A vigorous protest was adopted against discrimination against Negroes in the Y. M. C. A's, demanding "that Negro students be admitted on the basis of full equality to all facilities which white students enjoy." A copy of the resolution was sent to the Board of Managers of the Central Y. M. C. A. College, 19 South La Salle, Chicago, Ill. The conference urged that other groups send similar protests.

A Negro delegate from Birmingham denounced his city as the "hell-hole of the South" and pointed out the enormous number of murders and lynchings which occurred there, now exceeded only by Memphis, Tenn.

Reinstatement of Expelled Demanded

Special resolutions were adopted demanding the reinstatement of Donald Henderson, expelled from Columbia University, and Prof. Barnhardt, expelled in Birmingham, and various students dismissed from colleges and high schools.

The pledge in full adopted by the Conference follows:

We Pledge Ourselves:

A. To carry on a vigorous fight to destroy all illusions of racial supremacy as fostered by our schools and other educational agencies.

B. To carry on a militant struggle against lynching, jim-crowism and similar vicious attacks on Negro workers and students.

C. To popularize the achievements, the life and culture of the Negro people and make clear the proper role of the Negro people in the history of the world.

D. To serve untiringly in the promotion of the unity of Negro and white students in meeting their common problems.

Resolutions On Immediate Action

1. To hold meetings in each school in order to popularize and publicize the program of action adopted by this conference.

2. To establish clubs where none exist and to utilize existing ones for the furtherance of this program.

3. To spread and distribute throughout the country and through all available agencies of publicity the bulletins of the resolutions adopted and such other factual material as shall be prepared by the National Student Committee for the Defense of Negro Students' Rights.

4. That we send a delegate to the International Negro Youth Conference, to be held in Chicago, Ill., June 20-23, 1933, as the official delegate from this conference, and to make every effort to elect delegates from our respective schools to this conference.

5. To elect three official delegates to the Scottsboro March on Washington initiated by the Amsterdam News, and to work for the election of a maximum number of delegates upon returning to our respective schools.

6. That all efforts be made to further the work of the conference by taking another step forward by calling another conference in the South.

Resolution On Y. M. C. A.

WHEREAS the Central Young Men's Christian Association College has barred from gym and swimming pool privileges Negro students; and whereas this conference has pledged itself to fight against such practices of discrimination;

THEREFORE BE IT RESOLVED that we offer vigorous protest to such discriminatory acts and furthermore we demand that Negro students be admitted on the basis of full equality to all facilities which white students enjoy. Be it further resolved that this conference send a copy of this resolution to the Board of Managers of the Central Y. M. C. A. College, 19 South La Salle St., Chicago, and urge all other groups to send similar protests.

Not a Time for Vituperation

Washington [illegible]

The International Labor Defense sent out last week a release from the pen of Eugene Gordon, one of our outstanding writers, now on the staff of the Boston daily Post. Under the heading, "The Kept Press and the Trial at Decatur," he takes severely to task the white dailies and especially the Associated Press for its biased, or [illegible], distorted, reports of the Scottsboro trial and similar affairs.

All of that seems to the good and Mr. Gordon makes out a good case. However, in his laudable desire to give merited credit to the I.L.D. for the noble and brave work it has done in this and other cases, he takes what seems to be an uncalled for and rather vicious fling at certain officials of the N.A.A.C.P.

In his opening paragraph, he says:

> The present trial of Heywood Patterson at Decatur Alabama, on charges faked up by county officials in and around Scottsboro two years ago, offers one of the best examples ever shown of how Southern "justice" functions in cases involving Negroes.
> Of course, the present trial is somewhat of an exception, because of the part the International Labor Defense is playing in it. It is an exception in that it has, at least to put on a pretense of being "fair" (although the presiding judge and the prosecuting attorney find even this pretense a very bitter dose to swallow).
> If the I.L.D. had not taken the defense completely into its hands (and the hands of the masses of the world, who have raised their angry voices in protest against Alabama's threatened lynching), those nine innocent black boys would have been left to the mercies of the law-abiding Walter White and William Pickens, officials of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. They would have been burned to ashes two years ago, and today would have been forgotten except by class conscious workers.

Of course, had the verdict of the jury been favorable to young Patterson, Mr. Gordon's outburst would not have seemed so unfortunate as it does now, in view of the fact that a long-drawn-out and expensive legal procedure, including perhaps another appeal before the U. S. Supreme Court, is apparently the only hope for Patterson and the others who are yet to be tried, separately, it seems, in the hope maybe of wearing out the I.L.D. and all other defenders of the boys.

Now more than ever, solidarity (the word so revered by the class-conscious workers) is needed, but it can hardly be achieved by such attacks as Mr. Gordon's latest.

And his provocative remarks cannot be justified or excused because persons connected with the N.A.A.C.P. have on occasion made equally unwarranted attacks on those who do not see eye to eye with them in all matters.

Let us argue, and criticise with frankness but with moderation—while we present a "united front" against our numerous enemies.

Heywood Broun Raps Decatur; Walter Winchell Lauds Leibowitz

Scottsboro Case No Local Issue, Thinks Broun, Dixie Lynches Negroes; Harlem and Chicago Herd Them Together and Breed Tuberculosis.

New York newspaper columnists jumped into the Scottsboro rape of justice case last week with their pens flaying the decision and praising Samuel Leibowitz for his work in the case. 4-22-33

In his usual form, Heywood Broun held no quarter for the South. He writes:

Baltimore Md.

"A clipper ship came down the tide and cast her anchor over. She rode the long swell and waited for boats from the blazing coast to bear her black slaves. When they were below deck she picked up her pin and headed for America.

"That was more than two hundred years ago. Sunday in Decatur, Ala. a jury of 12 white men brought in a verdict of death against Haywood Patterson. The attorney-general of the great sovereign state referred to him as 'that thing.'

"They say it was a quiet courtroom and a gentle day down in Morgan County when the jury filed in after 24 hours of deliberation. But could none of them hear the wind in the rigging of the slave ship, the creaking of her timbers and the cries of the cargo?

Own Damnation

"That ghostly ship has steered her course around our coasts and even up into the back waters time innumerable. She seeks in vain a final haven. We, the grandsons and great-grandsons of the slaves of the slavers, are not appeased. We have not forgiven the Negro. It is less difficult to forgive your enemies, but the persecution of the Negro continues because we have wronged him so vastly and so vitally. We are bound to the wheel of our damnation and try to stave it off with silly postures and cruel antics. Fear grips us, and we sheer off even from an act of simple justice.

Not Even a Man

"Attorney-General Knight could not even bring himself to admit that he was in the presence of a man on trial for his life. He had to take refuge in such a phrase as 'that thing.' He was afraid of the facts. He had reason to fear.

"There was much panicky talk in the speeches of the men who pressed the case. 'Show them that Alabama justice cannot be bought and sold with Jew money from New York!' cried Solicitor Wright at one point in the trial. And the attorney-general, after deploring the injection of prejudice by his associate in the summation, went on to say—'If you acquit this Negro put a garland of roses around his neck, give him a supper and send him to New York City. There let Dr. Harry Fosdick dress him up in a high hat and morning coat, gray striped trousers and spats.'

"And that was because Dr. Fosdick had told Ruby Bates to face the danger of return and go back to confess that she lied when first she accused the Negro boys. And that was because the attorney-general was afraid.

Life at Stake

"If human life were not at stake this Scottsboro case might take rank with the most inspired of all extravaganzas, but the shadow of the chair falls across such ironic ribaldries as the conviction of a Negro field hand on the ground that Alabama does not like the modes and manners of New York City. Instead of a crown of thorns Alabama's rhetoric pressed down a high hat upon this poor laborer.

"But the irony of the situation swings wide beyond the borders of the state where the trial was held. Does the learned counsellor from the Southland actually believe that the song of the slave ship never floats above the roofs of Harlem? Instead of the fantastic festival outlined by the prosecutor, what would New York really have to offer any Haywood Patterson? Morning coats and garlands? Not exactly. The great and free city of New York would afford him an opportunity to share a three-room apartment with nine or ten of his fellows. And only with the best of luck would he be able to pay the rent.

"The South imposes rather more lynchings, legal and otherwise. New York and Chicago take it out in tuberculosis.

"We have no right to sit in the seats of the scornful. Nor is it the part of wisdom to think of the Scottsboro case as a local issue. We will get nowhere if comment merely takes the form of attacks upon the legal machinery of Alabama and charges that Decatur opinion is blinded by bigotry. That would merely be a matter of the mote calling the beam black.

Wise Words

"As a matter of fact, some wise words were spoken during the trial. 'The world at this time and in many lands is showing intolerance and showing hate. It seems sometimes that love has almost deserted the human bosom. It seems that hate has taken its place.. Wrong dies and truth forever lasts and we should have faith in that.'

"That was said by the judge—James E. Horton. Well, Your Honor, when it comes time to pass sentence how are you going to plead? Remember that you and all the rest of us are on trial for our faith, our integrity and our lowest common decency. What say you? Guilty or not guilty?

"Speak up, man! Let us all speak up and prove that we are not guilty of this monstrous thing. Let us scuttle the slave ship in forty fathoms and stop that whine of the wind in its rigging.

Legal Immortal

Walter Winchell writes:

SAMUEL LEIBOWITZ, New York City: My Dear Sir—I orchid you for daring to try one of the toughest assignments a man ever undertook. Regardless of the outcome of the alleged trial, you've already carved your name on the list of Legal Immortals. Despite all the handicaps a lawyer ever encountered—you presented a masterful case and the very fact that they and laughing when they brought in their verdict to send an innocent youngster to his death shows what you were up against. Of course, in that sector of these United States the Negroes might be a problem—but that certainly is no excuse for condemning innocent people.

"When that startling story of the frameup was unfolded by one of the gals, I hoped you'd rate a mistrial, and again when that overzealous district attorney spoke of 'Jew money' in the case, I thought the judge might easily have chucked it out. But perhaps I don't savvy court procedure down there. They say that no matter whereabouts in Alabama the case is tried, the result will be the same.

"Anyway, Mr. Leibowitz, this case you've lost has done more to make a really important attorney out of you than all those countless victories you had in the courts in this Big Burg. When the historians jot down your Life Story, counselor, those brownskins and black will play bigger parts than the Capones et al. that you Darrowed."

Attorney Samuel Leibowitz Tells Throng At Scottsboro Protest Meeting Of His Part In Case

Age 4-22-33
New York N.Y.

Harlem Citizens Form Defense Committee To Aid Fight by Raising Money; $204.84 Given Rev. J. W. Brown, Treasurer

"The Scottsboro boys shall not die!"

This is the ringing challenge to Alabama's verdict to legally murder Haywood Patterson, one of nine boys whom Southern "justice" has made world famous—all found "guilty" of raping two white female tramps on a freight train.

Speaking before a tense audience that jammed every foot of available space at a protest meeting called at the instance of the Int. Preachers at Salem M. E. Church, 129th street and Seventh avenue, last Thursday afternoon, Samuel Leibowitz, brilliant, courageous chief defense counsel for the nine youths, promised "with every drop of blood in my body, with the help of God and with the help of the good citizens of America, the Scottsboro boys shall not die!"

A New Emancipation

Mr. Leibowitz echoed the potent will of an awakened consciousness and embittered feelings of Negroes throughout the nation, who demand a new emancipation. The crowd shouted, cheered and applauded when the man who risked his life in the cause of justice, said, "I am a Jew. I am proud of the fact that I am a Jew . . . But above all I am a human being!"

He declared he was thrilled with the "joy and blessed peace of mind by fighting for justice for fourteen million people of America."

"This case is not on trial before the court of Decatur," he continued. "But before the Court of the World . . . I say before you now from this platform in the House of God, they WILL not die!"

The meeting was arranged by Rev. Richard Manuel Bolden contributing editor to The New York Age and pastor of First Emmanuel Church, 105 West 130th street, one of the first members of the press to interview Attorney Leibowitz when he returned to New York last week from Alabama.

The attorney has been working in cooperation with the International Labor Defense, affiliated with the Communist Party. At the meeting Attorney Leibowitz repeated the fact that he was not receiving any fee, and told of the great handicap the defense had endured for lack of funds.

$100 In Ten Minutes

Mr. Leibowitz had previously given Rev. Bolden permission to call the meeting, not alone to protest, but for the express purpose of permitting organizations not affiliated with the Communist Party to raise a fund which would be turned over to Mr. Leibowitz to help defray the co of securing records, transportatio expenses for witnesses, etc.

Presiding at the meeting, Rev. L Ward Nichols, president of the Interdenominational Ministers of New York and vicinity, appealed to th aroused audience for cash, and on hundred raine don the table withi ten minutes. About $170 was donated to the fund, to which about $3 previously collected was added. The total $204.84 was placed in the hands of Rev. J. W. Brown, pastor of Mother A. M. E. Zion Church, one of the speakers, and treasurer of the Leibowitz Defense Fund. These and additional funds will be given to Mr. Leibowitz personally, said Rev. Brown, to help tear out this "black page in "the history of American civilization."

Mrs. Jane Patterson, mother of Haywood Patterson, briefly addressed the meeting, expressing her thanks and appreciation for the help rendered to free her boy, and she expressed confidence that "I will get my son some day."

"I say to this mother," shouted Mr. Leibowitz, turning to Mrs. Wright, and then turning to the audience: "and to all other mothers of America that there is no greater cause, for Jew or Gentile, black or white,—than to give this mother back her boy!"

Toward the end of the meeting a committee was formed to systematize the collection of funds: Rev. Nichols, chairman; Rev. J. W. Brown, treasurer; the Reverends A.

Clayton Powell, A. C. Garner,
liam Lloyd Imes, Lorenzo H.
Richard M. Bolden, W. A. By Jersey City, J. G. Robinson o adelphia, F. A. Cullen, and
R. C. Lawson.

Also, Fred R. Moore, Henry W. Fraft, William Schiffman, J. D. Steele, Edward Smalls, Connie Immerman Herman Starks, Charles Buchanan, Junius M. Green, Alexander King, Rufus Atkins, Joshua Williams Joseph Brown, William "Bojangles" Robinson, Dan Healy, Mesdames Alice Campbell, Rosa L. Blocker and C. Cabiness Saunders, and Drs. E. P. Roberts and P. M. H. Savory.

Mr. Leibowitz briefly sketched the story from the time he was asked to take the case to date. "I told that (defense) committee after I had decided to take the case that if those boys are innocent heaven and hell can't pull me off that fight." The attorney said he had been warned against the Ku Klux Klan, to which he gave the reply "You can't scare this boy from the sidewalks of New York." He went on a personal tour of investigation, stopping at Montgomery, the capital of Alabama, where he was shown the beautiful marble and limestone courthouse, and heard the Southerners pridefully boast of the Confederacy.

He said he spoke to those Southern "gentlemen" of the fine courthoues in New York City which bears the inscription he quoted to them: "The true administration of Justice is the Firmest Pillar of Good Government." Referring to the Latin words on the seal of the State of Alabama, "Here we rest," Mr. Leibowitz said it should read "Here we rot."

The Law's "Protection"

Mr. Leibowitz then recounted an incident which he said was related to him by one of the Scottsboro boys, Leroy Wright, in the presence of Raymond Daniel, reporter for the New York Times. Wright told them that after he had been taken off the Scottsboro train and thrown in jail, a state militiaman came into his cell and cut him with the bayonet on his gun, tearing a piece of flesh from his cheek, and as if that were not enough the militiaman struck him over the head with the butt of the gun! The audience groaned when this was mentioned.

"A Southern gentleman—as Southern "gentlemen" go told me," said the speaker, "that he himself had a good 'nigger', and that he believed that the 'niggers' in the Scottsboro case had had a fair trial. I said to myself, 'I'll take care of that proposition.' "

He disclosed the fact that Prosecutor Thomas E. Knight, jr., attorney general of Alabama, is the son of the Alabama Supreme Court and that the father had dissented from the first lynch-verdict. Speaking with Knight, he said he suggested that all tre boys be tried together, but Knight replied, "no, I'm going to pick out one that I like." "I told him then," said Mr. Leibowitz, "If you intend to persecute these boys, I'll make you try every one of them separately, if it takes the last penny I have in the world!"

Mr. Leibowitz said that the defense alwyers felt that an Alabama attorney would be a handicap as chief counsel because of the intense race preudice in the environmnt of the court. He said he did not expect a fair trial in such an atmosphere, but that they desired to presevre the rights of the defendants by carefully laying the basis for an appeal to the higher courts in case of a conviction.

"Also, we had to prove legally that Negro citizens, no matter how decent, educated, upright and honest had been denied jury service in the State of Alabama. This task met with every obstacle known to legal science," he said.

Hunderds Qualified

From 200 to 250 Negroes, one with four college degrees, from the professional and business life of Alabama, were subpoenaed and testified to their qualifications on the witness stand. "They deserve a tribute from you," he said.

"We proved that these men were just as qualified as any white man in the State of Alabama," he said. "What could the judge say? nothing! He was forced to admit that the defense had made out a prima facie case. It was the first time since the Civil War that a Southerner had dared admit that."

"The prosecutor called one witness, Tidwell, jury commissioner. I asked him why he claimed Negroes were not qualified for jury service, and this was his reply.

"This is an American Court. No 'niggers' are qualified. All 'niggers' are thieves."

"Now what is the United States Supreme Court going to say to that? No Southern lawyer would have dared make this jury challenge, because his practice would have been ruined, and he would have been driven out of town on a rail. It took a Northern man to do it, who had no bigotry tied to his tongue."

Mr. Leibowitz repeated the charge that both Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, the accusers were prostitutes but that Bates had not sunk as low as Price. The Price woman had even told the jury the exact calibre of the guns which she said the boys used to compel them to submit to assault, but Price admitted to the defense attorney, he said, that she had never seen or held a gun and did not even know the meaning of the word "calibre."

The attorney also remarked upon the testimony of Dr. Bridges, white, a witness for the State, who declared that after an examination of the two women they could not possibly have been assaulted at the time they said they were. Also, Judge James E. Horton pleaded with the jury "almost on bended knee" to bring in a verdict only on the evidence and uncolored by prejudice,—but the jury came out laughing and sneering a verdict of guilty with death the penalty in the face of conclusive, irrefutable evidence; no, in total disregard of evidence.

When Lynch Mobs Marched on Decatur

By JOHN L. SPIVAK.

II.

DECATUR, Ala.—Judge Horton had verified the mob movements upon the defense attorneys and the Scottsboro boys, but the [illegible] effect [illegible] on the part of those whites in the audience. Some smiled—hard, cynical smiles. The soldiers are Southerners. They would shoot Southern white men to save "niggers" and a couple of Jews.

Daily Worker 3/22/33

The judge had to say that for the record. You hear that everywhere. "The judge had to say that for the record."

The town is tense. Even Captain Burleson, usually smiling and cheerful, has a worried, harrassed look. He no longer sits near the jury box with his back to the spectators. He sits on the judge's bench, scanning the spectators closely, his left hand on the bench and his right dropped carelessly at his side. When you walk by casually you notice that hidden behind the judge's bench he has opened the clasp of his leather holster. Even a split second may count. He must be expecting trouble.

Then we learn what happened. Fifty white men from Scottsboro, reported to be heavily armed, are in Decatur. No one knows how many are in the court room. If Burleson knows he has not said a word. He sits there, hunched, tense, his eyes roving across the set, hard faces of the spectators.

Ruby Bates and Lester Carter have given their startling testimony. Ruby, in her quiet, soft voice, confessed that her story of being raped was a lie. Victoria Price, the hard-faced, hard-voiced woman, had urged her to lie, he said.

It was an amazing thing for a Southern white woman to do: to state publicly before hundreds of Southern white men, that she did not want to see "niggers" burned.

These white men could not understand it, could not understand a white woman who would call another white woman a liar to save nine "niggers".

"Lynch Bates and Carter!"

It was incredible. To accept her word meant that the famous case built on the framed word of a prostitute crashed. The hatred against the "niggers" swerved to hatred of this white woman who called another white woman a liar to save "niggers". Ruby Bates was the liar, not Victoria Price. Ruby Bates with her new but cheap little coat and hat, and Lester Carter with his $11 suit. They had been bought. They had betrayed the South and Southern womanhood, and a mad fury seethed against them.

Newspapermen covering the trial had arranged with men in Huntsville and Scottsboro, for a consideration, for telephone calls in case mobs started to form in these two centers. Now the phones are ringing.

"Huntsville is arming itself. The whole town is preparing to march on Cornelia Court and lynch Ruby Bates and Lester Carter."

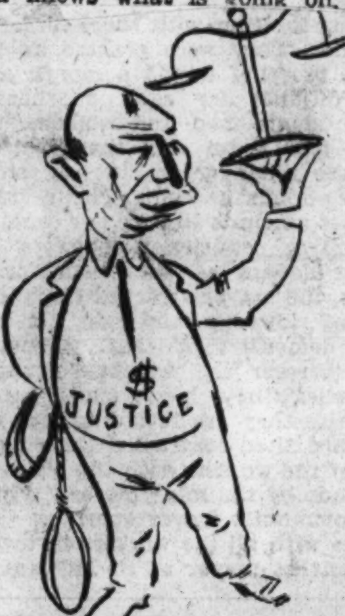
The word spreads rapidly. Huntsville is arming itself. Decatur hardware stores we knew had sold out their supply of arms and munitions. But Huntsville, the home of Ruby Bates and Victoria Price, was a cauldron of race hatreds.

"If I Leave Here Alive . . ."

Captain Burleson, too, received reports of the rising populace in Huntsville. He appears at Cornelian Court with a squad of seven soldiers who immediately surround it. Ruby Bates and Lester Carter are in Joseph Brodsky's apartment, unaware of the proposed attempt to lynch them. Or, if they are aware, they are not afraid, for while the mobs are gathering in Huntsville and Scottsboro to seek their lives I talk with her and she says wistfully:

"I'm going to write to my mother when I leave here—if I leave here alive."

I wonder if this nineteen year old child knows what is going on, but her eyes are clear and her voice steady. If she knows, she is not afraid.



A soldier appears at Brodsky's apartment.

"The Attorney-General would like to see Mr. Leibowitz."

More soldiers are arriving. A truck with seven more guardsmen, their pockets bulging with extra cartridges pull up with shrieking brakes. The men are hastily stationed in the darkest corners of Cornelian Court. Everyone is grim, serious, tense.

Sheriff "Bud" Davis and several deputies arrive. They are no longer grinning and smiling, assuring everyone that Decatur is peaceful.

Taken Away.

Residents in Cornelian Court who have nothing to do with the Scottsboro case are switching off their lights. Apartments are dark. Only those of the defense counsel and the prosecution and the newspapermen are lighted. The area grows more tense with the passing minutes. Here, any moment, the first of the new battles for Negro liberation may occur.

Leibowitz, Knight, the Attorney-General's assistant, Tom Knight, the sheriff and Burleson approach the little group of newspapermen speaking in hushed voices. The Attorney-General's sharp face is deeply lined.

Leibowitz speaks first. His voice is grave:

"Gentlemen, we are going to take you into our confidence and trust that you will co-operate with us. Two mobs are on the way here from Huntsville and Scottsboro set upon getting Ruby and Lester Carter. We are taking them away to another place and we hope that you will not follow us to learn where we are taking them. Their lives are at stake."

Attorney-General Knight speaks:

"Mr. Leibowitz and I have had a consultation. We hope to forestall this mob action. We are doing everything humanly possible to keep this town quiet, but we must protect these witnesses as well as the attorneys. I agree with Mr. Leibowitz and ask that you do not follow the cars taking Ruby Bates and Lester Carter to a place of safety."

The newspapermen assure them that they will not follow the cars. They do not want to see either the boy or the girl hanging from the limb of a tree.

"Too Late, General!"

The Attorney-General expands.

"There will be no trouble," he repeats. "Every step possible has been taken to forestall this mob coming here. I ask you now, for the sake of the good name of Alabama, not to mention a word of this. It would give the State a black eye."

The newspapermen stare at him blankly. The Attorney-General of the state of Alabama is asking the press to suppress the news of mob action, to suppress the news that a whole town has risen with blood lust in its heart and a contempt for the much advertised law of the state.

One of the newspapermen speaks:

"It's too late, General. Three of us have already telephoned to New York that the mob is on the way and is expected within half an hour."

The thin lines of the Attorney-General becomes sharper.

"Well", he says slowly, "if you have already telephoned, then of course it is too late. It is too bad. But there will be no trouble."

He turns to a New York Daily News photographer whose camera is turned on the soldiers around the court.

"Please, don't take these pictures."

"General," the photographer returns mildly, "I am here to take pictures. But I will co-operate with you like the rest of the fellows. I will agree not to take these pictures if nothing happens, but I cannot agree to suppress pictures if shooting starts."

"There will be no shooting," Knight repeats almost hysterically.

"Only a Nightmare."

There was no shooting. In the morning we learned that sheriff's deputies and soldiers had gone out on the Huntsville-Athens road and stopped every car and truck with more than three or four men in it to search for arms. The mob was turned back. The state of Alabama did not want the story to get out that mobs had started out to lynch the defense attorneys. Ruby and Lester Carter.

When the advancing mob was only a bad nightmare, Knight, Burleson, the sheriff and all the state's officers were cheerful and grinning. They forgot that they had pleaded desperately for the press to suppress the story.

In the morning there were no mobs. There never had been any mobs.

The mobs became phantoms of the imagination, and the newspapers carried stories that a careful search of Huntsville and Scottsboro failed to "disclose any of the reported mob action" and the world was asked to believe that Morgan County was a tranquil, law-abiding place where the residents wanted to see that the Scottsboro boys got a fair trial!

Out of the Depths of an Aroused People

Daily Worker

New York, N.Y.

As the lynchers in the conviction of Haywood Patterson once more affirm their determination to execute the Scottsboro boys, the toiling masses prepare to answer this brutal challenge.

Out of the depths of the people, Negro and white, comes the spontaneous resolution to march upon the very center of American capitalist rule, Washington, with the mass demand that the Scottsboro boys shall not die.

The aroused millions will send their representatives, to lay down before the capitalist government their defiance of the lynchers. The Negro people, in firmly welded solidarity with the white workers, send back their answer to the Scottsboro verdict, which is an expression of their national oppression. They demand the return of their nine Scottsboro boys from the hands of the Southern lynch butchers. They demand their liberation as a people.

They demand that the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth amendments be enforced by the government. They demand that all Jim Crowism be punished by the government. They demand that the Army and Navy be used, not to protect lynch mobs, but to enforce the provisions of the Civil War amendments, for which thousands of Negro and white workers gave their lives.

The Negro and white masses will march upon Washington. But already agents of the ruling class are trying to penetrate the ranks of the marchers. Tammany Hall, which gets fat upon the hideous Jim Crow Ghettoes of Harlem, suddenly weeps crocodile tears over the Scottsboro boys. Tammany sends its tools, black and white, among the people to distort the purpose of the historic march, to turn it into a supplicating and meek "delegation" which will whine before Roosevelt for mercy.

For decades, the Negro misleaders have been crawling before the Presidents as they have filed in and out of office. Contemptuously they have been listened to, while the lynchers continued to murder, and the plantation masters continued to sweat their Negro slaves.

The present march upon Washington is not some boot-licking delegation. It is the aroused power and anger of the people who are preparing to destroy the lynch system of National oppression.

And yet the funds of a practically bankrupt state must be expended in a continuous effort to make it seem to be justified.

Evidently, the truth has been the foreign element in this case and the method of establishing it has been quite as foreign to the best social principles and practices. But the looming thought in the individual mind is the protest of one of the alleged victims to the effect that she had not been attacked, (if she had been), or that she had been attacked and could or would, under the circumstances, deny it. One can more easily understand the motivation of her testimony in the first trial, if she had not been wronged than the motive of her testimony in the second trial if she had been wronged.

Considering the nature of the case, the former would have been easy while the latter would have been as practically impossible as it was humanly improbable.

To our mind it is dealing with womanhood with less gentleness than art demands for its security. So much might be said on this to reveal the blindness of set prejudice and to prove how much men do of the things they strive to prevent in the effort at doing them.

The whole complex problem of race relations has been made by the white man in a studied and sometimes a feverish effort to enjoy his superiority without paying the price for his fun or taking the responsibility for the results of his doings. The lamentable thing is that with all of his science and superior intelligence he does not seem to be able to see the reaction of his errors or to be willing to take them into account in his calculations when the results appear to be against his liking. There is no ultimate inevitable thing that is not just and right.

Error is the upsetting troublesome thing every where, and it is always carried forward in the balance to make new and more complicated problems when it is not cast at some stage in one's calculations. It is impossible to worship error and embrace truth in a seance devoid of hypocritical sentiments. It must not be overlooked that in the midst of the scenes of this trial the outstanding figure of a just and courageous Alabama jurist stands to claim the encomiums of his fellowmen for a clean job.

Without him or another such as he, and, we think few such to have been available, there might have been a different story. A judge could have done no more in his situation.

His opportunity for indefinite postponement came at a time and under circumstances such as any conscientious jurist might have envied and the fact that he seized it is another evidence of his sagacity.

It is not too much to say that there are many of his kind but it is too much to say that they are often available for this type of duty.

It is true also that he has moral support of thousands, and in that fact, as in him, lies the hope of the solution to all such problems.

SCOTTSBORO TRIALS POSTPONED

Reporter 4-22-33
Birmingham, Ala.

Indefinite postponement came as a surprise to both the defense and the prosecution Monday morning when the Scottsboro trials were resumed after the conviction and sentencing of Haywood Patterson, first of the nine youths to be tried.

The reason for indefinite postponement as stated by Judge Horton was that it would be impossible to get a fair trial in the atmosphere made as the aftermath of the trial already concluded.

The appeal of Patterson will stay his execution until the Supreme Court of Alabama, and, perhaps, the Federal Supreme Court, shall have passed on the merits of the appeal.

In the meantime, public sentiment in favor of the youths has been strengthened by the revelations of the last trial and the agitation characteristic of such occasional cases has increased.

The view of the outside world is becoming clear on Alabama justice. Its sympathy with such efforts to uphold its wornout traditions is being reversed by the unmistakable evidences of prejudice. Too much recently has the spotlight been turned on the flimsy texture of prejudicial fabric—fabric too flimsy to hold and conceal the traversty of justice that prejudice always makes apparent.

Million Pennies to Aid Scottsboro Defense

Daily Worker
New York, N.Y.

NEW YORK.—A drive for a "million pennies from the Negro and white workers of the country" to be used in defeating the effort of the white Southern ruling class to lynch the nine Scottsboro boys was launched today by the International Labor Defense.

"Save the Scottsboro Boys" stamps, in sheets of 100, to sell at one cent a stamp, have been issued in the campaign for the defense funds. The record of the appeal from the lynch verdict for Haywood Patterson, first of the boys tried [illegible] De-catur, Ala., [illegible] will cost $5,000 William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense, said yesterday. Additional money is required for the necessary steps through which the safety and freedom of the boys will be obtained.

The International Labor Defense appealed to the workers everywhere to send their pennies to national headquarters, 80 East 11th St., New York, for their stamps.

It urged that those able to do so to send $1 for a sheet of stamps so that they can resell them to their fellow-workers.

Already many Negro and white churches, schools, trade unions and other organizations have enlisted in the campaign for a million pennies.

In numerous Southern schools, according to the I. L. D., teachers showed the stamps to the children attending classes and explained the issues underlying the Scottsboro case; and many of the children eagerly bought stamps "to save the nine innocent Scottsboro boys."

In other places, lodges, Negro as well as white veteran associations, groups of workers in factories, hotels and stores, the stamps are being sold.

Leibowitz Says Decatur Lynch Hot Before Trial

Letter to Horton Points to State's Program of Lynch Incitement

New York, N.Y.

NEW YORK.—A letter to Judge James E. Horton of Decatur, taking exception to his attempt to place responsibility for the prejudice and lynch-hysteria of Decatur and Northern Alabama upon the defense of the Scottsboro boys, was made public yesterday by Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief trial attorney for the International Labor Defense in the Scottsboro cases.

"You are quoted in one of the leading metropolitan journals as follows:" Leibowitz writes.

"'The statement (referring to remarks attributed to me concerning the jury that convicted Patterson) must of necessity make impossible any just and impartial verdict to be arrived at at this time.'"

Recalls First Trials

In this long letter, Attorney Leibowitz answers the lynch-court judge's remarks:

"The prejudice you refer to was there long before the trials were transferred to Decatur. This prejudice . . . was first manifested when these poor unfortunates were hurried through the machinery of justice at Scottsboro to the tune of 'There'll be a hot time in the old town tonight.' You will recall that these defendants were represented by a local Scottsboro lawyer.

"The prejudice was intensified by the motion made to quash the indictment and the venire because of the systematic exclusion of Negroes from service upon juries, solely because of their color. . . . Your statement that the defense 'had made out a prima facie case' will go down in history as a momentous declaration.

"This prejudice was intensified when young men stood at the entrance to the Decatur courtroom and hawked pamphlets ending in a ringing plea 'that Alabama and the world will finally see justice claim its own and the Negroes receive their just deserts, death in the electric chair. . . . The chief prosecutor made no attempt to punish the perpetrators of this outrageous act. . . .

". . . The prejudice you speak of was intensified by the Attorney General when he applauded vociferously with his hands, leaped in the air like a frenzied rooter at a football game, and shouted with glee at a point which he thought a witness had made that was favorable to the prosecution. During the entire trial, as you well know, your attention was called to his smirking and sneering behavior, to his bully-ragging of witnesses, and to a general deportment which prejudiced the unfortunate defendant before the bar. . . .

National Scottsboro March Recruiting on for Capital Trek Action Committee Reports

Daily Worker 4-20-33

New York N.Y.

Scottsboro Parade in Harlem Saturday State Communist Positi at St. Luke's Tonight

NEW YORK.—Concrete directions for carrying out the Free the Scottsboro Boys March to Washington were issued last night by the National Scottsboro Committee of Action from its headquarters at 119 W. 135th St.

Among the members of the National Committee of Action are: William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense; A. J. Muste, of the Conference for Progressive Labor Action; Roger Baldwin, of the American Civil Liberties Union; Rev. A. Clayton Powell, of the Abyssinian Baptist Church; Samuel Patterson, of the Caribbean Union; Hamilton Lodge, of the Odd Fellows; Harry Heywood of the Communist Party; Mrs. E. J. West, of the N.A.A.C.P. local; Bishop Collins of the Episcopal Synod; James W. Ford, of the Trade Union Unity League; J. Dalmus Steele, of the Elks; Heywood Broun, of the Socialist Party; W. C. Handy, famous Negro composer, J. B. Matthews, of the Fellowship of Reconciliation.

"This mass march has as its objective to place before the government authorities in Washington the demand for the immediate, unconditional and safe release of the nine Scottsboro boys, and to put forward for adoption by Congress of an act for the enforcement of the constitutional guarantees for the Negro people as set forth in the 13th, 14th and 15th Amendments to the Constitution." the program of the march announces.

"Mass marches shall be organized from the following cities: New York, Newark, Jersey City, Trenton, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk and Richmond. From other cities that are far from Washington, delegations will be elected to go to the capital representing workers' organizations, fraternal organizations and various Negro bodies.

"The march is to be a peaceful but vigorous and militant demonstration of the solidarity of Negro people and white masses in the demand for the immediate freedom of the Scottsboro boys and the enforcement of all rights guaranteed the Negro people by the Constitution. Unquestionably provocative measures will be resorted to by the forces of reaction, bigotry and prejudice and their agents, in an attempt to discredit the march and to distort its purposes. All marchers are warned to be vigilantly on guard against such attempts."

Route of March

"The route of the march shall be as follows: The New York contingent shall leave Union Square at 10 a. m. April 26th. This contingent should arrange to arrive at Trenton at 4 o'clock, being joined by the Jersey City, Newark and other New Jersey contingents there, arriving in Philadelphia the evening of the same day. The marchers will remain overnight in Philadelphia. They will leave Philadelphia together with the Pennsylvania contingent on the morning of April 27 and arrive in Baltimore in the late afternoon of the same day. The marchers will then remain overnight in Baltimore. They will leave Baltimore in the early morning of April 28 and arrive in Washington not later than 12 noon the same day. In the case of the Baltimore contingent, they will either attach themselves to the New York, New Jersey and Philadelphia contingents or arrangements shall be made that they leave by foot in advance of the other contingents in order to arrive about 12 noon in Washington. The Norfolk and Richmond marchers shall make arrangements to arrive in Washington at 10 a. m., April 28. This also applies to the delegations from all other cities where mass marches are not being arranged. In every city where the marchers arrange to stop overnight, street demonstrations and meetings shall be arranged to greet them. Special emphasis must be made on these demonstrations taking place in Negro neighborhoods and recruiting there additional forces to the march.

Feeding of Delegates.

"Each organization, including neighborhood committees, should make provision for the feeding of its own delegates on the march. Organizations are advised, however, to give no guarantee on this point. A special committee should be set up in each organization for this purpose. It must be understood that individual marchers who register and join the march must take care of themselves during the period of the march. It is impossible for the National Action Committee to assume responsibility for this task, or to give any guarantees about the feeding of the marchers.

Scottsboro Funds.

"Especially during the period of the march the greatest intensification of work in connection with raising finances for the Scottsboro case shall be undertaken. Full force should be thrown behind the National Tag Days, organized by the I. L. D., on April 28, 29, 30. Only the I. L. D and the National Scottsboro Action Committee are authorized to receive funds in connection with the defense of the Scottsboro boys (the I. L. D and the National Scottsboro Action

Defense Means Business

"The prejudice, already existing, was highly intensified when the Solicitor for Morgan County, Wade Wright, referred to 'Jew money from New York,' to Lester Carter as 'Carterinsky,' and to Mr. Brodsky of defense counsel as 'the creature with the long nose and pack on his back.'

"Prejudice was highly intensified when the Attorney General, pointing at the defendant during his argument to the jury, referred to him as 'that thing.'

"Again evidence of bigotry and hatred towards the Negro and anyone who attempts to get a measure of justice for him, was most graphically demonstrated by Attorney General, when in his address to the jury he offered as a reason for not calling important Negro witnesses, the fact that:

"'We in the South do not call a nigger to corroborate a white witness no matter who the white witness may be.'

"The prosecution must now realize that we mean business; that we will not pussyfoot on the Constitutional question and that we will fight honorably and diligently for the freedom of nine innocent men."

knew was a member of the S.P.D.

"Haven't you read it yet, Kurt?—the Police President of Berlin to his people?" said Tolle bitterly as he picked up the paper again. "I feel ashamed as hell to think that such a swine belongs to my party." He spat the juice of his tobacco through the open door of the hut.

Kurt took the Vorwarts, and while he read fury overcame him.

". . . So according to the will of the Communists blood is to flow in the streets of Berlin on the 1st of May! That must never be! And therefore I again point out with the greatest emphasis that the existence of the ban on all open-air demonstrations in Berlin is due in small degree to the complicity of the Communists. Whoever in defiance of this ban attempts to make the streets the playground of his political passions must fully understand that he runs grave risks for himself and his followers. I appeal urgently to the peaceloving population of Berlin, especially to women and children, not to participate in any attempted demonstration, not to stay on the streets unnecessarily, and to support the measures taken for the maintenance of law and order.—Zorgiebel."

The other workers looked at Kurt. He was organizer for the revolutionary trade union opposition and had gained a great deal of respect among his colleagues through his determined stand for the workers. Eight days ago he had been unanimously elected as delegate of the workers on the May Day Committee.

Kurt dropped the paper and looked up. "Boys! that's a fine fellow. He wants to shoot us down and announces beforehand that only the Communists are to blame!"

THEY ELECT DELEGATES

Outside the whistle of the foreman sounded. Some rose and went towards the door.

"Just wait a minute, chaps," called out Kurt. "The boss can wait a bit today. I think we've just got to settle something first. . . ."

The men stopped and looked at him.

"I suggest that we of our firm go and have a word with the Police President himself. Whether it will help or not, I don't know, but it is our duty as workers."

"Do you want to ask him to shoot with lollypops tomorrow, Kurt?"

"Go to the 'Alex' and bash his face in, that would be the thing to do."

Tolle rose slowly. It was plain that it was not easy for him to speak. "Mates,—Kurt is right. Propose that all workers are called together during the lunch interval in order to elect a delegation to go to the police office and submit a last protest there. I believe that he will see us and I believe that it may be of some use."

"That's what you think, Tolle!"

"Better go yourself to your comrade."

Tolle turned slowly to the young worker and replied gravely:

"Very well. I will go myself with the delegation . . . if you ask me to."

TAMMANY SUMMONS BRIGGS TO COURT TO STIFLE SCOTTSBORO PROTEST

Daily Worker

4-20-33

NEW YORK.—Cyril Briggs, editor of the Harlem Liberator, has been summoned to appear before the magistrate today at 170 E. 123rd St. Court. Briggs has been singled out by the landlord, Bachrat, of 2149 Seventh Ave., where the Liberator office is located, and the police in an attempt to stifle the growing protest against the Alabama lynch courts in the Scottsboro case.

New York

N.Y.

In an interview with the DAILY WORKER reporter yesterday Briggs told how the landlord had tried to make him cut off the loud speaker by which the Liberator was helping to mobilize the workers of Harlem for the march to Washington to save the Scottsboro boys and enforce the 13th, 14th and 15th amendments of the U. S. Constitution.

Tuesday police ordered the Liberator to cut off the loud-speaker. At 7 p. m. that night over 1,000 workers gathered to protest the police-landlord attack. The loud-speaker, which had been cut off for a few hours, was turned on. Three cops came rushing towards the Liberator office. Immediately a score of workers blocked their way and prevented their entering the office. One cop drew his gun, but was promptly made to put it back in his holster. The crowd downstairs jeered the cops as they retreated.

Charles Alexander, William Patterson, national secretary of the I.L.D.; Leonard Patterson, Harlem organizer of the Y. C. L., and others spoke at the protest meeting that continued outside. Oscar Horton of the Liberator staff was chairman. A collection of $10.50 was taken for the Scottsboro case.

Indignation is sweeping Harlem at this Tammany attack on those who are in the forefront of the fight for the Scottsboro boys. The courtroom is expected to be packed at 10 a. m. today, when Briggs appears to answer the charges of the landlord.

Most of the tenants in the building have signed a statement condemning the action of the landlord, Briggs announced. The I. L. D. will defend the right of the Liberator to spread the call for Scottsboro protests.

The Scottsboro Case

Two years ago some girls of questionable character were riding a freight train in Alabama. According to reports they were accompanied by some white boys. At a small station they were set upon by a bunch of negroes who threw the whites off the train and took charge of the girls. These negroes were charged with rape by the girls. The cases were tried and the negroes found guilty and sentenced to be executed. Here the saviors from the north entered the case, and as usual in such circumstances made a mess of it.

It is the same old story, and the results are the same. The "buttinskys" did not receive a warm welcome, and their influence on the jury was what was expected by all who know anything about human nature. It would have been the same had the south, through some of its zealots, sought to interfere with a case in the courts of the north. Meddling with the affairs of other people is reprehensible, and this is especially true when those doing the meddling are radicals who have no regard for right or wrong, but are only interested in tearing down the established order and customs of the people, and establishing in their places their peculiar ideas of how things should be.

The result is that the jury in the second trial of Patterson, one of the negroes, found him guilty. The penalty is death. Another very peculiar circumstance is that one of the girls, who swore in the first trial that she had been attacked by Patterson, after going north and spending some time, returned to the stand in the second trial and swore that she had not been attacked. The question is, did she swear falsely in the first trial or the second one? Certainly she swore falsely in one of them.

At any rate it seems to be an underworld case which has been magnified out of all proportions to its importance.

NEW YORK CITY POST

A JUST POSTPONEMENT

It is with the greatest satisfaction that we note the action of Judge Horton in the so-called "Scottsboro cases." He has postponed indefinitely the trial of the second of the nine Negro boys accused of rape upon two white girls.

In so acting Judge Horton, whose fairness and dignity have been constantly impressive in this difficult trial, made a most interesting and fitting statement. He first cleared the race-prejudice record for the four Alabama counties that compose his district, taking up the three cases of assaults upon white women by Negroes which have made up the entire court record of that crime for the last twelve years and showing that in two out of the three cases white juries acquitted Negroes. He then quoted from the utterly shameful statement attributed to Samuel S. Leibowitz in the columns of the Herald Tribune. It is the one picturing the Alabama jury as "those bigots, whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs, whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy." Judge Horton said from the bench that such a statement, even if not accurately quoted, "must of necessity make impossible any just and impartial verdict to be arrived at at this time. The accused Negro must now be the victim of this statement. His leading attorney would be a millstone around his neck." This is precisely the decision at which dispassionate observers have arrived concerning the intervention of the Communists and their attorneys in the Scottsboro cases. It is refreshing to find a judge with sufficient regard for justice to act firmly in line with it.

What constitutes a great lawyer? Last Sunday afternoon I was at the Southern station in Scottsboro when New York bound train No. 36 came through. As the observation car passed the station we saw sitting out on the back platform the "great" Liebowitz with several ofhisNew York reporter friends. The instant he saw the name of the station and the crowd he grabbed his nose and held it like he was in the midst of an offensive odor and with the other hand waved disgust at the town and people until the train got out of sight! If this is "the new Lincoln" old Honest Abe should do some grave turning.

Charley Wann and Dal Starkey left Friday for a "fishing" trip to Sunny Florida and Dal got hooked, all right. A write up in a Florida paper said a reporter interviewing Dal, asked him if Charley was his "best man." Dal replied, "Naw, not by a helluva sight, but he's the best one I've got along with me right now." Charley said Dal trembled so during the ceremony that the preacher said, "Be still, Geletin, before you get me to shimmying, too!"

Fishing is now the vogue here with the average running about three wettings and two quarts to the trip.

THE DECATUR VERDICT

National attention was inevitably fixed upon the second trial of the Negroes convicted of murder in the first so-called "Scottsboro case." That conviction was set aside and a new trial ordered by the Supreme Court of the United States. Its reasons were that local prejudice was so violent and inflamed, and so pronounced even in the criminal proceedings against the accused men, that they did not have a fair trial. Now at Decatur a verdict of guilty, carrying with it a death sentence, has been found in the case of one of the Negroes, tried separately. This result comes as a surprise and a shock to those who had followed the evidence given in court. The case had become of such national importance that The Times sent a competent and trusted and impartial member of its staff to furnish full reports of the trial. These have told their own story from day to day.

The presiding judge bore himself with impartiality, and was evidently anxious to make Alabama justice worthy of the name. His rulings, so far as can be determined at this distance, were correct. His charge to the jury was filled with strong protests against anything like mob law or the spirit of lynchings, and of warnings to disregard everything but the evidence in the case. Whether the jury was swayed as much as it should have been by his injunctions to give no weight to the fiery denunciations and appeals to race hatred by the prosecution, it is impossible to say. Although Judge Horton took the strongest ground against anything like intimidation or threats of violence on the part of the people of the vicinage, it was all too plain that the trial was conducted in an atmosphere intensely prejudiced against the accused Negro. The jurymen deliberated a long time over the tangled evidence and the manifest untrustworthiness of the chief witnesses, both for the prosecution and the defense. But the final verdict was "Guilty," and it is now difficult to see how an appeal could lie to the Supreme Court again, or to any higher power except the governor. He might see fit, in view of all the circumstances, to commute the death sentence into a term of imprisonment.—New York Times.

LIEBOWITZ SEIZES COAT AND FLEES.

Samuel Liebowitz, chief counsel for the defense in the Scottsboro case, addressed a Negro audience in a Harlem church last Thursday, stirring the crowd to frenzied enthusiasm. Speaking in a voice trembling with emotion, he uttered wild, inflammatory statements.

In the end, the crowd got out of control. "Liebowitz, amazed at the demonstration," reports the Associated Press, "seized his coat and fled from the platform." In this incident there was a lesson, not only for Liebowitz, but also for all the other agitators connected with the Scottsboro case.

For an able analysis of the motives and methods of the defense in this case, readers are referred to the Chicago Tribune editorial, "A Fraud Exposed," reprinted on this page. It should put both the whites and the Negroes in the South on their guard.

AMERICA TO THE WORLD

Judge Horton of Alabama may be said to belong to the oldest American stock, being descended from those who ventured beyond the mountains instead of clinging to the seaboard. An ancestor of his, he said, was "the first that came down that country." It could be wished that in a passage of his charge to the jury he spoke for All America to the world.

"We are a white race and a Negro race here together—we are here to live together—our interests are together. The world at this time and in many lands is showing intolerance and showing hate. It seems sometimes that love has almost deserted the human bosom. It seems that hate has taken its place. It is only for a time, gentlemen, because the great things in life, no matter what they are, it is God's great principles, matters of eternal right, that alone live. Wrong dies and truth forever lasts, and we should have faith in that."—New York Times.

Press Comment On The Scottsboro Case

The News-Age-Herald reprints on this page the editorial comments of a large number of papers on the so-called Scottsboro case. The comments are from representative newspapers, both of the North and of the South, and therefore may be regarded as presenting a cross-section of national opinion on the case. They are reprinted as a matter of public information.

Luverne, Ala., Journal
April 12, 1933

Newspapers without backbone argue both sides of public questions like the Scottsboro negro cases, when the state is being slandered—policy, pussy-footers. The Press of Alabama should take a firm stand against outside interference with our courts. If the nine negroes are guilty as charged, they should be given the death sentence, and if they are innocent, they should be acquitted. The court and the jury are the sole arbiters of cases tried in our courts, where the guilt or innocence of parties are to be determined. The slanderous remarks of the imported Leibokinskey of Ne wYork will not do the colored race any good in Alabama, neither will it elevate the Jews in the estimation of the citizens of Alabama. He intimates that he will withdraw from the case, which we think is a wise decision. The effort to browbeat and bull dose the courts and officials of this state, should be resented by every loyal citizen, and every patriotic newspaper in the state should take a firm stand against outside influence of foreign born, disloyal elements in their efforts to coerce and intimidate our courts and public officers. This paper is for Alabama and her citizens of all races, and when one is brought into court charged with aheinous crime, as is the case of these Scottsboro negroes, we want them to have a fair trial, and we believe that they will get it in the Decatur Circuit court. The judge has certainly been patient and has given the defense ample time to present his case. The trial of these cases will almost bankrupt ackson county, which has to pay the expenses of these trials. The newspapers of he state should let the world know that our ourts try cases from the law and evidence, nd not by outside newspapers and telegrams rom non-American and irresponsible labor arties who are disloyal to the American overnment.

UNFORTUNATE AFFAIR

The unmanly remarks made by Samuel S Leibowitz, special counsel for Haywood Patterson, one of the nine negroes charged with assault two years ago on two white women on board a freight train near Scottsboro, Ala., when the jury trying Patterson's case made its report, is nothing more than what might be expected from the name he bears, and the type of people he represents. The verdict was declared to be "an act of bigots spitting on the tomb of the immortal Abraham Lincoln." He had the audacity to demand that Attorney General Thomas E. Knight address a negro witness as "Mr. Jones." Even his client smiled at such an uncalled for remark. His manner of conducting the case was unbecoming in a gentleman, and before the case ended and he returned to his radical and Red clientele of aliens, negroes and wops, the people of Alabama and the South had decided he was not a gentleman.

If these negroes are guilty, and from the evidence and the verdict of the jury, they are, no power on earth should or could save them from paying the penalty meted out to them by an Alabama jury; not all the Leibowitzs and sons-of-witzs from the back alleys of New York to the slums of Moscow could save them.

If they are not guilty, they should be acquitted, and we believe would be, at the hands of an Alabama jury. Had this crime been committed in New York, and they had been tried and convicted in the New York courts, not one word of criticism would have gone up from any man, white or black, in the south.

We would have no criticism of the courts, attorneys or juries were every man of them acquitted. We know that Alabama courts are fair, that Alabama juries are honest, and that any man, regardless of race or color, can get an impartial trial in any county of the state. If an Alabama jury says they are guilty, let them pay the penalty of the law.

A Warning Well Put

Judge James E. Horton's prompt and pointed warning in answer to rumored threats of violence to defendants and their counsel in the "Scottsboro case" at Decatur was well put. That it was appreciated by most Alabamians cannot be doubted.

So far as we are able to learn there is no basis for real concern over the reports.

The nine negroes on trial for their lives are entitled to and must have a fair and impartial hearing. "If guilty," to use the words of the judge, "they must be punished. If they are innocent they must be freed."

That is for judge and jury to decide.

In the meantime loose and irresponsible talk suggesting any other alternative should neither be indulged in nor tolerated. Certainly it strikes no note of sympathy in the minds of reasonable citizens.

A Hardship On Jackson County

One aspect of the so-called Scottsboro case which most Alabamians have probably thought little of is the cost of the trials. In Jackson County, however, the matter is one of real concern.

The Scottsboro Progressive Age says:

"One of the sad and deplorable features so far as Jackson County is concerned is the terrible cost the Negro trial is inflicting upon our county. Our county has already borne the cost of one trial and is now having to bear the cost of the one at Decatur. The cost of taking witnesses to Decatur is enormous. Some of the witnesses will cost the county $20 to $25 each. We have to pay the jurymen and all the cost of the trial except possibly the state pays for the National Guard. It comes at a time when our county needs every dollar it can possibly get and we are the sufferers. The state ought to help us."

The people of Jackson County are deserving of sympathy with respect to this problem, just as they have deserved it in other respects. It seems all the harder on them by virtue of the fact that none of the principals in the case were residents of Jackson County. What can be done about the matter of expense this paper does not know. But if anything can properly be done to relieve Jackson County, it should be done.

As to the Scottsboro case: Those "white" girls should have been given a good lambasting with lusty hurrah poles and charged (by Law) that if they were ever again caught in the "society" of any other race than their own, the dose would be doubled and they would be deported to bedlam—Lower Calfornia. The negroes should be sent to the penitentiary for life. and close a dirty chapter.

A TRIAL IN ALABAMA.

It is impossible at this distance of course to sit in judgment of the Alabama verdict which if upheld will send the first of the Scottsboro negroes to be retried to the electric chair.

And it is also impossible to avoid the feeling that somehow the verdict doesn't exactly jibe with the testimony, that there are reasonable doubts that be avoided although none of them seem to have suggested themselves to the minds of the jurors at Decatur.

It may be even that the Scottsboro negroes are innocent as Samuel S. Leibowitz, their New York defense attorney believes and it is possible therefore that race prejudice and the mob spirit, of which there were manifestations during the trial entered into the jurors' decision.

But if so some of the blame for it must lie in the fact that the case was made a cause celebre. The defense was so conducted—and by this is meant more than the conduct of the trial itself—as to arouse prejudices. The defendants have a way of being the victims in cases made over into international and intersectional controversies.

And the Scottsboro case has been transmogrifed by the activities of radicals in defense of the negroes into a crusade for many things besides justice for the nine accused. The mother of one of the defendants toured Europe in an attempt to arouse sympathy for the then condemned though obviously it was no concern of Europe's and Europe could do nothing about it. The Communists have made no secret of the fact that they have attempted to capitalize on the notoriety created by the Scottsboro case to recruit members among the negroes of the South and by so doing they have jeopardized the lives of the negroes they were supposed to be aiding. And so doing, of course, they showed a lack of understanding of both the Southern negroes and the Southern whites. They aroused the animosity of Alabama without even the hope of gain from their own point of view. The Southern negro is not the material from which Communists are made.

And so the first case to be retried ends, not unexpectedly perhaps, in another verdict of guilty, from which another appeal may be taken—the supreme court of the United States reversed the original conviction. To Alabama's credit Judge James E. Horton, presiding for the trial, seems to have acquitted himself in such a fashion as to win the commendation of both state and defense counsel. It isn't another case of a prejudiced judge as has been the case in a Massachusetts trial. But cases are finally determined by the jurors, not the judges, and the prejudices of the ordinary juror in Alabama as well as New York may play a greater part in verdicts than they should. This fact the defense seems to have ignored and such appeals to prejudice as it has made has been to the prejudices of New York, not Alabama. It hasn't apparently learned anything from the trial just completed.

The statement of Mr. Leibowitz, issued after the announcement of the first verdict, was, whatever the provocation—and it must be conceded that there was provocation enough perhaps—injudicious, if nothing more.

"This verdict is an act of bigots, spitting on the tomb of the immortal Abraham Lincoln," he said.

This, although Alabama might in its own pride and self interest wisely choose to overlook the attorney's display of intemperance, will not tend to allay prejudice as does the more temperate declaration of George W. Chamlee, of Chattanooga, the one Southern member of the defense staff:

"I still have an abiding faith in the good citizens of Alabama and I am coming back for another trial."

There are six other defendants to be tried and if they are to be accorded justice the "good citizens" of Alabama must see to it that they get it. New York cannot. . . But then if the case had been left entirely in Alabama's hands the negroes would have been dead before now.

It ought to be possible to find the middle ground in such cases. There ought to be a way of placing the emphasis on the cause of justice first and on the opportunities for propaganda second. In the last analysis both Alabama's and New York's primary concern in the case must be in seeing that essential justice is done. Both stand to lose in the long run by anything else.

But Which Mob?

To the Editor of The Observer:

I have long been a reader of your great paper, and I enjoy it no matter where found whether in a great city or the smallest hamlet However, your comment in today's issue on the Scottsboro, Alabama, case is by far the loosest piece of journalism that has ever appeared in your great paper.

When the Wold's greatest criminal lawyer, Clarence Darrow, was asked to assist the defense in that case he said that he did not propose to appear for a defense that was championed by a mob.

The Supreme Court of the United States set aside the verdicts in the first trials, not because the rulings of the trial judge were erroneous, but for the fact that the trial judge had his court protected by State troopers, which has been done many times in our own State. If he had not taken that precaution and a bunch of lynchers had taken those defendants out and destroyed their lives, then the world would have condemned us and very properly so.

Now, in February of this year one of the State's witnesses suddenly disappeared and did not show up until the State had rested its case against the defendant Patterson. She then refuted her testimony given in the former trials.

It is said that she is a very poor woman and was dressed in overalls at the time of the alleged crime, but, when she came from New York City to testify in this last trial she was superbly dressed. With all fairness, and honesty, how came all of that? Is it not strange indeed to think that this girl who had perjured herself in the first trials had to go to New York to find a preacher to whom she could tell her woes? Is she not as poor today in this hour of depression and want as she was at the time of the crime? Did she have to beat her way from New York to Decatur, Alabama, last week in order to testify, and if so how did she preserve her fine clothes? Did not Mr. Fosdick tell her the name of the minister in Birmingham for her to consult? How did Fosdick know to tell her to appear unto this particular minister?

How did Mr. Fosdick communicate with that particular preacher? It is admitted that these people were poor women, and being so why did not the poor soul go to one of the poor preachers of Alabama of her own position of wealth instead of going before the minister of the finest church in America?

Though these women were of the underworld, does The Observer mean to say that they are not worthy of the protection of the laws of the land? Is it any wonder that our society has broken down when mobs are taking charge of our courts? Great Britain has been standing at the throat of Russia and has threatened to boycott her if she insisted trying a number of British subjects now in Russia who are charged with sabotage. However, today's Observer carries a report that all the defendants had confessed to the charges except one. Now, just think of a great nation threatening dire things to a nation that is trying to correct and reduce crime.

In developing this little letter I have been so mild and temperate that I hardly recognize myself, and I hope that you will see fit, in justice to our great sister State, to print it.

Just As Expected

The retrial of the first of the "Scottsboro cases" is over, and the result is just as was expected, despite the fact that one of the state's witnesses, Ruby Bates, recanted and told a tale that was just the opposite of that which she did at the first trial.

The accused negro boy was given a fair trial, as free from excitement and prejudice and bias as was possible in the State of Alabama.

The result would have been no different, if the case had been tried at Birmingham, or any other county seat in the state.

Now that the case has been decided in the lower court, the International Labor Defense, the Communists and the other "red" elements of the country have launched their campaign to prejudice Alabama in the eyes of the nation and of the world. There is no limit, either of falsehood or dirty work, to which they will not stoop in their fanatical zeal.

There is no reason to be bothered or excited, however. It is a time for us to keep our heads, and refuse to be drawn into controversy with these extremists.

The higher courts, in due time, will hear and dispose of the test case, in a spirit of justice, we believe, and of cool, calm reason.

The Scottsboro Case.

Editor The News:

I note your fine editorial of recent date under the caption "Intolerance at Decatur." I heartily agree with you, in general, on your good and faithful fight versus intolerance wherever it is found to curse the human family.

And going further into the merits of the trial at Decatur, which is apparently attracting much attention from the public at large, I am tempted to venture the assertion that the vile propaganda and misrepresentative carried on by outsiders is working unquestionable harm to the cause of harmony and good will between the races. And any campaign promulgated and pursued with aims and ends of this sort is radically wrong in principle and dangerous in application.

Leaving the race issue entirely out of this most unfortunate affair, the orderly trial of these nine Negroes for a particularly aggravated offense against society is only the legal procedure of the law enforcement arm of a sovereign state to protect its citizens against violence, be that violence committed by members of either the white or black race. The criminal code of the state of Alabama draws no color line in dealing with criminals. The state's prisons are filled with both whites and blacks who have been convicted of infractions of the law.

The "Scottsboro case" should have had its conclusion nearly two years ago. The long delay in final disposition of this case has been made possible in part by organized "red" and Communistic influences originating in communities far removed from the soil on which the crime was committed.

At the first trial of these nine Negroes the defendants were found guilty by sworn testimony practically unanimous in effect. The girl victims, together with their companions, were adequately corroborated by a disinterested farmer who claimed to have witnessed the attack. Then the question of guilt was further strengthened by the defendants, who, according to published reports from Scottsboro during the trial, each accused all the other Negroes of the assault. There seemed to be no defense, in fact, for the boys. The jury in the case could not have done otherwise than convict under the proof. These facts will not be forgotten by the public.

After two years of prapaganda plied in certain communities both in the United States and Europe, seemingly in the interest of collecting money from the unwary and the spread of Communism and race hatred, the accused boys must again face a tedious trial at much expense to the good people and taxpayers of a great state the citizens of which have no superiors in the nation in their zeal for law enforcement.

The people of Alabama, and particularly Jackson county and Scottsboro, have shown considerable patience in the face of unwarranted abuse and defamation at the hands of the meddlesome in different parts of the world growing out of this case.

And the "kidnaping" of Ruby Bates, her temporary residence in New York city, her sudden prosperity and her conflicting testimony before the courts remains unexplained.

TELLING NEW YORK ABOUT THE DECATUR TRIAL

Unhappily the brilliant and able representative of the great New York Times, known to be a conscientious newspaper, seems out of patience with justice in Alabama. But what is more unfortunate, The Times reporter has allowed personal feeling to creep into some of his news stories.

In a resume of the conviction of Heywood Patterson for rape, Mr. F. Raymond Daniell, concludes his account of the trial in this fashion:

> Witnesses were called to prove the contention that qualified Negroes were barred from jury service in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, through maladministration of a statute the constitutionality of which has been upheld by the United States Supreme Court.
> These onslaughts, unsuccessful though they were, helped to crystalize sentiment against the defense, already handicapped by the fact that its clients were Negroes accused of a heinous crime against white women. It was known that the Communists were organizing Negroes and using the Scottsboro case for that purpose.
> The word went abroad that the case was being used as a wedge toward effecting social equality for the Negro in the South, and no amount of argument from Mr. Leibowitz, who disclaimed the role of reformer and crusader, could counteract that belief.
> At the trial, Ruby Bates, who two years ago testified that she had been attacked on the freight train as well as Victoria Price, repudiated her former testimony and charged the Price woman with "framing" the Negroes.
> Lester Carter, one of the white hoboes thrown off the train, rounded up by deputy sheriffs and held in the Scottsboro jail until the first trials of the Negroes were concluded, corroborated her.
> The white hoboes never were called to testify by the State.
> The jury, however, chose to believe the Price woman who stuck to the main part of her story, although uncontradicted evidence was presented to show that she did not tell the truth about her activities in Chattanooga.
> Members of the jury admitted that they did not consider the testimony of the Bates girl, who was produced by the defense dramatically after a month's absence from her home in Huntsville. They refused to discuss that phase of the case.
> Much was made by the State of the fact that Carter and the Bates girl appeared in court in comparatively stylish raiment purchased in New York City.

The above paragraphs imply that Mr Daniell believes Heywood Patterson was sentenced to death by a jury of 12 Alabamians who systematically disregarded all testimony which would tend to prove the Negro's innocence. And that they weighed with the evidence in the case a prejudice against Communists.

Now Mr. Daniell, it must be remembered is writing for readers who are not familiar with customs or court procedure in Alabama. And for that matter it is quite proper that he lay special stress on phases that are taken for granted by Alabamians.

When he writes that the members of the jury "admitted" they did not consider testimony of the Bates girl, he subtly infers that the jury should have considered the testimony. He makes himself questioner and judge of what testimony the jury should have believed.

The jury "admitted" nothing.

The jury simply affirmed by its adoption that it did not consider the girl's testimony, which after all, was for the jury to decide.

Mr. Daniell in his dispatch referred to the jury as "the 12 good men tried and true." His quotation marks hint that the jury might not have been altogether that.

This is aspersive of Alabama justice, not because The Times representative wishes to be unfair to the State, but because he has in some manner allowed his own feeling to creep into his account of the criminal trial.

We take exception to it because The New York Times is a reliable newspaper. People believe what The Times prints because The Times prides itself in printing the truth.

Mr. Daniell is a reliable man or The Times would not have sent him to Alabama to cover the trial. Doubless he is jealous of his professional honor and would be sensitive to charges that he would dispatch anything other than the truth as he finds it to his paper.

But the correspondent's good intentions and his paper's reputation for printing only what it believes to be true have made Mr. Daniell's biased account even more unjust to Alabama and its people, because New York readers have learned to depend on The Times for unbiased reports.

Scottsboro Points

To the New York Herald Tribune:

This is in answer to the letter by Welbourn Kelley, in which that "Native of Alabama" attempts to vindicate his much maligned state. The theme of that article was that Alabama would have meted out justice, in her leisurely way, had not the Communists stepped in and created a bitter anti-radical prejudice which swayed the Scottsboro case jury to rendering the "guilty" verdict. This, as any one who has followed developments knows, is becoming a familiar and popular opinion.

1. Upon their apprehension, the Negroes were taken to jail for trial, although there existed "a complete setting for a lynching." This, says Mr. Kelley, is to the "undying credit" of the people of Alabama.

2. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, "a liberal body which has used the services of such brilliant attorneys as Clarence Darrow," was never given a chance to defend the Negroes. "There is little doubt, with their Negro clients already given the benefit of the doubt by the armed posse, they would have brought their case to a successful conclusion."

3. The Communists, "their eyes wide with lust for hate-inspired publicity," having persuaded the illiterate defendants to put the case in their hands, created a world-wide protest campaign which left Alabama dazed and antagonistic. The jury, says Mr. Kelley handed down the verdict against this campaign, rather than on the question of the guilt or innocence of the Negro boys.

In reply:

1. Mr. Kelley should be informed that, upon their arrests, the Negroes were charged, not with rape, but with vagrancy, for the girls, curiously, did not remember having been attacked until after they had spent a night in jail. This, then, was "the complete setting for a lynching": the discovery of nine Negroes who had dared to ride on the same freight train with two white girls. And, undoubtedly, there would have been a lynching had not calmer minds foreseen that the same result could be accomplished more respectably and, incidentally, more profitably, if it were done through the medium of the courts. (The day of the trial was a gala business event in Scottsboro, "Horse-Swapping Day." People swarmed into town to see the fun. They had a brass band out playing "Hail, Hail, the Gang's All Here," and "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town Tonight," as each verdict of "guilty" reached the streets.)

If it should be to the "undying credit" of the people of Alabama that nine Negroes, arrested for vagrancy, were not lynched on the spot, we are led to wonder what is the usual course of events in similar cases in the Sunny South.

2. "There is little doubt, with their Negro clients already given the benefit of the doubt by an armed posse, they (the N. A. A. C. P.) would have brought their case to a successful conclusion." Did Mr. Kelley never hear of the first trial? There was a first trial, before the International Labor Defense or the Communists had even entered the case. Eight of the Negroes were sentenced to death, and the youngest, thirteen years old, was given life imprisonment. Where was Alabama justice and the "benefit of the doubt" then? Where was the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People then? That organization has bitterly attacked the International Labor Defense at every turn, and has refused to join United Front Scottsboro Defense, initiated by the former organization.

3. Can there be any doubt, in the face of the facts previously stated, that the nine boys would have been executed long ago had it not been for the intervention of the International Labor Defense and the Communists? They have been conducting the defense on the theory that only by turning the spotlight of world-wide interest and protest on the little court in Alabama can those boys ever have a chance. The fact that the boys are still alive, and the fact that the protest is growing more powerful daily, proves the veracity of their contention.

Can any one now doubt that the boys have today a fighting chance for their lives? And can any one now doubt that it is due solely to the steady activity of the "left" organizations during the last two years that they now have that chance?

Scottsboro Verdict as Heinous as The Dred Scott Verdict

Afro-American

Aroused Consciousness of Nation Wiped Out the Supreme Court's Ruling in Famous Slave Case. Public Opinion Will Also Reverse the Scottsboro Judge and Jury.

By KELLY MILLER

Kelly Miller

The Dred Scott decision made judicial and legal history. An unknown Negro slave gave name to an epoch-making event. The case is noted for the legal principles involved but for its far wider political and social significance. Chief Justice Hughes has recently gone to great pains to vindicate the honesty and sincerity of the justices who upheld that infamous decision. It was not a question of the honesty of the judges, but of the decision.

Judges are human beings subject to the same prejudices, predilections and prepossessions as other mortals. No one would care to question the honesty of the seven Democratic justices and Senators who voted for Tilden on the electoral commission any more than he would venture to doubt the integrity of the eight Republicans who voted for Hayes. Each side, Republicans and Democrats, shaped their judicial decision in harmony with their preconceived political convictions.

Afro-American

As long as judges and jurors are mortals, their decisions will be tainted with the bias of tradition, prejudice and interest.

Where a case comes before a bench of judges, drilled and disciplined to impartiality, we may look for less of the inherent bias of human frailty than when it is decided by petty jurors drawn from the average citizenry whose bias and prejudice have not been chastened by culture and restrained by discipline. Where political passion runs high, judicial decisions are more than apt to be colored by partisan proclivities.

Roosevelt and the Supreme Court

When candidate Roosevelt stated in the last campaign that under Hoover the Republicans possessed the Supreme Court, he was but indulging in commonplace truism. He will see to it if opportunity comes his way that the majority of that august tribunal is shifted to the Democratic side of the fence.

In the present inflamed state of the German mind, it is not thinkable that a Jew could secure justice at the hands of a German jury. It is not necessary to question the personal integrity of a German jury against the Jew nor of an Alabama jury against the Negro. They are both the victims of racial passion.

In Alabama

In the state of Alabama, the mind of the white populace is cast in a set mold of race prejudice and proscription.

Whenever an issue arises involving racial sensibilities, the Negro has little hope of receiving abstract justice at the hands of a white jury.

The nine nameless Negro boys in the Scottsboro case were charged with a heinous crime against two white women. Whenever a Negro lays hands on a white woman, willy-nilly, the aroused community demands instant death. The word of the victim is the only evidence required.

In the present instance both of the alleged victims were proved to be of doubtful virtue while the testimony of the one flatly contradicted that of the other. But a white woman has said that a Negro had assaulted her. There was no need of further proof. Before such a jury, gathered from the common citizenry of such a community, any issue between a white woman and a Negro man, involving sex irregularities, is predecided.

Thousands of Capable Jurymen

The principle in the Scottsboro case does not hinge on the fate of these nine nameless black boys any more than the Dred Scott decision depends on the fate of Dred Scott whose name gave it celebrity. The deep-seated principle involves the equal rights of the Negro before the law.

The whole world has become concerned in the outcome of this case. The attorney-general of the state with refreshing frankness declares that there are no Negroes in Alabama fit to sit on the jury. There are tens of thousands of this race in that state who measure up to every requirement of citizenship except that of color. The presiding judge, who in some of his moods seemed quite fair, tacitly agreed with the attorney by not granting a mistrial because of a one-racial jury in a co-racial community.

This assertion by the attorney-general and acquiescence by the presiding judge are plainly in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, and if sustained by the Supreme Court, as it will not be, would forever fix the Negro in an inferior legal status.

The fact that the militia was necessary to keep the populace in check shows plainly that any jury drawn from such an inflamed community must needs partake of the passions and prejudices of their environment.

Justice can never be allotted at the point of the bayonet.

The presiding judge allowed the opposing counsel to indulge in remarks before the jury which but served to inflame preconceived passion. Not content to play on the race issue as between white and black, he permitted belittlement of the Jew who volunteered his services in defense. Of course on demand of defense counsel, the remark was stricken from the record.

But after a remark of insinuation has registered and poisoned the minds of the jury it boots but little to erase it from the legal record.

Verdict Not Genuine

Nobody outside of the slave-holding fraternity and their sympathizers believed in the genuineness of the Dred Scott decision.

I venture to assert that few white people in Alabama, fewer in other Southern states, and none elsewhere believe that the Scottsboro verdict is a genuine and bona fide decision based upon the facts, the evidence and the law.

The verdict was based on the color rather than the crime of the culprit.

The decision in the Dred Scott case stood on the statute books till wiped out by war. The aroused conscience of the nation made the judicial decision of the Supreme Court of no effect.

Moral Indignation

It is hoped that the Court of Appeals of Alabama will negative the verdict of the Decatur jury. Failing this, it appears quite certain that the Supreme Court will declare it null and void.

Just as the quickened conscience of the nation demanded reversal of the Dred Scott verdict, just so the aroused moral indignation of mankind the world over will demand the overthrow of the Scottsboro verdict, should all other recourse fail.

SAY WITNESSES ARE TERRORIZED

SCOTTSBORO, Ala.—A campaign of terror against the Jackson County Negroes who came forward to testify that they were excluded from jury service is reported going on here.

Afro-American [illegible] 33

The campaign, led by the Jackson County Sentinel, has resulted so far in intimidation of two of these witnesses to the point of signing letters repudiating their part in the fight to save the boys. These letters signed by W. C. Crutcher, pastor of the Scottsboro church, and Mark Taylor, are published in the Jackson County Sentinel beside an editorial [illegible] all efforts to save the Scottsboro boys.

"Seventy years ago the scalawags and carpetbaggers marched into the South with Negro troops," this organ says, "and said to the white people: 'The (N)negro is your equal and you will accept him as such.'

"That was seventy years ago. Today, in 1933, the 'Reds of New York march into the South with a lawbook written purposely to humiliate a white people because of sectional hatred and again say 'The (N)negro is your equal and you will accept him as such.'"

Protest against the terrorization of those who took the witness stand for the Scottsboro defense should be sent immediately to President Roosevelt, at Washington, along with the protests against the lynch-verdict against Haywood Patterson, the demand for postponement of the other trials until his appeal is decided, and the demand for a change of venue in the other case.

The Scottsboro Defense: What It Needs and Means

[illegible] 4-22-33

THERE are but two issues at stake in the Scottsboro case which should interest a fair-minded public. Shall these boys, accused now by only one of the two women of easy virtue who over two years ago caused them to be placed in jeopardy of their lives, receive a fair trial and a just verdict based on the evidence? Shall the welfare and the status of every Negro in the United States continue to be proscribed unconstitutionally under the oppression of Alabama and the South through a twentieth century grandfather clause which operates to systematically and arbitrarily exclude colored citizens from grand and petit juries?

There are other issues, of course, but while they are potent influences obstructing essential justice they are really extraneous and should have no place in consideration of the youths' guilt or innocence and the fundamental legal questions which their trials have raised. To safeguard their elemental right for an impartial trial by a jury of their peers it is necessary that we disregard everything else but the basic matters at issue.

The public was justly moved to admiration of the able legal defense provided for the Scottsboro boys by the International Labor Defense. The attorneys for the boys were of the highest legal caliber and they left no stone unturned in their fight to save the boys. Not only this but they actually placed themselves in imminent danger of physical violence at the hands of would-be mobbists angered because the lawyers in doing their simple duty to their clients had no alternative but to expose to the eyes of the civilized world the subterfuges of the "selective" jury system of Alabama, the slim and discredited evidence against the boys, and the power of inflamed public opinion which operated against any calm weighing of the facts by the jury.

Whatever else there is to be said, it is a matter of record that had it not been for the efficient and thorough handling of the case by the I. L. D., it is altogether likely that no opening would have been left for a successful appeal to the U. S. Supreme Court. To proceed with its line of defense, based on the assumption that acquittal was very unlikely under any reasonable circumstances, the I. L. D. felt bound to attack Alabama's jury system and its traditional customs in the trial of cases involving the Negro. The exposure inevitably invited world-wide criticism of the state.

This procedure was met by Alabama with an emotional display of class, race, religious, sectional, and political prejudice which completely charged the whole atmosphere surrounding the case with forces under which it is almost of a certainty impossible to obtain a fair trial anywhere in Alabama for the defendants.

To this difficulty the handling of the news by the great majority of the white news agencies and papers was so designed as to solidify the belief in Alabama that the boys are guilty. From the case's inception two years ago through its latest chapter, the white press is guilty of the grossest suppression, distortion, or coloring of facts and developments in the case which, if accurately and impartially presented, might have convinced Alabamans of the impressively reasonable doubt of the boys' guilt.

Under these circumstances it becomes a question of serious concern to those interested solely in securing a fair trial for the boys if it is possible for the lawyers retained by the I. L. D. to get a fair hearing in Alabama. And now we have the ludicrous attempt of the state of Alabama to lay the blame for the existing feeling, admittedly prejudicial to even the semblance of a fair trial, at the door of the defense lawyers.

* * * *

Alabama would have the world believe that the bitterness was not stirred up by the Alabamans. But long before Mr. Leibowitz, personally and racially villified beyond human endurance, and like the rest of the civilized world which viewed the evidence for what it was worth, had scathingly denounced as bigots the jury which laughingly returned from its deliberations to declare a man had forfeited his life to the state—long before this it was patently clear that justice was improbable, that Judge Horton was in a hopeless minority among the state's representatives who tried to be fair.

The argument has been raised that Southern lawyers would have done a better job of defending the accused Scottsboro boys. That is begging the question and pleading for a capitulation to Southern—or Alabama — antipathies. In answering that criticism of the use of "damn yankees," it is not to be forgotten (1) that a Southern white lawyer did defend the boys at their first trials, with apologies and without even a final argument to the jury, and (2) that a Southern white lawyer, Mr. Chamlee of Tennessee, is now an associate defense counsel, and that he spent half of his twenty-five minute summation in Haywood Patterson's trial offering excuses for defending the boy and boasting of his Confederate father, Southern birth, etc.

If the state of Alabama is interested in justice, it should not be interested in the race and religion of the defendants or their lawyers, nor in the section in which the defense lawyers reside.

* * * *

By the choice of themselves and their parents, the boys' defense is in the hands of the International Labor Defense. Because it is an affiliate of the Communist Party, many people have been wary of showing an interest in the boys' predicament or of contributing funds to their defense. Our differences of opinion about political creeds, however, must be secondary to the great struggle for right and truth. Racial and political philosophies can and must wait, but the Scottsboro boys cannot wait.

If the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People forced out of the case and maligned as it has been by the Communists can take that stand along with an impressive array of other organizations and individuals, surely the rest of us can join the challenge to Alabama's infamous defense of an infamous system of persecution.

* * * *

To do this requires no liquidation of program, policy, or ideals of any organization. To support the fight for justice is not necessarily support of the full Communist program, simply because the support is exercised through a Communist affiliate. The support, moreover, cannot be sporadic. It must be substantial and it must be as permanent as the existence of need which it is intended to meet.

Thousands of dollars have been spent already and thousands more will be needed to fight each of the nine cases throgh the lower and higher courts and back again through the lower courts, until the boys are acquitted or their guilt established beyond the slightest doubt. There can be no alternative for self-respecting Americans of any race or creed.

Remember! The nine Scottsboro boys need your help. Their lives depend on it. Those who wish to contribute can do so directly to the International Labor Defense, 80 East 11th St., Room 430, New York City. Funds are also being solicited by various local committees and by the N. A. A. C. P., and the American Civil Liberties Union, both of whose headquarters are also in New York City. The JOURNAL AND GUIDE will gladly receive and acknowledge defense fund contributions and forward them to the defense organization to which they are directed.

Leibowitz Still Believes Alabamians Are Biased

Advertiser 4-19-33

NEW YORK, April 18.—(AP)—Samuel S. Leibowitz, defense attorney in the "Scottsboro case," replied today to Judge James E. Horton's statement that his remarks made impossible "any just and impartial verdict at this time" with the assertion that "the prejudice you refer to was there long before the trials were transferred to Decatur."

His reply was made in a letter to Judge Horton at Athens, Ala., which the attorney made public here. The letter expressed the highest regard for Judge Horton himself.

Leibowitz wrote that "this prejudice was born of the hatred of the negro" and that it was intensified by six developments—the Supreme Court's reversal of the first conviction, the motion to quash the indictment and venire "because of the systematic exclusion of qualified negroes," the hawking of pamphlets at the courtroom door, the actions of the Attorney General, Solicitor Wade Wright's reference to "Jew money from New York," and the Attorney General's reference to Heywood Patterson as "that thing."

Editor, The Advertiser:

I do not pretend to pass judgment on the notorious Scottsboro case. Let the case be judged according to the laws of the State in which it occurred. But it seems to me that the undue outside interference is misguided, impudent, and at [illegible] it will do more harm to the negroes than good. With all these, however, I am not at present concerned. The opportunist lawyer of the negroes has made some derisive remarks regarding the people of Alabama. He has done so from a safe distance; when he had the opportunity of expressing his views of the people of Alabama in Alabama itself he put approximately one thousand miles between himself and the subjects of his highly diverting pronunciamento, before he gave to a waiting world his valuable opinions of the people of this state. Why the delay? I do not doubt, that if confronted with this fact of conveniently delayed personal judgment, he would say that he intended all the time to tell the people of Alabama what he thought of them, but somehow he forgot until he crossed Brooklyn Bridge and when he saw the men with beautiful eyes, beautiful lips, beautiful chins—chins sans tobacco juice but dripping with garlic juice—only then he remembered the bewhiskered bigots with frog's eyes.

"When I got home," says Attorney Liebowitz, "I needed a moral, mental, and physical bath."

Alas and alack! I too have lived in Brooklyn and I know whereof I am speaking. I too, have been subjected to indignities in the subways that even mules would resent.

Six millions of them in the "City of Dreadful Necessity" where, to use Ben de Casseras's simile—"A how do you do, is not the conventional, interested greeting of the State of your mind and body, but is meant as an inquiry as to the size of your bank account."

It seems to me I have the qualifications to be an impartial judge regarding the merits and demerits of Alabama and New York City, for I belong to neither. Consequently I am not biased toward either. I have lived seven years in New York, and six years in Alabama.

In retrospect, I often wonder how I escaped committing murder when a knee was put against my back and I was shoved into those atrocities known as subway trains, where the stench of human bodies in the Summer time is such that I need not go into.

Wonderful New York, enlightened center of freedom, where at the time I lived there, it had signs in the windows of some of its restaurants—"for whites only." Where it is not safe to go to extreme East or West sides without being cracked on the head. Where, one night having been arrested for the sweet vice of gambling, I was thrown into jail with 20 others. It was in this same jail that an accommodating policeman, for five dollars, let us out of our cells so that—"You boys play all you want,—when I knock at the door, put them dice away and run to your cells." Where the arresting detectives, the police captain, the bondsman, and the judge the following morning, make things "easy" for you for $125.00. Oh! Mr. Seabury, where were you when they were taking my dollars?

Such is the place to which Mr. Leibowitz has returned for his diversified baths.

I prefer Alabama. GEORGE BARBIER

"Let Our Negro Boys Go," Is Demand of Militant Harlem Demonstrators.

Daily Worker 4-13-33

New York, N.Y.

"I'm Not a Red, But I Love the I. L. D.," Says Speaker at One of Many Fiery Meetings Scoring Scottsboro Lynch Verdict

By JOHN ADAMS.

NEW YORK.—Hundreds of Harlem workers are pouring into the ranks of the International Labor Defense. On street corners, in pool halls and houses, workers are filling out the special Scottsboro Enrollment Card of the I. L. D.

Far from ebbing, the tide of resentment against the murderous lynch verdict in the Haywood Patterson case rises higher and higher. The workers, their wives and children mill for hours around the ever-larger number of street meetings.

A Different Army

"My friends, in the war they let sleek gentlemen in uniforms speak at the movies after each performance, to get us Negro people to join the army. Today we need to mobilize a greater army, an army for the Scottsboro boys. I am going to every theatre in Harlem and ask that they give speakers time after each performance to recruit this army. I am going to let you know if they refuse." The speaker, Turner, represents no organization but he receives the approval of 2,000 Negro workers, at a meeting on 135th St. and Seventh Ave.

On 138th St. and Lenox Ave., a meeting is going on. A white worker drops a quarter into a collection box. I ask him what he thinks of the case.

"I tell you these boys (Negro workers—J. A.) get lynched for anything at all, and the Scottsboro boys didn't do anything.

A TRUCK goes through the street broadcasting "All Out to Union Square." The broadcaster shouts: "Repeat this after me—The Scottsboro Boys Shall Not Die." I look around me. Would they respond? Yes—like one man, lips are moving, repeating the determination of the worker-broadcaster. THEY SHALL NOT DIE. Whenever the truck is stopped by traffic lights, the broadcaster makes a short speech. A crowd gathers and remains long after the truck has gone on its way.

Down in front of the Harlem Liberator office on 127th St. and Seventh Ave., a loud speaker is talking to a crowd that keeps increasing. Far into the night it keeps on with its message—calling them to Union Square, to organize in the ranks of the Scottsboro fighters, the ILD.

"This boys is innocent. I got eight children and I'm fighting for these boys like they was my own."

A subway porter in his uniform is speaking.

"I read this morning that 25.000 telegrams have been sent down there. There has not been enough done. I'm doing all I can. I collected signatures all day today. I ain't got any children and I don't want any until these boys are saved." A Negro working woman speaking. Men and women around her nod their assent. "That's right sister, we're with you."

"This is not the fight of only the Negro people. It is the fight of the whole working class. There must be unity of Negro and white toilers against their common enemy, the capitalist class. I was born in Alabama. I know what lynch rule means. Let us fight together for the Scottsboro boys with the white toilers." It is James W. Ford, Negro Communist leader and recent candidate for vice-president speaking in front of the Amsterdam News to a crowd of 1,500. Women follow his every word, repeating after him and saying, "Yes, yes, brother."

AT the same place Rev. Purcell, Methodist preacher from Raleigh, N. C. speaks to a constantly interrupting crowd—interrupting with cheers and shouts of approval. ". . . I am not a Red. But brothers and sisters I love the ILD. The ILD is fighting for those boys, for my people. It has done more than the Christian church ever done for the Negro people. I know I am a preacher. I am behind the ILD. Keep on fighting, ILD. Get behind the ILD, my people."

Dyett, young Negro assistant district attorney mounts the ladder. He says that he has been advised not to speak here because the Communists are mixed up with it. He says he speaks because the Communist Party and the ILD have saved the lives of the Scottsboro boys. He calls for unity on this issue of all Negroes at this time. The crowd cheers him.

A worker is visiting contacts given him by his union, the Laundry Workers Industrial Union. They are all Negro laundry workers. He visits five of them and tells me that they all asked the same question. "How does the union stand on Scottsboro?" They all join when he explains that this is a revolutionary union, that it has called its membership to demonstrate at Union Square. Other union comrades take note of this, Scottsboro is a shop issue as well.

WORKERS whistle from their homes to Scottsboro collectors and throw their nickels out the window. One rolls into the sewer at 135th St. and Lenox Ave. The giver, three stories up says, "Wait a minute." He gets another and this time it is picked up and put in the box.

A horse and wagon travels the streets with signs, "Negro and white—unite to free the Scottsboro boys." A Negro worker dressed in convict stripes sits in the electric chair replica in the wagon. Men and women run up to give money to the driver, for the Scottsboro boys. They are determined that the real chair—the chair, which is the lynch noose in a different form, shall not claim its innocent victims.

Wednesday morning. The weather seems to be in a conspiracy against the workers. Rain pours down with no sign of clearance. Yet at 10 a.m. hours before time for the march to Pennsylvania Station to meet Mrs. Patterson, crowds stand before the Harlem "Liberator" office to listen to the loud speaker. They are mobilizing to meet in Union Square. We are certain that the greatest demonstration of Negro and white workers in history will take place in spite of all difficulties. Harlem is on the march against the lynchers' verdict—THE SCOTTSBORO BOYS SHALL NOT DIE.

ALABAMA IN DEFEAT

Courier
Pittsburgh, Pa.
4-15-33

REGARDLESS of what Alabama may think or do, the nation and the world know that it has already suffered defeat in the Scottsboro case. With the retrial of only one of the young colored men concluded, the credibility of the prosecution witnesses has been so seriously impaired by the brilliant defense of Attorney Leibowitz that no fair-minded person any longer believes the defendants are guilty as charged.

Alabama senses her defeat. With the establishment conclusively that her system of selecting juries is grossly unfair and discriminatory, she began to feel herself slipping. Now that the clever defense has clearly demonstrated the almost farcical character of the State's case, the old mob spirit, latent at first because of confidence that the result of the second trial would be like that of the first, now begins to manifest itself. Alabama is indignant and bitter in defeat and wishes to revenge herself by using extra-legal methods of execution so beloved by the mobbocratic South. An attempt to lynch the boys has been nipped in time only by the alertness of the authorities. The Court is trying hard to be fair.

This was expected by those who know Alabama and the generally undemocratic spirit of the majority of Southern whites. It is the spirit of the coward who is anxious to toss overboard his own rules when they no longer bring the desired results. The more liberal-minded white people of the South do not condone this spirit. Indeed, they fight against it. The warning of the judge at Decatur to the rising mob was in the best tradition of American justice and fair play. But unfortunately this tradition influences only a small minority of the people of the Old South, which sees its whole system of society on trial along with the Negro defendents. The Ku Klux South is, as ever, a poor loser, unwilling to accept any verdict, though according to its own rules. It will only be prevented from wreaking its vengeance in the old familiar way by the vigilance of its armed forces. The mob is against the Court.

Meantime, the defense will only be able to continue its fine work by the liberal financial aid from Negroes and whites who love justice and have faith in our democratic institutions.

THE LAW OF AVERAGES REPEALED HERE.

Attacking the validity of the original indictment returned against seven Negroes in the now famous Scottsboro case, a northern attorney for the defense pointed to the fact that Negroes are not permitted to serve on juries in Alabama. No Negroes have sat as members of either petit or grand juries in Alabama since the civil war.

In reply the president of the jury board which prepared the Scottsboro jury list protested that he had no way of knowing the race of every man on the lists and that he could not therefore affirm that no Negroes were listed. He could not, however, recall ever having known of a Negro juror.

Theoretically jurors' names are drawn by chance from prepared lists of voters which, in turn, are selected from poll books. Chance is defined as an accident or an event or a phenomenon which has no apparent or discoverable cause hence an event that has not been expected.

It places some strain upon faith in the mysterious workings of the laws of coincidence or chance, to be asked to believe that in nearly seven decades since the close of the civil war, the unguided hand that reaches blindly into the box containing names of those eligible for jury duty in a state with as large a Negro population as that of Alabama, should have drawn forth an absolutely unbroken list of exclusively white juries. That hardly seems to have been pure chance.

Brodsky in Court Room Calls for Unity of Negro People and White Toilers

New York, N.Y.

(By Our Special Correspondent)

DECATUR, Ala., April 17.—World protest against the Decatur lynch verdict echoed in the court-room here today as Judge James E. Horton granted a postponement of the trial of Charlie Weems, set for today, until the July 10 term of court.

Other developments in Decatur court today were:

1. Sentence of death was passed on Haywood Patterson, by Judge Horton, who refused to set aside the verdict.
2. Thirty days allowed to make final motion for setting aside verdict.
3. Charges that the State tampered with the Patterson jury were made by Joseph Brodsky, International Labor Defense attorney, in open court.
4. Change of venue to Birmingham will be demanded.

The postponement of the Weems trial until July 10 came as a complete surprise to the defense, and showed directly the effect of the mass pressure mobilized by the International Labor Defense, and the indignation of the masses against the lynch verdict of the Alabama ruling class against Haywood Patterson.

"Fair Trial" Impossible—Horton

Judge Horton clearly admitted that there was no possibility of a fair trial for Patterson in Decatur. He attempted, however, to save himself with the ruling class by placing the entire responsibility for the situation on Samuel S. Leibowitz, defense attorney.

Patterson was sentenced to die by electrocution in Kilby State Prison, June 16. Sentence was pronounced by Judge Horton at 9:25.

"Have you anything to say why sentence should not be pronounced?" Horton asked Patterson, who was brought into court and stood before the bench surrounded by armed soldiers.

"I Am Innocent"

"I am innocent, I did not get a fair trial," Patterson answered.

Brodsky immediately filed notice of appeal to the Supreme Court of Alabama, which automatically suspends sentence.

"Come around, Haywood, I want to impose sentence," Horton said. "In accordance with the verdict of the jury, I sentence you to die in the electric chair on June 16."

Brodsky rose and filed a preliminary motion to set aside the verdict, and for a new trial, giving twenty grounds, including: exclusion of Negroes from grand and petit juries; prejudice and terrorization of the jury and defense witnesses; prejudicial errors made in the trial; incitement to violence in the summation of Solicitor Wade Wright of Morgan County; and in general that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

In support of his motion, Brodsky presented affidavits of counsel, newspapermen, and observers at the trial, proving definitely the charges of prejudice and threats to the lives of the boys, their witnesses, and lawyers.

Judge Horton declined to act on the motion for a new trial, stating he allowed thirty days in which to make a final motion to set aside the verdict.

Jury Was Tampered With

Following this ruling, Brodsky created a sensation in the courtroom, every foot of which, including the Jim-Crow section set aside for Negroes, was packed, by demanding that the bailiff who had custody of the Patterson jury be called. Judge Horton at first refused, demanding the reason for the request.

"I have information that the jury received and made telephone calls while deliberating on the Patterson verdict," Brodsky stated. The bailiff was called, and took a seat while the roll was called for the Weems jury.

Immediately, Attorney-General Thomas E. Knight walked over and began a conference with him, evidently seeking to frame a plausible alibi for the phone-calls. An objection to this procedure, made by Brodsky, was over-ruled by Judge Horton.

The conference was apparently fruitless, and Knight and the bailiff walked into the private witness room for further talk. Brodsky again protested, calling the attention of the court to this action, but Judge Horton refused to interfere.

Jury Gets Phone Calls

Finally called to the stand and questioned by the judge, Bailiff Britten admitted phone calls to and from jurors during deliberations. He "explained" that one was for a druggist, another for a clothes-cleaner a third for a sick wife.

Under close examination by Brodsky, however, Britten admitted he had no knowledge of what actually was said over the phone, who was called by the jurors, or who called them.

Thereupon, ominously calling the strict attention of the court, Judge Horton began the reading of a prepared statement admitting the impossibility of a fair trial for Weems, due to "prejudicial statements and sinister influences," citing specifically a purported interview with Leibowitz in the New York "Herald-Tribune," in which he characterized the jury as "bigoted, lantern-jawed morons." The judge read in open court this statement as quoted in an inflamatory reply made by Knight in Saturday's issue of the Decatur Daily.

In conclusion, Horton, though admitting the impossibility of a fair trial in Decatur, sought to place the burden of this fact on the shoulders of the defense, rather than on the white ruling class, and announced postponement of the date for the trial of Weems until the July 10th term of court.

"Responsibility on White Ruling Class"

Knight then launched into a sickening laudatory eulogy of Alabama justice.

"We are not bigots," he shouted.

"The General's speech is heroic," Brodsky answered, referring to Knight's citing of one crank letter he said he had received from New York, threatening his life. "Leibowitz' speech has nothing to do with the prejudice here. The responsibility must be placed upon the Southern ruling class and their theory of white supremacy, which is used to 'divide and rule' the Negro and white workers."

For the first time in a Southern court-room a plea was heard for the unity of black and white workers against exploiters. Misery and starvation of white workers in the South can only be abolished by their unity with Negro workers against the Southern ruling class and its theory of white supremacy, Brodsky pointed out.

Here Knight, turning purple with rage, interrupted Brodsky.

"We will not hear such statements in an Alabama courtroom!" he shouted.

Judge Horton angrily ordered Brodsky to be silent.

Definite Plans Announced by Action Committee

4-14-33

NEW YORK.—Definite plans for the march to Washington to demand the [illegible] the Scottsboro boys and constitutional rights for Negroes, as called for by the International Labor Defense and [illegible] by 2[illegible] delegates of 65 organizations at the conference called by the Scottsboro Unity Defense Committee, Sunday, were announced today by Louise Thompson, provisional secretary of the National Action Committee elected at the conference.

Daily Worker
New York, N.Y.

converge on Washington April 28, converge on Washsington Aprli 28, from New York, Boston, Jersey City, Newark, Trenton, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Richmond, Norfolk, Baltimore, and the capital itself. Mass delegations will arrive on the same day from the South and West.

Details of the arrangements, which are being perfected in the various cities,. will be announced from day to day.

The committee, it was announced, has set up its headquarters at 119 West 135th St., New York City, where reports should be made of volunteers, supplies donated, and recruits for the march come for instruction and information.

The Action Committee, which was instructed by Sunday's conference to make the plans for the "Free the Scottsboro Boys" March to Washington, to collect and present to President Roosevelt a million signatures demanding the immediate, unconditional, and safe release of the nine Scottsboro Boys, and to present to Congress a bill to be passed at once, providing for strict enforcement of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution relative to the rights of Negroes, announced that the bill is being drafted into final form, and all arrangements under way for the signature drive and march.

"Crowd the Highways"

"Neighborhood groups are urged by the Committee to set up their own headquarters and report these to the National Scottsboro Action Committee," the statement said. "These neighborhood committees should report daily on all information, such as trucks, food, number of recruits. Organizations should select their captains carefully so that their delegates may act in a united manner, and these captains should report at once.

The Verdict

Planet
4-15-33
Richmond, Va.

Singularly prophetic were the deductions of The Richmond Planet expressed in its editorial last week regarding the verdict which would be returned by the jury in the case of the Commonwealth of Alabama against Heywood Patterson, one of the Scottsboro boys. The Planet predicted that regardless of the evidence, the mob spirit dominant in God-forsaken Alabama would dictate another massacre decree.

The Herndon verdict at Atlanta and now the Patterson verdict at Decatur proves conclusively that it is impossible for Negroes to get justice in the courts of the prejudice-ridden, intolerant Southland, and that there is no hope of civilizing its barbarous ruling class.

It was exceedingly appropriate for the verdict to have been returned on Palm Sunday, the beginning of Holy Week. A crucifixion followed that epochable Sunday twenty centuries ago in response to the clamor of the bigots of that day. Let Christian America take notice of history repeating itself. Let her also remember the fears of Thomas Jefferson expressed in the following words:

> "When I reflect that God is just, I tremble for the future of my country."

The Civil War was the first repercussion to these fears. Will the verdict at Decatur, returned on Palm Sunday, exact another blood penalty of the country in payment of her sins, the chief among which is the revolting and disgusting legal farce being enacted at Decatur.

THE DECATUR TRIAL.

Supreme Court Rulings in Similar Cases Are Cited.

4-14-33

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Your editorial on "The Decatur Verdict" discussed very fairly the various aspects of the trial. However, it contained the following sentence: "But the final verdict was 'guilty,' and it is now difficult to see how an appeal could lie to the Supreme Court again, or to any higher power except the Governor."

The Supreme Court of the United States has held in several cases that the systematic exclusion of Negroes from jury duty deprives a Negro tried, convicted and sentenced to death by such jury of his life without due process of law. This right was first enunciated by the Supreme Court in ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, a case in which a Virginia judge was convicted of violating a Federal statute which provided that "no citizen, possessing all other qualifications which are or may be prescribed by law, shall be disqualified from service as grand or petit juror in any court of the United States, or of any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." This statute is still in force and is now Section 44 of Title 8 of the U. S. Code Annotated.

In Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, one Strauder, a Negro, was convicted of murder in West Virginia and duly sentenced to death. He appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that by the laws of West Virginia no Negroes were eligible for jury service. The Supreme Court of the United States reversed Strauder's conviction and declared that the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibited racial discrimination in the selection of jurors.

This case was followed by Carter v. Texas, 177 U. S. 442, where the defendant Negro, sentenced to death for murder, alleged that all Negroes were systematically excluded from the grand juries of Texas. Here again the Supreme Court of the United States unanimously reversed his conviction and held that if the defendant Negro showed proof of such systematic exclusion no conviction against him could be had by such unfairly constituted jury. The Supreme Court said (at p. 447): "Whenever by any action of a State, whether through its Legislature, through its courts, or through its executive or administrative officers, all persons of the African race are excluded solely because of their race or color, from serving as grand jurors in the criminal prosecution of a person of the African race, the equal protection of the laws is denied to him, contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States."

No squarer holdings or clearer precedents could be desired to show that grounds for reversal by the appellate courts exist in "the second Scottsboro case." Counsel for the defense clearly proved, from the reports issued in THE NEW YORK TIMES, that Negroes were systematically excluded from jury duty in Alabama, and this evidence will be before the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal. In fact, it is difficult to see how that court can avoid reversing the Alabama courts in this case.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASES.

Constitution
4-19-33
Atlanta, Ga

In view of the inflammatory statements made in New York by Samuel Liebowitz, New York attorney for the defense in the Scottsboro trials, the action of Judge Horton in indefinitely postponing the hearing of the remaining trials is the only wise course.

The injection of Liebowitz into the trial of the Patterson negro, and the tactics employed by him, have made matters worse instead of increasing the chances of acquittal for the seven negroes whose cases are still to be heard.

His unwise and prejudicial utterances reveal, in the opinion of the Chicago Tribune, the real motive behind the assumption of the defense of the Scottsboro cases by the Civil Liberties Union. "Only a very ingenuous observer of these proceedings could miss their intent," believes this influential northern newspaper. "Pretending to be a defense of innocent individuals from injustice and oppression and an assertion of civil guaranties, the objective aimed at was the disparagement of American courts and the American social conscience."

The Tribune points out that "the attorney brought from New York by the International Labor Defense could not have been as tactless as he has been save intentionally. The very fact that he was chosen in place of counsel known and respected in the region in which the trial was to be held was evidence of lack of good faith, of a sincere concern for the fate of the defendant. In and out of court his words and actions have appeared to an impartial observer studiously provocative of local feeling, and the inference must be that he intended not to win his case but deliberately to lose it, to make sure of a martyr for his cause and an excuse for more propaganda."

The same position is assumed by the Louisville Courier-Journal, which holds that "the attorney for the defense added fuel to the flames by a senseless and bombastic remark made when the verdict was read, accusing the jury of 'spitting on the tomb of the immortal emancipator' by judging Patterson guilty."

This outstanding southern newspaper also feels that "in the interest of justice, it would be a vast improvement if a southern lawyer could be retained for the defense of the negroes, instead of Liebowitz."

Told of the postponement, Attorney Liebowitz issued a statement in New York in which, while expressing respect for Judge Horton, he refers to "the baying pack and the wolves of bigotry."

Such statements tend to make extremely difficult the meting out of fair and impartial justice in the remaining cases should the same counsel be presented for the defense. Certainly it is to be hoped that when they are held that, for the sake of the defendants and that there may be no more cause for justifiable resentment upon the part of the people of Alabama, the defense will be represented by lawyers whose conduct will not be such as to make their task all the more difficult.

COURAGE OF MR. CHAMLEE

Age 4-22-33
New York

Some daily newspapers editorially express the opinion that the result might have been different if a Southern lawyer had been engaged to represent Haywood Patterson at Decatur, Alabama. Possibly so. But where is the Southern lawyer of prominence who possesses the moral courage to serve as chief counsel for the defense in the Scottsboro case?

Secretly and confidentially, members of the bar living in the South will voice disapproval of the Scottsboro and Decatur verdicts, but to get them to discuss the subject in public is expecting too much. It would be political suicide for any lawyer living in Alabama to appear in court and champion the cause of the nine Negro boys accused of criminally assaulting the two white girls of easy virtue.

In sections of the South where racial, religious and sectional hatreds are aflame, it is easy to win popular acclaim and political recognition by stirring the fires of bigotry and intolerance, but woe to the aspirant for public office who has the temerity to demand a square deal for all citizens regardless of the race, creed or color. The Negro has many friends in the South who want to see him fairly treated in the courts and at the polls. But they well know what a price they would have to pay for entertaining these liberal views were they to talk out loud.

There is one Southerner who has aggressively and unflinchingly championed the cause of the defendants from the time of their arrest—G. W. Chamlee, a Chattanooga, Tenn., attorney. Mr. Chamlee made an unsuccessful effort to represent the boys when they were illegally convicted at Scottsboro and he has been actively interested in the case ever since. He has been of great service in gathering evidence which discredited much of the testimony given at Decatur by Victoria Price, took the witness stand on behalf of the defendant and officiated as one of Mr. Leibowitz's associates throughout the trial. It takes pure unadulterated nerve for a Southern white man to so demean himself.

At the New York observance of Pan-American Day, John Bassett Moore, former Judge of the World Court, deplored the current era of intense Nationalism, which he said might be traced to the World War, and asserted that "the true and only foundation of peace among men is the concession to each of that which is justly his due." Continuing he said:

Perhaps in no period of history has this fundamental principle been more signally denied and more recklessly flouted than during the last twenty years. Through wars, nations have been rent asunder, and peace has been made, not in the spirit of justice, mercy or magnanimity, but in the spirit of vengeance.

Judging from the verdict in the Haywood Patterson case at Decatur, Alabama, the temper and sectional outlook of the jurors and local inhabitants can be traced to the Civil War, painfully reminded us that vengeance, not justice, mercy or magnanimity, dominates their minds and hearts. Are the people of that section sufficiently enlightened to appreciate John Bassett Moore's statement that "the true and only foundation of peace among men is the concession to each of that which is justly his due?"

SCOTTSBORO AD INFINITUM

Courier 4-22-33

Pittsburgh

THE country has been fed with the Scottsboro case for several months. To recite the facts is but to insult intelligence; everybody knows the facts. The recent trial brings the whole case anew before the American public. In spite of ourselves, we find it impossible to dismiss the case as its stands. Everybody feels that something should be done to close the chapter satisfactorily and definitely.

In our opinion, the case has reached the stage of exaggeration. Everything has been exaggerated. There has been too much publicity; too much sectional recrimination; too much racial emphasis; and too much personal feeling.

At this very moment the country is confronted with a new phase of the case. One of the attorneys for the defense, Mr. Leibowitz, after leaving the South where he conducted the defense, is quoted in the public press as saying:

> "If you ever saw those creatures: those bigots, whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs', whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy, you would not ask how they can do it."

Mr. Leibowitz is supposed to have made this statement in answer to the query of someone as to how the jury could convict Heywood Patterson after hearing one of the white girls declare that the boys did not make the attacks as charged in the indictment. We do not know whether Mr. Leibowitz made the statement above quoted, but we say, if he did, he has disqualified himself, absolutely, and should not attempt to go back to Alabama to participate in any of the other trials. Whether Mr. Leibowitz made this statement or not, it appears that Judge Horton, when informed of the statement by Mr. Leibowitz, decided to continue the other cases indefinitely, and he is quoted as saying that "no court, regardful of its duty, could, under such baneful influences, permit the trial of this case to proceed at the present time." Judge Horton very properly continued the case because he feels that the public mind of Alabama is so stirred over the alleged statement of Mr. Leibowitz that any jury from any section of the State would convict the rest of the defendants in order to repudiate Mr. Leibowitz.

On the other hand, the prosecuting counsel, Mr. Knight, should gracefully withdraw. He should do this to allow the case to be restored to normalcy. It is said that his personal feeling in the case is born of a desire to vindicate the opinion written in the case by his own father, which opinion was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States. There is also rumor that Mr. Knight desires to seek the governorship of the State of Alabama, and is manufacturing for himself campaign material on which to ride into office. If this be true, Mr. Knight has disqualified himself and he should gracefully withdraw.

We believe sincerely that the I. L. D., known as a wing of the Communist party, should gracefully withdraw. We believe that the N. A. A: C. P., in withdrawing from actual participation in the defense, made its biggest contribution to the possible acquittal of the boys.

When we say withdraw from the case, we mean withdraw from the actual participation in the defense. There are any number of lawyers in this country, North and South, who could go to Decatur or any other Alabama town and conduct a prosecution and a defense absolutely within the law and rules of court, without inflaming public sentiment; without insulting the judge or the jury, and, at the same time, without sacrificing a single legal right to which the defendants are entitled. Such lawyers can be found and employed, and if the I. L. D. is interested in the boys or interested in securing justice for all men in all courts, it ought to help raise money to hire such lawyers as could and would go into the case with less feeling, less glamor and bombast, and secure for the boys a fair trial in the courts. All other agencies interested in the Scottsboro case ought to assist in raising funds to defray the necessary and normal expense of securing a fair trial for those boys.

The agencies at work on both sides of the case have lost sight of the boys. The prosecution is mad because the I. L. D. and its agents long ago sent telegrams to the judges and the governor, attempting to intimidate them, browbeat them and threaten them. These telegrams and their content are known to all the people of Alabama. They resented them when they were sent and they resent them to this very day. The case was not lost at Decatur. The Scottsboro case was lost when those intimidating telegrams were sent to Alabama. The case will remain lost until some agency takes hold of the case and erases from the minds of the Alabama citizens the resentment and anger implanted by the intimidating telegrams of the I. L. D. The prosecution went into courts to defend what it considered the traditions of Alabama, the pride of Alabama, the insults to Alabama intelligence, and not to prosecute nine Negroes. The phraseology and insinuations of the prosecuting attorney at the trial are proof that he had in mind sectional traditions, and he emphasized them both by word and gesture, and the only thing he asked for in support of Alabama traditions was the lives of those nine Negroes. The man was actually mad.

On the other hand, the defense went into the case with a determination to bring Alabama to its knees. Sectional and racial prejudices were injected; irritating remarks were made, insinuations were indulged in, all to the detriment of the boys on trial. Proof of this can be found in the statements alleged to have been made by leading counsel for the defense after the case was closed. If Mr. Leibowitz has been properly quoted, it seems to us that his remarks were made deliberately for the purpose of making his return to Alabama for the other cases impossible. He either employs a ruse to get out of the case or, by his words, he establishes himself a bigot.

Courier

As the case now stands, it represents an array of section against section, race against race, exploitation against exploitation. Before the boys can hope for a fair trial, the case must be reduced to normalcy; the parties interested in the prosecution should be substituted by others whose minds are less inflamed. The agencies exploiting the defense should withdraw and permit a sane and calm counsel to take its place at the table. The judge was more than fair, and we venture the assertion that it would be the triumph of his judicial career to see those cases disposed of in his State, and in his court, in a way satisfactory to the fair-minded people of America. Until the picture is changed, until the parties interested are substituted by others less inflamed, the Scottsboro case may go on ad infinitum.

SCOTTSBORO IN PENNSYLVANIA

Tribune

4-[illegible]-33

Philadelphia, Pa.

THE Pennsylvania House of Representatives by a unanimous vote passed the Wasserman Equal Rights Bill as amended by Representative Harris. The House proved by this action that its members believe in the Constitution of the United States and justice for all citizens of every race.

The Bill has gone to the State Senate. It is remembered that the Fuller Equal Rights Bill was emasculated in the Senate and then vetoed by that "great believer in human rights" Gifford Pinchot.

The Senate should pass the Bill and Pinchot must sign it if he is what he proclaims himself to be.

The senators should be "put on the spot" along with Governor Pinchot. Anyone who refuses to vote for the bill goes on record as being opposed to equal rights for the Negro citizens of Pennsylvania. He says by his actions that he believes that colored citizens should be segregated and discriminated against.

Those who oppose equal rights legislation do not support the Constitution of the United States. They are not one bit better than the Scottsboro jury which sent eight innocent boys to the electric chair. They beliece in a dauble standard for colored citizens.

Several States have gotten out of the Scottsboro class. It is sincerely desired that Pennsylvania, the cradle of liberty, will at the present session of the State Legislature go on record as the exponent of human justice for all citizens of every class and race.

MR. LIEBOWITZ SHOULD DO BETTER

Mr. Leibowitz will resume his stumping campaign at Decatur today, and we are sorry. We wish he could be content to be a good lawyer interested only in the welfare of his client. A good lawyer trying a difficult case in which he has his heart presents a spectacle worth going out of one's way to see. But a good lawyer turned crusader for irrelevant causes at an inopportune moment saddens one who is interested in human justice.

Mr. Liebowitz has been very abusive and obnoxious. Indeed it is surprising that a lawyer of his reputation for resourcefulness and skill in the trial of criminal cases should persist in cultivating the ill will of the people from among whom he must select his juries.

We stick to our original thesis—Mr. Liebowitz, famous criminal lawyer though he is, handled the trial of Heywood Patterson stupidly. We trust his next client at Decatur will get better service.

"Roused in Sorrow and United in Anger"

Harlem Seethes With Resentment at the Lynch Verdict Against Patterson

By JOHN ADAMS

4-11-33

NEW YORK.—A people aroused in their sorrow and united in their anger. This was Harlem on Sunday, the day the lynch verdict from Decatur was announced.

A solitary tree stands outside the Amsterdam News at 135th St. and Seventh Ave. On it are posted the I.L.D. Bulletins, the challenge of Alabama's rulers to the Negro and white workers—"HAYWOOD PATTERSON GUILTY."

A woman stops and looks at it. On her coat is framed a cross of palms. (It was Palm Sunday.) Tears come into her eyes and she stops the first person she [illegible],

"That ain't true. Those boys didn't do anything." A greyheaded Negro worker puts his arm around her shoulder—"That's true, sister."

"I'll Go to Washington."

A petition is put up outside the office of the News. Hundreds crowd around, fighting to sign it. A woman gets tired of waiting and goes into the office. "Give me as many of those as I can carry. I'll get them signed." She goes out into the street, calling out for signers. A man signs and says: "I'll go to Washington or Scottsboro when they say the word, right now." Some of her friends and neighbors come along. She sends them after petitions. Soon the avenue is dark with people. Women and men are soliciting signatures on every street corner.

A chair is brought out into the street. A greyhaired man mounts it. He opens the meeting "where all who wish can have their say against the murder of our boys." He speaks and tells the story of Scottsboro as he knows it. He admits it is incomplete.

"Brothers and sisters, I saw hundreds of people marching in Harlem yesterday for these boys. Today I say to myself, why wasn't I there? Why weren't you there?

"I'm going to introduce a lady whom I don't know. No matter what the color of her skin may be and because she is here, she has the right to speak to us. She has asked for this privilege."

"That's the Labor Defense."

Belle Taub represents the International Labor Defense. She reads letters from white and Negro workers enclosing contributions to the Scottsboro defense. She explains the case as a fight of all workers. She appeals for them to fight harder.

"That's the Labor Defense. That's the people who fought for the boys. She's right." Buzz of comments such as this from the crowd. Women with palms in their coats are crying. Men are cursing.

"We'll be there," hundreds of voices answer when she announces the demonstration in Union Square for this Wednesday at 6 p.m.

The chairman gets back. He says: "I thought this was the case of our race, but it don't take a mule kick to wake me up. This is a case for all who are hungry against those who make them hungry."

"Don't you call me friend," says a Negro woman to a Negro cop who tells her to move in closer to the curb.

Speakers from the Communist Party, Garvey movement, preachers I. L. D., all mount each others' stands. The Negro people of Harlem want to hear the way to save the Scottsboro boys. This is their concern today and tomorrow.

Down in front of the Harlem Liberator office on 127th St. and Seventh Ave. A meeting starts at 4 p.m. The cop comes over. "Have you got a permit?" Told no, he orders the speaker to "break it up."

A young Negro mother with her babe in her arms goes over to him. "What do you mean? You get out of here."

About a hundred voices all back her up, "Go ahead, Mr. Speaker. We want this meeting."

"Lord knows I do," says one woman as she closes in on the speakers' box protectively. The cop walks off.

An appeal for funds is made. One worker comes over.

"Give me back a nickel of this quarter. It is all I've got."

"Extra, Extra." Newsboys carrying the Enquirer, Tammany sheet, come into Harlem. One worker reads the story. "Get out of here with that lying paper." Others back him up. They don't want any such reading as this. Newsboys fly down the street.

"Patterson Must Not Die!"

Later in the evening, the Daily Worker appears. Hundreds read the headlines, "JURY ORDERS DEATH," "HAYWOOD PATTERSON MUST NOT DIE." Eager hands reach for it. THIS is more like they want.

A young Negro walks up to a vendor. "Come with me, I know where you can sell ten of them."

"Take them yourself," the newsboy tells him.

"I'd take all of them, but I have no money," is the answer.

An hour later he returns with the money for the papers he took. Little boys take papers paid for by older workers and distribute them, asking: "Are you unemployed, mister, take one." Into houses they go, putting them under doors. Helping to save the Scottsboro boys. Everywhere there are meetings. Hundreds listen. Fifty thousand have heard the message of Scottsboro in Harlem this day.

"Mrs. B——, are you going to the Labor Defense meeting?"

"Me and the family," Mrs. B—— answers her neighbor.

"Roosevelt won't do nothing 'ceptin' we make him," one young worker replies to an appeal by a preacher to trust the president.

"That's the truth. Ain't he got a home in Georgia?"

Worker Died In Hamburg for Patterson.

"Tom Mooney is the proof that white as well as Negro are oppressed by white and Negro masters. A worker died in Hamburg for the Scottsboro boys. J. Louis Engdahl died for them. Aren't you ready to fight for them?" A Young Communist League speaker gets thunderous applause over on Lenox Ave. where he has been speaking for four hours.

Twenty-five thousand signed the Scottsboro petitions on one corner alone. Hundreds took pieces of paper around to their neighbors to sign.

A New Turn

61

THE Scottsboro case becomes more nauseous. There are the customary "rumors of threatened lynchings" which prove such toothsome morsels of news for the Northern newspapers, and for European papers, which like to picture the South as the last frontier of barbarism.

Is there basis enough in these rumors to justify the press services in giving them the prominence they have already been given? We seriously doubt it. One can always stir up a "threat of lynching" to make a news story.

The most unpleasant part of the trial, however, concerns the principal witnesses.

Ruby Bates, supposed to have been one of the women attacked by the Negro defendants, now testifies that her story was utterly false. She says she was not attacked. She was working in New York recently, and Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick seems to have persuaded her to come back and testify.

She tells of spending the night in a box car with another woman and two men, and planning a "hobo" trip. She tells of hopping a freight train, of meeting one "Carolina Slim" in Chattanooga, and going with him and another woman and a man to "hobo swamp," in Chattanooga, and spending the night there.

She tells of the quartet swinging another freight the next day to return to Huntsville. They were not even in the car where the fight occurred between the Negroes and seven white youths, she declares.

When one of the Negro defendants testified on the preceding day that he had not even seen a woman on the train, we were amazed. We thought his counsel had committed a blunder in letting him so testify, so obviously unbelievable did we regard his statement. And now, in the light of Ruby Bates' testimony, we see that the Negro might have been telling the truth.

At any rate, the foreign newspapers will have something to print now. What becomes of the South as a land of chivalry? Women hoboing! Women sleeping in box cars to plan hobo trips! Women sleeping with tramps in hobo swamps! What have our Southern cavaliers to say about that?

The Scottsboro Verdict

THE conviction of Heywood Patterson, first of the negro defendants in the second trials of the Scottsboro cases, will be appealed. It should be.

Among other things prejudicial to a fair trial, the defense attorney was able to show that the jury law apparently was administered to exclude negroes from the panel for this case. On more than one occasion during the trial the state attorneys conducted themselves in such a way as to prevent orderly and judicious consideration of evidence by the jury.

In repudiating her testimony at the earlier trial, Ruby Bates last Thursday swore that the other girl in the case, Victoria Price, had framed the negro youths. Lester Carter, a white friend of the two girls, confirmed the testimony of Ruby Bates.

To execute boys on the discredited evidence of a woman of Victoria Price's character, and following a trial in which racial discrimination seemed to operate in the jury panel, would be criminal assault upon justice herself. Just as the chief justice of Alabama dissented from the first Scottsboro convictions, and just as the U. S. supreme court threw out that conviction as a violation of the 14th amendment of the constitution preventing states from depriving "any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law," so the Decatur verdict yesterday appears certain to be set aside by a higher court.

KANSAS CITY, MO.

The Scottsboro Case.

Now that Ruby Bates, one of the complaining witnesses in the Scottsboro, Ala., case, has repudiated her testimony, there might be a good chance of freeing the eight Negroes accused of attacking Ruby Bates and another woman if the Communists could be eliminated from the case.

Popular feeling in Alabama against the Negroes might die down if Communists, who hope to organize American Negroes, had not frightened southerners in championing the defendants. The Communists are not interested in the defendants. They are trying to convince Negroes that members of their race "cannot get justice in white, capitalistic courts." They were frankly disappointed when the United States supreme court ordered a new trial and have made themselves so obnoxious as to discourage the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which has made progress in getting Negroes properly defended in southern courts.

Thus, in the eyes of the reds, the Scottsboro case has become a "symbolic event in the class struggle." From a Marxian standpoint, it is very fine to lift the case above its more commonplace aspects. But it's tough on the eight illiterate Negroes. none of whom appears to be interested in social theories but all of whom would like to avoid hanging.

A Southerner Takes the Stump.

To the Editor of the Post-Dispatch:

I WAS much gratified to learn from an editorial which appeared in the Post-Dispatch of March 27 that you are against Communism. Otherwise one would never guess it, judging from some of the articles published on the editorial page. Every day or so an article appears criticising Georgia for mistreating some Communist, or murderous black, and the Post-Dispatch makes no bones about the fact that it is horrified by some of the atrocities that go on in some Southern states, such as putting criminals out in the hot sun and making them pound rocks. Yet nothing is said of the daily atrocities that occur in most Northern cities, such as the shooting down of children on the streets by gangsters, and numerous other crimes.

Everyone will agree, however, that there are few, if any, Communist disturbances and no Capones (except those in the free boarding house at Atlanta) below the Mason and Dixon line, and to this may be attributed the fact that Communists often are jailed and are whipped whenever they appear in a good many "enlightened commonwealths" of the South. The North, which was once so strong for the Union, now, as far as I can see, can be called the home of "Rum, Romanism and Rebellion," for certainly adherents to all three causes are strong in the North, and few in the South. This is from an ignorant, bigoted, narrow-minded Negro hater, of course, and I only hope that some day I will get a little of the "light" that the gentlemen of the North such as Foster and Capone have already acquired. TELLING NEW YORK ABOUT THE DECATUR TRIAL.

Unhappily the brilliant and able representative of the great New York Times, known to be a conscientious newspaper, seems out of patience with justice in Alabama. But what is more unfortunate, The Times reporter has allowed personal feeling to creep into some of his news stories.

In a resume of the conviction of Heywood Patterson [illegible], Mr. F. Raymond Daniell, concludes his account of the trial in this fashion:

> Witnesses were called to prove the contention that qualified Negroes were barred from jury service in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution, through maladministration of a statute the constitutionality of which has been upheld by the United States Supreme Court.
> These onslaughts, unsuccessful though they were, helped to crystalize sentiment against the defense, already handicapped by the fact that its clients were Negroes accused of a heinous crime against white women. It was known that the Communists were organizing Negroes and using the Scottsboro case for that purpose.
> The word went abroad that the case was being used as a wedge toward effecting social equality for the Negro in the South, and no amount of argument from Mr. Leibowitz, who disclaimed the role of reformer and crusader, could counteract that belief.
> At the trial, Ruby Bates, who two years ago testified that she had been attacked on the freight train as well as Victoria Price, repudiated her former testimony and charged the Price woman with "framing" the Negroes.
> Lester Carter, one of the white hoboes thrown off the train, rounded up by deputy sheriffs and held in the Scottsboro jail until the first trials of the Negroes were concluded, corroborated her.
> The white hoboes never were called to testify by the State.
> The jury, however, chose to believe the Price woman who stuck to the main part of her story, although uncontradicted evidence was presented to show that she did not tell the truth about her activities in Chattanooga.
> Members of the jury admitted that they did not consider the testimony of the Bates girl, who was produced by the defense dramatically after a month's absence from her home in Huntsville. They refused to discuss that phase of the case.
> Much was made by the State of the fact that Carter and the Bates girl appeared in court in comparatively stylish raiment purchased in New York City.

The above paragraphs imply that Mr Daniell believes Heywood Patterson was sentenced to death by a jury of 12 Alabamians who systematically disregarded all testimony which would tend to prove the Negro's innocence. And that they weighed with the evidence in the case a prejudice against Communists.

Now Mr. Daniell, it must be remembered is writing for readers who are not familiar with customs or court procedure in Alabama. And for that matter it is quite proper that he lay special stress on phases that are taken for granted by Alabamians.

When he writes that the members of the jury "admitted" they did not consider testimony of the Bates girl, he subtly infers that the jury should have considered the testimony. He makes himself questioner and judge of what testimony the jury should have believed.

The jury "admitted" nothing.

The jury simply affirmed by its adoption that it did not consider the girl's testimony, which after all, was for the jury to decide.

Mr. Daniell in his dispatch referred to the jury as "the 12 good men tried and true." His quotation marks hint that the jury might not have been altogether that.

This is aspersive of Alabama justice, not because The Times representative wishes to be unfair to the State, but because he has in some manner allowed his own feeling to creep into his account of the criminal trial.

We take exception to it because The New York Times is a reliable newspaper. People believe what The Times prints because The Times prides itself in printing the truth.

Mr. Daniell is a reliable man or The Times would not have sent him to Alabama to cover the trial. Doubless he is jealous of his professional honor and would be sensitive to charges that he would dispatch anything other than the truth as he finds it to his paper.

But the correspondent's good intentions and his paper's reputation for printing only what it believes to be true have made Mr. Daniell's biased account even more unjust to Alabama and its people, because New York readers have learned to depend on The Times for unbiased reports.

THE SCOTTSBORO TRIAL

As all enlightened observers—including thousands of editors—saw from the beginning, the "case" against the Negroes charged with attacking a girl on a railroad freight train at Scottsboro, Ala., has turned out to be made of thin air. The girl in question, having a conscience repudiated her testimony, saying she had given it to avoid going to jail as a vagrant.

"Southern chivalry" is placed in an embarrassing position. On the strength—or weakness—of the far-fetched claims of the girls the Negroes had been tried and convicted and sentenced to die, finally being granted a new trial on appeal to the state's highest court. Southern jurymen, eager to take the word of white girls against persons of any other color, did not pause to consider the circumstances which appealed to analysts elsewhere.

The real offense of the Negroes was that they had beaten a crowd of white freight car roustabouts in a fist fight on the train; but not until the white fellows had instigated the encounter by trying to throw the Negroes off. Any Negroes in the South who in a fair fist fight defeat whites, regardless whether they are bums or tramps, are marked men in the eyes of the public in that region of the higher kultur.

These Negroes were not estimable members of their race, assuming that estimable members of any race do not travel as "free baggage" on freight cars. But that was no reason why they should have been menaced with the gallows.

Southern citizens should extract a badly needed lesson from this incident. They made a farce of their law and fools of themselves. It appears that the attorney general of the state is still bound to continue the farce and try to have the men executed for an alleged "conspiracy to assault." If a jury—even an Alabama jury—can swallow that the state is in a class with Afghanistan, meaning no insult to Afghanistan.

Tammany Hall Plays With the Lives of the Scottsboro Negro Boys

Wm. Patterson, National Secretary of I. L. D. Exposes Politicians

4-15-33-

Daily Worker
New York, N.Y.

NEW YORK.—Tammany made a gr[illegible] pla[illegible] S[illegible]day night, to turn the issue for the lives of nine innocent Negro boys facing death in Alabama into [illegible] political football.

The issues of life and death to the Negro people, and to the poor white workers of the South and of the United States, were sidetracked for a lying eulogy of Tammany by Mayor O'Brien, John H. McCooey, Brooklyn Democratic leader, in what was supposed to be a Scottsboro protest meeting at Arcadia Hall in Brooklyn.

William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense, billed to speak at the meeting, was put off by the Tammany politicians until 1 o'clock in the morning, when over half of the fifteen thousand who jammed the hall to hear about Scottsboro, had left.

In a stirring speech, which held the 6,000 Negro and white workers in the hall glued to their seats even at that late hour, he exposed the maneuvers of Tammany, in a lashing attack upon O'Brien, McCooey, and the other demagogues, exposing their lies and their motives of diverting the huge surge of anger of the masses against the Scottsboro lynch verdict.

O'Brien Praises His "Relief."

When Patterson rose to speak, the Tammany demagogues, who had already spoken, and who were on the platform with him, rose and left the hall.

Mayor O'Brien's speech was a fulsome eulogy of the "relief system" of New York city, which keeps thousand of Negroes and white workers in starvation, and has resulted in thousands of deaths in Harlem, the East Side, Brownsville, and other poor sections of town from hunger, cold and sickness.

"I haven't read the record, so I can't say much about Scottsboro," Mayor O'Brien said.

"This country was founded on justice," Magistrate Sabatini, notoriously vicious in his treatment of Negro and white workers, said, pleading with the workers present to put their faith in the U. S. Supreme Court.

Referring to the statement, earlier in the evening, of Samuel S. Leibowitz, International Labor Defense trial attorney in the Scottsboro cases, that he was "not a Communist, but that the International Labor Defense had given him a free hand in the legal aspects of the case," Patterson made the point, first of all, that the I. L. D. is not a Communist organization.

"At the same time," he said, we must remember that it was the call of the Communist Party which first of all brought the Scottsboro infamy before the workers of the world, rousing them to protest. Where were the Democratic, Republican and Socialist parties at that time? They were content, and would have been only too glad had it been possible, to bury Scottsboro, to forget it, to burn the Scottsboro boys themselves, because it is their system, the system which they support, which demands the burning of these boys.

"As organized bodies, the three capitalist parties have never turned a finger for the Scottsboro boys. On the contrary, they have worked for their burning.

"'Why are these Democratic speakers here tonight? They are here because the masses are here. They are here because the masses are in turmoil, demanding that the Scottsboro boys shall not die, and they are afraid. They are afraid of this upheaval. They are here to divert it. They are here because wherever the people are, there they must be, to save themselves if they can."

Mrs. Janie Patterson, mother of Haywood Patterson, although advertised to speak at the meeting, was at first refused the floor on the insistence of the Tammany representatives, and the Rev. Harten went so far as to announce that she would not speak.

The insistence of the workers, who shouted for her, demanding that she be given the platform, forced the demagogues, seeking to make political capital out of the lives of the Scottsboro boys, to permit her to speak.

SCOTTSBORO SEEN LIKE HITLERISM

Prof. Mendelsson-Bartholdy Finds Similarity in Agitation Over Race Prejudice

Comparing anti-Hitler agitation here to German criticism of the Scottsboro case, Professor Albrecht Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, grandson of the composer, sailed early today for his German homeland aboard the Deutschland of the Hamburg-American Line, after a series of lectures at American universities.

The professor, pointing out that he is of Jewish ancestry, although not considered a Jew under the rulings of the Nazi regime, said that anti-Semitic feeling is present at all times and added, "I have heard of some shocking cases of anti-Semitism in the United States."

Speaking of the feelings aroused in Germany a year ago in refenrec to the Scottsboro case, he said, "Most Germans believed the verdict was against the evidence and was the result of racial prejudice. There was a strong feeling in Germany that it was impossible for a Negro to obtain justice in your Southern States."

Dr. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, on the faculty of the University of Hamburg and director of the Foreign Policy Institute, explained that the Nazis had decreed that those whose grandparents and parents were not members of the Jewish faith were not to be considered Jews if they do not profess that faith themselves, regardless of their race.

"Not that I wish to deny my ancestry," he said. "I am very proud of my Jewish descent."

The professor said he had the greatest respect for the scientific achievements of Dr. Albert Einstein, but scored his attitude toward present-day Germany.

"I believe all Germans should return so that every effort may be made to get the whole thing in the right shape," he said. "Since I left Germany on March 2, before the Hitler regime, my information is not first-hand, but I understand the discrimination against Jews in the learned professions is on a plan similar to the United States immigation quotas. My mind is still open as to conditions at home, and I am anxious to learn the facts."

Dr. Menhelssohn-Bartholdy branded as forgeries pictures published in this country of alleged indignities on Jews, saying that he recognized one which originally had appeared after the Russian revolution and then was captioned as showing White Russians being lined up against a well by Bolshevists.

APPEAL FAILED TO SAVE NEGRO

Youth in Scottsboro Case Again Condemned to Death.

DECATUR, Ala. (AP)—The first of a group of Negroes sentenced to die for attacking two white girls in the Scottsboro case and granted new trials on appeal again has been condemned to death. Defense lawyers said the fight to save the accused would be continued.

Heywood Patterson, 19-year-old Chattanooga Negro, was re-convicted yesterday with a recommendation that he be electrocuted just two years after his original sentence was pronounced. The jury deliberated twenty-one hours.

The verdict was branded a "miscarriage of justice" by Samuel S. Leibowitz of New York, chief of defense counsel.

"This verdict," Leibowitz charged, "is an act of bigots, spitting upon the tomb of the immortal Abraham Lincoln."

He scored Solicitor Wade Wright, one of the prosecutors, for asserting that defense witnesses had been "bought with Jew money" and added "We will fight with every drop of blood in our veins to free these men because they are innocent." He indicated an appeal will be taken.

There were fewer than 100 persons in the courtroom as the verdict was read yesterday, and it was received without demonstration.

Woman Testifies

Patterson was convicted of attacking just one of the two white girls in the case, Mrs. Victoria Price. She testified during the trial holding to her original story that she and Ruby Bates were attacked by nine Negroes aboard a freight train in March, 1931, as they hoboed their way back to Alabama after a hunt for employment in Tennessee.

The Bates girl, who originally testified an attack had taken place made an unexpected appearance during Patterson's trial and repudiated her earlier story. She said she told the first story because she was excited and because Mrs. Price told her what to say. She appeared in court wearing new clothing and said she had been in New York.

Attorney-General Thomas E. Knight, heading the prosecution, charged she had "sold out."

Leibowitz, who entered the case at the invitation of the International Labor Defense but stipulated he would accept no pay and take care of his own expenses, said he did not know if he would appear in the trials of the other six. During the hearing he charged Negroes were excluded from jury service in Alabama.

The case drew world-wide interest and throughout Patterson's trial officials received telegrams protesting "attempts to lynch" the defendants and their attorneys. Numerous rumors of mobs cropped up but officials said no basis could be found for these. There was a military guard at the trial.

The Scottsboro Case

To the New York Herald Tribune:

The Negroes of New York, and I may dare say the entire country, appreciate greatly your fine editorial on the Scottsboro verdict. Every word of it is the living truth. Your opening sentence expresses the opinion of every fair-minded, justice-loving American citizen: "It is useless for any one, either in or out of Alabama, to pretend that the verdict of guilty rendered against the first of the nine Negroes to stand retrial in the Scottsboro cases will not be received with a profound sense of shock by justice-loving Americans."

This decision convicting Patterson is motivated by prejudice and hate of the defense which was accorded the condemned young men, and there's no reason why spitework should be meted out to Patterson on account of Alabamans' hatred of the New York lawyers. Every sensible person who has closely followed this affair and noted the various angles which have been brought out cannot be but surprised at a jury finding a verdict of guilty. Every Negro in the United States should rise up and fight this case just as far as it can go and try to find out if there's no justice in this country for a Negro.

C. JACOB JONES MAKES APPEAL TO COLORED PEOPLE

Warns Members of Race to Beware of Communism and Like Movements

C. Jacob Jones, colored welfare worker in Anniston, in a statement issued today, appealed to members of his race to beware of Communism and similar doctrines and to cooperate with the white citizens in their efforts to find their way out of the financial difficulties.

His statement follows:

"We are all hoping for better times. We are looking forward to the time when our present economic distress will be a thing of past history. But upon searching past historical facts of the Bible, I find that worse times than this have come upon men during ages long forgotten, and I also find that when men or nations turned to the law of God, God always helped them out of their distress. I believe the same is true today. I want to appeal especially to my race. Let us return to God. God is the only remedy for our many ills. Some speak of the race problem. We have no race problem in Alabama. We are not concerned about the confusion that is brought about because of too much publicity concerning some crimes that are committed.

"The Bible says the law is for the lawless and it is just and good.' Primarily our problem is how best to adapt ourselves to our economic situation, at the same time showing with thankful hearts that we greatly appreciate what our white friends are doing so wholeheartedly in their endeavor to assist us over this great mountain of economic distress. We care not for social equality. And we enjoy making our own way among ourselves, being assisted by our many white friends. We will not allow ourselves to be hoodwinked by the so-called racial problem in our state. What we need most is the old-time religion.

"We are called the most religious people on earth by other races, and I think it has been true. But unless we as a race go back to the old-time religion we will within the [illegible] be a race of infidels. Communists are an infidelic organization, and they have at least made some impression upon certain of our groups. They are taking advantage of every opportunity to make inroads upon the race. Let us not forget the progress we have made within the past half century. It came about through our forefathers' loyalty to government, hard work, prayer and love for the white, as well as the negro race.

"If we have hatred, malice and murder in our heart, we cannot be a Godly people, and our destruction as a race shall most certainly come about hastily. I am glad to say the leaders of my race are grateful for what is being done by our white friends of Anniston to relieve our present distress, and I am not unmindful of the way my white friends have supported my welfare work for the last two years, for which I thank them."

MOVE TO UNITE TO AID NEGROES

Association Acts to End Feud with Labor Defense Over "Scottsboro Boys."

The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People moved today for a truce in its feud with the International Labor Defense so that a nation-wide united front might be formed in defense of the "Scottsboro boys."

The N. A. A. C. P., from which the I. L. D. "captured" the Scottsboro case, announced that a drive for funds would be started at once by the 327 branches of the association.

Stresses Need of Help.

After saying that the defense is being handled by the I. L. D. by choice of the boys and their guardians and that the association has no control over the conduct of the case, the announcement continues:—

"Despite differences of belief with the International Labor Defense, the N. A. A. C. P. cannot stand by idle while this momentous struggle goes on. Time will tell who has the best philosophy on the so-called race problem, but the Scottsboro boys cannot wait. They must have help now. Alabama and its infamous defense of an infamous system must be challenged now."

Ask Roosevelt's Aid.

The Universal Negro Improvement Association made public a letter written to President Roosevelt urging his influence to obtain a fair trial for the "Scottsboro boys," which the association declares is impossible anywhere in Alabama.

A mass demonstration to protest against the conviction of Haywood Patterson, first to stand trial, will be held in Union Sq. at 6 P. M. tomorrow. Among the speakers will be Samuel Leibowitz, chief counsel for the Scottsboro boys, and Mrs Jennie Patterson, mother of the condemned Haywood Patterson.

SIGNS OF PREJUDICE ALL TOO PLENTIFUL.

The attitude of the southern states' officialdom toward prosecution of Negroes seems unfortunately to be typified by the Alabama attorney general's remark about the second conviction of Heywood Patterson, 19-year-old Negro boy.

"I don't (think it was a miscarriage of justice)," said Attorney General Knight, "—not beyond a reasonable doubt." What can Mr Knight possible mean? That it is up to the prisoner to establish his innocence beyond a "reasonable doubt," rather than up to the state to prove his guilt?

This is a typical assumption of prejudiced peoples, but it has no foundation in logic and it has no defense constitutionally.

As for the prosecution of Patterson itself, no one who has followed the case will have missed the fact that Alabama resorted to tactics very similar to those which caused the United States Supreme court to order the new trial last year. The reference to "Jew money" thrown to Patterson's defense, whether well founded or not, had nothing to do with the merits of the case, and was intended purely to prejudice the jury. It is amazing that the state of Alabama would a second time make its conviction vulnerable by such a stupid resort.

And it is not impertinent to point out that the principal reason New York money has come to the defense of the eight Negroes is that there was apparently no group in Alabama enlightened enough and desirous enough of simple justice to insist that the youths be given an impartial trial.

Alabama Plays Safe

Reading the judge's instructions to the jury which has found Haywood Patterson, one of the Scottsboro case Negroes, guilty again on retrial of his case, the northerner who tries to understand Alabama justice gains evidence of the forces at work there in this unfortunate issue at law. He finds himself conscious of another viewpoint—almost another standard of ethics.

The judge in the case was as fair as a judge could be. A southerner himself, he did not spare his local popularity with expedient yielding to the spirit he knew was abroad. He understood perfectly why an Alabama jury would be likely to find against a Negro in a case involving criminal attack on white women. Nevertheless it was his duty to point out principles and possible exceptions. He performed it with commendable honesty.

But the principles of law and the servants of the law have their foundation in the people, who speak through the jury. There probably were few realistic thinkers in the courtroom at Decatur during Patterson's second trial who believed that any Alabama jury could be assembled which would give a verdict contrary to that one given in the first trial. The Negro youths had been charged with assault on two white women. The charge itself was enough to condemn the defendants. According to the opinion of a majority of the supreme court of the United States, that had been virtually the course justice had taken in the first trial, when the defendants were found guilty and sentenced to death without "right of counsel, with the accustomed incidents of consultation and opportunity of preparation for trial."

Alabama has its own convictions of justice in cases like the Scottsboro incident. Because it has chosen to play safe and uphold those convictions against an increasing protest, it has moved into a conspicuous position. It has made a celebrated cause out of what might have been an ordinary episode. The state and its citizens are to be pitied for the misfortune that publicity in the Scottsboro case has brought upon Alabama courts and Alabama juries. They handled the case in their own way, which they never have claimed was the method of ideal justice.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE.

The outcome of the trial of the negroes in the Scottsboro, Ala., case is not yet indicated, but the developments at the retrial of the first of the accused signifies that there was substantial ground for the contention that the men were convicted on flimsy evidence. As will be recalled, eight negroes were convicted and sentenced to death two years ago on the charge of attacking two women on an Alabama freight train. Because of the circumstances and doubt of guilt, negro organizations took up the cause of the men and the interest of the International Labor Defense was enlisted in their behalf. It was contended that the men were unjustly convicted and that their color counted heavily against them in fixing their guilt.

The case was carried to the United States Supreme Court in the effort to secure a new trial which was granted. The retrial was transferred to Decatur where it has been in progress for several days as to the first defendant. The negroes were convicted on the testimony of the two women who on their own admission are not of high character. At the rehearing one woman repeated in effect the testimony she gave at the first trial. However, the other repudiated her former story and denied that she had suffered as she formerly claimed. She accounted for her change of tale on the ground that she became conscience stricken and sought advice from Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick who urged her to tell the truth.

What effect this recantation will have on the fate of the man on trial, or on his associates, is not yet revealed, but it signifies that there was substantial ground for the doubt of the guilt of the prisoners. Unfortunately, in many of the Southern states a dark skin is often construed as evidence of the guilt of a man accused of crime. The Scottsboro negroes are entitled to justice regardless of their color. If they were untruthfully accused, it is fortunate that their cause was taken up by an organization determined to fight it to a finish.

Alabama Justice Not Unadulterated

LIKE the Dayton, Tenn., "evolution" trial and the Sacco-Vanzetti case in Massachusetts, the legal battle for the lives of seven Negroes in Alabama became a trial of local sentiments stiffened by what was regarded as outside interference. Opinion that the young colored men convicted of rape had been railroaded in their first trial was confirmed by the United States Supreme Court, which ordered a retrial and change of venue. Heywood Patterson, the first defendant retried, has again been found guilty, with death fixed by the jury as the penalty. The conviction will be appealed, and in all reason it should be fought to a finish.

Above the right of the state to police its people according to its own laws, and to settle its domestic social problems according to its necessities, is the fundamental law of elementary justice. That this was ignored seems to be evident. Before Patterson was tried the Alabama jury system was put on trial, and the fact determined that in that state the rights of citizenship are denied the Negro, as a voter and as a juryman. The insistent off-stage murmur of the gathering mob threatening to take action into its own hands, the burning of fiery crosses and the intemperate speeches of the prosecution attorneys, all seem evidence that the second trial was no more unencumbered by prejudice than the first.

A third trial, if one is allowed, will not reform Alabama sentiment nor its interpretation of justice. Accordingly this case must be settled strictly on its merits in law, and by legal processes. Popular demonstrations, such as the proposed appeals to President Roosevelt and marches upon Washington, are not only useless because the President has no jurisdiction, but because they will arouse racial antagonism and bolster regional resentment against outside interference. They will do more harm than good, in this case or in subsequent trials.

The verdict does not seem to have bee a fair one, because one of the chief stat witnesses recanted and a third wa never summoned by the prosecution Our legal institutions are strong enough to exact justice on the facts as presented. A national and popular demand that those institutions be utilized to the limit is fair and right, but a hysterical or at least purely emotional series of parades and demonstrations will help neither the individuals nor the cause

WHEN MOB LAW RULES A JURY.

Following the conviction and death sentence of the first Negro retried in the Scottsboro case, the following remarks were made by the opposing attorneys:

Defense Attorney Leibowitz: "I think it was a miscarriage of justice."

Attorney General Knight, Jr.: "I don't, not beyond a reasonable doubt."

Nothing more is needed to show the nature of the verdict. Under American law, a jury must acquit unless convinced, "beyond a reasonable doubt," that the defendant is guilty. Attorney General Knight turns that principle squarely around, and tries to justify the verdict on the ground that there is a "reasonable doubt" of the defendant's innocence.

One may disregard the Negro question altogether, and get an idea of the passion and prejudice that produced this verdict by considering the remark in court by Solicitor Wade that witnesses for the defense were "being bought with Jew money." This relates to the admission of Ruby Bates that her testimony in the first trial was a frame-up.

Of course, the case will be carried once more to the United States Supreme Court, which this time will find it more difficult to evade the main question at issue, whether a trial conducted in an atmosphere of overwhelming passion violates the guarantee that no man shall be deprived of life without "due process of law." That question was raised in the first appeal, but the supreme court did not pass on it because it held that the "due process" clause was violated when the defendants were denied opportunity to employ and consult with counsel in the early stages of the prosecution.

The supreme court has no wish to reverse a case on the ground that "legal lynching" violates the Fourteenth Amendment, for to do so will open the way to a flood of appeals in ordinary criminal trials. But the Scottsboro case presents the gravest problem since the original rise of mob violence in the United States, and it is inconceivable that it will be allowed to blossom into a new system of lynch law blessed by the courts.

ALABAMA IN THE JURY BOX.

That counsel from outside the county was engaged in the defense, but one being a Southern lawyer, is among divers reasons assigned for the second conviction at Decatur of Haywood Patterson, first to be retried of the seven Alabama Negroes whose sentence of death the United States Supreme Court set aside. Statements attributed to jurors are to the effect that the testimony of Ruby Bates, who confessed that what she swore to at the first trial was untrue, was not even considered by the second twelve. On the contrary, the fact that after an absence in New York she appeared in court in attractive new spring clothes was much dwelt on by the prosecution. Though out overnight, the jury on the first ballot were unanimous for conviction and on the second all except one voted for the death penalty. On the third the twelfth juror also voted for death and the jury was ready to report. The defense's attack on the practices excluding Negroes from jury service only made an unfavorable impression, it is said.

The trial of another of the seven is set for next Tuesday, but a postponement until the result of an appeal in the Patterson verdict is known will be asked. That the County Prosecutor in his address to the jury entreated them to show that "Jew money can't buy or sell Alabama justice" will be alleged as reversible error on the appeal. Whether this second trial was a fair trial in the opinion of the Washington Justices, who set aside the first one as unfair, is a matter of large interest. In various allegations as to standards different from those followed in ordinary trials are included tributes to Judge Horton as pursuing a stricty impartial course on the bench and upholding high professional canons.

POST DISPATCH

THE ALABAMA VERDICT.

The defense will seek an appeal in the second death sentence imposed upon Haywood Patterson, first of the seven Negro youths to be retried in Alabama for alleged attacks upon two white women. All persons who place justice before racial antagonism will hope for a calmer consideration of the evidence in surroundings less charged with prejudice. The United States Supreme Court, in ordering the retrials because the accused were denied proper defense by adequate counsel, pointed out that the first trials, "from beginning to end, took place in an atmosphere of tense, hostile and excited public sentiment." The deficiency of counsel was, of course, one manifestation of that sentiment.

There was little improvement in the atmosphere at the second trial. It was held at Decatur, a rural community similar to Scottsboro, instead of in less benighted Birmingham, as defense counsel asked. At Decatur, there was the same fear of lynching, the same need for special guards armed with machine guns, the same threats against prisoners' counsel. The prosecution frankly played on the region's prejudice, not only against the Negro, but against outsiders, and even against Jews, whose money, the Solicitor said, had purchased evidence for the accused.

More than the lives of the ignorant, illiterate boys is at issue in the case, and this explains why it has become a cause celebre throughout the world. Sectionalism, bigotry and prejudice obviously have played a greater part in the proceedings than all the weight of evidence. One witness, Ruby Bates, repudiated her previous testimony against the boys. Testimony of the other, Victoria Price, was questioned by the Judge in his charge to the jury. That both were "women of easy virtue" should be considered in judging their credibility, he said. Thus, it would seem, the prosecution's case was materially weakened, if not totally demolished. Yet the jury found a verdict of guilty on its first ballot, then pronounced the extreme penalty, although it might properly, in view of the grave doubts as the boys' guilt, have chosen any term in prison from 10 years up.

Prejudice is a hideous blot upon America, whose founding fathers called it the home of freedom and equality. This disgrace is at its worst in the rural South, where the Ku Klux Klan found green pastures, and where intolerance persists, despite the downfall of organized bigotry. The rural South, and hence, at least from the angle of the European observer, the entire South and the nation, is on trial in this case. That prejudice again has temporarily triumphed is a saddening fact when the nation and the world need the solidarity of all sects and peoples more than ever before.

APR 14 1933

From a Native of Alabama

To the New York Herald Tribune:

Some two years ago in Paint Rock, Ala., occurred an incident which, though comparatively unnoted at the time, was unique in the annals of American and Southern race relations. At that time an armed posse of civilians and officers stopped a freight train and from it took nine Negro youths and two white women. The two women, dressed as men and riding as hoboes, hysterically asserted that they had been attacked by the Negroes.

Here, if ever one existed, was the complete setting for a lynching—and Negroes have been lynched in Alabama and Texas and Northern states with much less against them. To the undying credit of a people whose "eyes are small slits in yellow, tobacco-stained faces" there was no lynching. The members of the posse, with guns and ropes ready, listened to the stories of the two women and the white men involved and were skeptical. They took the Negroes to jail for trial.

Thus, in the beginning, the Scottsboro case was unsensational.

Legal defense for the Negroes was arranged by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, a well organized, intelligently conducted liberal body which, on occasion, has been known to call on the services of such brilliant attorneys as Clarence Darrow, Morris Ernst and others to fight its court battles. The attorneys engaged by the N. A. A. C. P. were experienced lawyers familiar with Alabama court procedure; and if they had been given a chance there is little doubt that, with their Negro clients already given the benefit of the doubt by an armed posse, they would have brought their case to a successful conclusion in court.

Then the Communists.

Communist lawyers, their eyes wide with lust for hate-inspired publicity, their faces unstained by tobacco, began their whisperings. "You will be murdered by the capitalist jury," they whispered through the bars to the illiterate Negroes. "Your counsel are clubs in the hands of the capitalist murderers. Let us fight your case." They got the case.

Then immediately began the familiar procession of banners and garish placards, something strange and new to Alabama. "We demand" . . . screamed the banners. "Stop these legal murders!" screamed the banners. "Free the Scottsboro boys immediately!" screamed the banners. Alabama was dazed and amazed. But then began the deluge in earnest. From every group of disaffected agents-provocateurs in the country came letters and telegrams to the Governor, the courts, the prosecutors, the newspapers. From foreign countries poured in the protests.

Then began what was to have been the Negroes' trial.

But Alabama was ignorant of the methods of American communism, which is "red" in more ways than one. Alabama juries did not know that a juicy cause célèbre of dead Negroes was worth far, far more to the cause of communistic disaffection in America than the fair verdict which doubtless would have been eventually handed down had no outside influences been brought to bear. Neatly falling into the well laid trap, and swelling with that pride which, if stupid, is not the less superb, Alabama juries decided that they and their state would not listen to dictation by radicals who could not live in their own countries without being hounded from shore to shore.

And thus the verdict of guilty had nothing whatever to do with whether or not young Negroes had attacked two white women hoboes.

But the Scottsboro case is only the beginning. Already Southern Negroes are beginning to feel the watchful eyes of white employers who fear that Scottsboro and its baleful outside influences will be repeated in their own communities. Four Negroes have already died in Communist-inspired black-white differences in Alabama since the beginning of the Scottsboro case. And the Communists are at work every day. The result is evident: One posse, waiting and agreeing to trust the courts, brought the world down about the ears of the state. Will other posses—and there will, unfortunately, be other posses—stop and remember this fact before they start with their prisoners to jail?

All of which brings up the question as to what is the answer to the black-white race problem in the South and, no less, in America as a whole. Perhaps the late Booker T. Washington was right when he said, "Education and service."

On the other hand, perhaps Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief counsel for the Negro at the recent retrial, will do more for the problem with such statements as one he made on his return to New York on Monday. Describing the people and the State of Alabama, he said, according to press reports, "Their eyes are small slits in yellow, tobacco-stained faces. . . . There is no such thing as justice in that state. . . . When I got back to New York I felt that I needed a physical and moral bath."

I, as a native of Alabama, find it difficult to write dispassionately of that statement or of Mr. Leibowitz. There are many things I could say, and would like to say, but I believe his statement tags Mr. Leibowitz with the deserved label of his own making.

Its present unpopularity to the contrary, I am proud to call myself a native of Alabama.

Mrs. Patterson Here in Plea for Convicted Son

Negro Mother Arrives Alone to Protest Death Sentence in the Scottsboro Case

Trusts Defense Counsel

Tells Interviewers 'I Believe in God and Mr. Leibowitz'

Mrs. Jennie Patterson, mother of Haywood Patterson, the first of the defendants in the retrial proceedings of the Scottsboro case at Decatur, Ala., arrived at the Pennsylvania Station yesterday at 5:06 p. m. and was met by Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of counsel to her son and the other eight Negroes involved. A delegation from the International Labor Defense, which is sponsoring the legal counsel; three busloads of Negroes from Harlem and a hundred redcaps formed the rest of the reception committee, with fifty policemen and a detachment of reporters and photographers.

Mrs. Patterson, a plump woman of forty-five wearing a brown straw hat and gray traveling suit, was the center of a good deal of excitement when the train arrived.

All the way from Washington, where she left the Jim Crow car and took her place with the white passengers bound for Boston and way stations, she had been regarded with disinterest. When Mr. Leibowitz, hat in one hand and pipe in the other, came to meet her in the coach, followed by reporters and policemen, the passengers had a change of attitude and crowded to the platform. The conductors shouted in vain that the train was already forty-one minutes late; the passengers were not to be robbed of a glimpse of celebrity.

Mrs. Patterson was whisked into an elevator, and the policemen, foiled by this adroit move, hurried up the stairways to meet her, knocking over incoming passengers and members of the reception committee indiscriminately. In the main waiting room cheers and handclaps welcomed the bewildered woman, and an April blizzard snatched at her spring chapeau as she entered a taxicab. The driving snow and the hazardous footing on Seventh Avenue quickly discouraged the welcoming crowd and they dispersed without persuasion.

At Mr. Leibowitz's office, on the forty-second floor of 225 Broadway she was treated to buttermilk and sandwiches, gazing between bites with wonder and fear at the flakes that eddied past the windows and descended on buildings of lesser height.

"Mr. Leibowitz is the bestes' lawyer they ever had in the South," she said when her appetite had been somewhat appeased. "He don't get down on his knees an' beg 'em, he jus' tells 'em the law."

She made the trip alone, leaving behind her husband, Claude; three daughters, Sybil, Mazelle and Louise, and two sons beside Haywood, Julian and Ollie, to look after her home in Chattanooga, Tenn.

"Haywood said it was the grandes' thing he ever see," she offered, "an' I believes I'll get him back alive. I believes in God and Mr. Leibowitz."

She will make a tour of the industrial cities of the North under the auspices of the International Labor Defense, while Mr. Leibowitz, who returns to Alabama on Monday, proceeds with his defense of the other men involved. A second verdict of guilty, carrying with it a sentence of death, was returned Sunday against her son.

The monster mass meeting scheduled for 6 o'clock at Union Square dwindled to a handful of listeners and a few voluntary speakers under the influence of the weather, and when Mr. Leibowitz sent word that neither he nor Mrs. Patterson would appear it was postponed until Friday at the same hour.

Much Ado.

The dramatic reappearance of a missing girl witness in the Scottsboro case illustrates the senseless folly of mass prejudice based on doubtful evidence. The girl, Ruby Bates, threw the court at Decatur, Alabama, into an uproar with a complete repudiation of her previous testimony—testimony which caused the state of Alabama to pronounce sentence of death on a group of Negro youths charged with criminal attack on [illegible] Bates and a companion.

In a mass of sordid testimony, the witness revealed that she had been a dupe of pressure from her companion who, in ignorance of the law, sought to protect herself by perjury. She revealed that the Negro youths had made no attack on her or on her companion. She showed that both of them were traveling with men at the time; that they were not even in the same car where the fight, which has been so important in judgment of the case, took place.

Had it not been for the right of appeal and the interest taken in the case by lawyers fighting for a principle instead of a conviction which would satisfy the demands of southern justice when Negroes and Caucasians become embroiled, the youths named in the charge would be dead. Ruby Bates would have a load on her conscience which would make her miserable. Whether or not Alabama will be able to emerge with judicial balance from this new ordeal of tangled evidence remains to be seen. It can account itself lucky that it was not plunged by its own intemperate haste into a travesty on justice which would have made the Scottsboro case a living grievance against the operation of its courts.

A Dismaying Verdict

For the second time, a verdict of guilty has been returned in the case of the Negroes charged with rape in Alabama, but it probably will be no more convincing than was the first. The verdict of the first trial at Scottsboro was overruled by the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that it was conducted in an atmosphere so charged with prejudice that justice could not be administered. The second trial was conducted in another town fifty miles distant, but the effort to escape popular hostility against the race of the defendants was apparently unavailing. It manifested itself not simply in the attitude of the public, but in the plea of the local prosecutor to the jury, in which not only the race of the defendants but the race of their counsel was made the subject of a bigoted attack.

Since the case of the State in the second trial was considerably weakened by the repudiation of much of the evidence offered at the first, one of the women involved retracting her former testimony completely, the verdict rendered leaves observers shocked and dismayed. Nothing but praise can be given the Judge who presided over the trial, for his charge to the jury, to say nothing of his conduct of the trial, was plainly directed to the end that no prejudice should enter in, and he apparently was as much surprised by the verdict as the counsel for the defense. At the first trial, the boys were tried together. Now they are being tried separately. Another jury may bring in another verdict, but the influence of prejudice apparently is a tremendous force in Alabama.

SOME LIBERALS TURN

A few weeks ago the press of the Nation had occasion to pass judgment on justice as it is given in Alabama.

There was a trial in North Alabama, (It was in Decatur, if memory serves us right) where a jury decided that the defendant was guilty of a serious crime.

With few exceptions the whole of the press outside this State adversely criticized the jury verdict. And among the newspapers which saw fit to bring questions into the case other than that of the guilt or innocence of the prisoners were several highly respected Virginia journals.

Most of the Virginia newspapers, with a somewhat pseudo-altruistic attitude that comes so easily to those who deplore the treatment of their neighbor's children (and who do not share the responsibility of rearing the children), condemned the jury's verdict.

It seems that the Virginia newspapers believed the Negro defendant suffered at the hands of ~~prejudiced~~ Alabama whites.

This sideline liberalism is made all the more interesting now that the Virginia press has had time to express its opinion of the conduct of the snooty, blue-blooded Judge Lowell, of Boston.

The gentleman of that city where the Lowells speak only to the Cabots and the Cabots speak only to God and where (according to superstitious tradition) gilt edge snobbery is surpassed only in "Ol' Virginia, Suh," thinks the jury system in the Grand Old State is all wrong.

But the Virginia press, which, after all knows more about justice in Virginia than does the prejudiced Lowell, of Boston, says that Virginia is capable of seeing justice done without outside interference.

Far be it from us to overlook a chance to criticize adversely Virginia justice—or justice anywhere—should false steps be taken. And far be it from us to resent criticism of our own State if it is fair and just.

But somehow we believe that the Virginia newspapers, including the brilliant Norfolk Virginian-Pilot, which condemned justice in Alabama and later defended the right of Virginia to decide the guilt or innocence of its Negro fugitive, were wrong the first time and right the second time.

We believe that a jury of 12 white Alabamians can be just as fair to a Negro defendant as can be 12 white Virginians to a Negro defendant. And certainly we believe 12 white Virginians will be more fair with any Negro defendant than one white Massachusetts jurist has been to the State that gave Thomas Jefferson and Woodrow Wilson to the world.

Yet if the charge against the Virginia fugitive was not such a serious one, and if the murder of two women was not such a deplorable crime, truly we would enjoy watching some of the newspapers of that State uncomfortably swallowing their own ink.

The attacks upon the courts of Alabama in an effort to prevent nine negro hobos from standing trial for ~~the~~ heinous offense of assaulting two white women after forcing their white men or boy companions off a moving train on the Southern railway in Jackson county, by a New York lawyer, Samuel Liebowitz, was astonishing as the eight negroes convicted at Scottsboro were given a new trial and the new trial carried to Decatur when started. Judge Horton overrued Liebowitz's demurs and the trial of the first of eight negroes resulted in the conviction of Heywood Patterson, a Chattanooga negro, and he was given a sentence of death. Liebowitz tacts and language in handling the trial were such as to call for replies from Attorney General Knight and Circuit Solicitor Wright. At the end of Patterson trial, court recess until last Monday morning, on convening court Judge Horton took the defendants' attorneys by surprise in continuing the trial of the other seven negroes to date later to be determined by stating conditions had arisen to the extent that he felt a fair and just trial might not be possible at this tim Judge Horton is not only a wis and conservative jurist but learned scholar in law and cour procedures.

NEGRO IN THE NORTH

Atty Ben Davis, speaking in Springfield yesterday on the matter of the conviction of the Negro boys at Scottsboro, Ala., and the campaign of terrorism against the colored man in the South, declared, and quite rightly, that even the Negro in the North does not have all of his rights. Indeed he does not. Nor half of them. "Here in the North," said Davis, "the Negro is the victim of a sort of refined prejudice, or in other words it is sugar coated."

Davis is not exaggerating the situation. To be sure, the Negro is seldom, if ever, the victim of mob vengeance or terrorism of that nature. He is not persecuted, if the word may be used in a certain sense. But that he has anything like the equality he is entitled to is ridiculous to assume.

In the field of the arts the Negro has advanced very materially and there is more than ever a tendency to recognize his ability with entire disregard of his color. But even in the field of arts there have been notable occasions in recent years where prejudice has been carried to extremes in his case.

It is not social equality that the Negro is largely working for. The organized Negro, so to speak. It is the right to earn his living without regard to his color and to be recognized for whatever worth he may possess despite his color. Let us hope that we are at least getting a little nearer to that desideratum here in the North. We have made some progress but there is room for plenty of more.

RACIAL HATREDS

"We are a white race and a negro ~~race here~~ together—we are here to live together. The world at this time and in many lands is showing intolerance and is showing hate. It seems sometimes almost as if love had deserted the human bosom. It seems that hate had taken its place. It is only for a time, gentlemen, in the great things of life, it is God's great principles, matters of eternal right, that alone live. Wrong dies and truth forever lasts, and we should have faith in that."

It was an Alabama judge who said that, a white man, a gentleman of the oldest American stock. Judge Horton, in charging the jury, was speaking only of the exhibition of race hatred and race prejudice in the trial of the unfortunate Negroes who were convicted of assaulting two white women at Scottsboro, but he might have been speaking for and to all the world.

Not in many years, perhaps not in centuries, have there been such violent outbreaks of racial hatreds as have been manifesting themselves in these troublous times. In Germany the Nazi government has proclaimed its hatred of the Jews to the point of barring them from almost every phase of national life. Between the Germans and the Poles hatred is so intense that when the shadow of a German flag, on the Polish border, fell on Polish soil, there was an indignant protest by the Polish government! The Italian people are developing a new national pride which has racial intolerance as its foundation. And we do not need to point to the racial hatreds which have barred the Orientals from Australia and the United States.

We do not by any means advocate opening the door to all sorts and conditions of men, but we do believe that these racial hatreds are a step backward and not forward in the world's progress. We believe that it is possible for all the peoples of the world to get along amicably, since we are all in the world and can't get out of it. If it proves impossible, because of the stirring up of racial hatreds by prejudices or malicious interests, then we can see nothing ahead but a complete collapse of civilization as we know it and a return to the Dark Ages when every man's hand was turned against his brother.

he Roosevelt Government and The Scottsboro March

5-4-33

new york N.Y.

On Saturday morning, the New York contingent of the Scottsboro march leaves for Washington.

The American masses, Negro and white, are determined that the Decatur lynch verdict against Haywood Patterson, and the lynch verdicts against the nine innocent Scottsboro boys shall not be executed.

The Decatur lynch decision has electrified the masses into action against the whole system and the national oppression of the Negro people. Negro and white, they are resolved that the lynch terror and the jim-crow degradation of the Negro masses must once and for all be ended.

What do the Scottsboro marchers demand?

This historic march will confront Roosevelt and the whole federal government at Washington with the question of the centuries-long oppression of the Negro people. It will compel Roosevelt and the United States government to break their silence on the Scottsboro lynch verdicts.

The marchers will remind Roosevelt that he is sworn to uphold the 13th, 14th and 15th amendments of the constitution, guaranteeing the Negro people elementary civil rights, the right to vote, the right to sit on juries, etc.

They will demand that Roosevelt make good the honeyed promises which he made so freely to the Negro people before his election.

The Negro and white masses are aware that the struggle for the lives of the Scottsboro boys is part of the struggle for the liberation of the whole Negro people.

How serious is the challenge of the Scottsboro March to the whole lynch system can be gauged by the frenzy and cunning of the demagogy of the various groups that are attempting to cripple the movement.

From Tammany Hall to the N.A.A.C.P. and the Negro reformists, they all are trying to break the confidence of the masses in the effectiveness of the march.

The Scottsboro Marchers demand that President Roosevelt enforce the 13th, 14th and 15th amendments to the constitution. The Scottsboro Marchers demand that the Scottsboro boys shall not die.

And all the reformists and enemies of the Negro masses say is that "President Roosevelt has no power to interfere." "We must wait till the Supreme Court acts". "The march is unconstitutional."

President Wilson also "had no power to interfere", in the case of Tom Mooney in 1917. But the storm of workers' protests forced him to find "power to interfere."

The Negro reformists told the Negro people to leave the nine Scottsboro boys in the hands of the Alabama judges. Today, the whole world knows that if this had been done, if the Communist Party and the International Labor Defense had not roused the powerful protest of the workers of the world, that the nine Scottsboro boys would have been executed two years ago.

Today, the Negro reformists of the N.A.A.C.P., etc., continue the same advice. But the Negro and white masses have learned that their protest, combined with the protest of the peoples of the world alone will save the Scottsboro boys.

The Negro and white masses are learning that only mass actions will destroy lynch terror, jim-crowism, and the whole system of national oppression of the Negro people.

SCOTTSBORO FREES NEGRO

THE mighty walls of the old Slave Empire are crumbling--falling down!

The Scottsboro case centered a terrific fire on the Southern oligarchy and did more to free the Negro than the guns of the Union Army.

Real freedom is of the spirit. Human beings are never free until their souls are free. The subjection of the mind is infinitely worse than physical bondage. "Liberty or death" comprehends more than chains and prison bars.

5-4-33

Philadelphia Pa

The decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Neal versus Delaware wherein that court decided that the trial of a Negro by a jury from which all Negroes are excluded from the panel because of color is unconstitutional, struck a death blow at the vicious Southern jury system.

The opinion of Federal Judge Lowell of Massachusetts in refusing to allow the return of Crawford to Virginia exploded and tore holes in the machinery of Southern courts. This learned jurist based his opinion on common sense and the spirit of the law. He followed the opinion of the Supreme Court in the now famous Neal vs. Delaware case.

These decisions evidence the fact that all white men are not void of fairness and common decency. They prove that both God and Justice still live.

But the most important thing is that Negroes have taken on new hope and courage. In the words of Samuel Leibowitz, chief counsel for the Scottsboro defense—"The real heroes of the Scottsboro case were not the members of counsel but those 280 Negro men who paraded to the witness stand for nine days to testify that they had never been called to serve on a jury; that they were qualified. The question of jury service was the sore spot in the case. It was the bitterest pill for the Attorney General to swallow, for it was questioning a Southern custom. Those brave men must continue to live down there, I could leave at anytime."

These Negroes who formerly had obeyed their master's voice refused to be brow-beaten or intimidated. They walked to the witness stand with their heads erect and their chins out realizing that for a Negro to testify in any manner favorable to other Negroes accused of rape against a white woman in Alabama might mean sudden death, the destruction of their homes (one of the witnesses' home was destroyed by fire) or the lives of their wives and children.

Slowly perhaps, but nevertheless positively, colored Americans are reaching the breaking point. For years they have fought a battle to survive. They compromised and gave way as a matter of policy but not of principle. This has been misunderstood to mean that Negroes did not want to enjoy full American citizenship; that they were satisfied with a little less than equal opportunity.

This philosophy may or may not have been necessary to permit the Negro to live and propagate himself in the midst of his persecutors. But the day of the hat-in-hand Negro has gone. The servile "Uncle Tom" type exists, but he is scorned and has lost his voice in the councils of Negro leadership. He is out of step with the present desires and wishes of his fellows. His counsel is no longer heeded as his former followers gradually move farther to the "left." Whatever purpose he was to have served has been finished. Peace to his ashes and may God bless his soul as his fellowmen march forward with heads erect toward absolute equality.

The Scottsboro Case

(Birmingham News.)

Much of the intelligent and devoted work in the interest of harmony between the white people and the Negroes in the South has been frustrated by the flaring passions fucussed upon Decatur during the last ten days. The consecrated life of Dr. Booker T. Washington and that of his worthy successor at Tuskegee institute have been partially nullified by this fresh outbreak of brutal hatred. What has been done by such responsible and sincere organizations as the Commission on Interracial Co-operation and a committee composed of men like Dr. Howard W. Odum and George Fort Milton for the study and discouragement of lynching has suffered a needless setback.

This newspaper is in no position to pass judgment upon any of the official acts of the court at Decatur. As a Southern institution, however, it is deeply concerned in serving the best interests of the South. The welfare of this section depends upon good will beeween the white and the black races. Any person, be he a Southerner or a Northerner, who deliberately exercises an influence calculated to injure that good will is not a friend of the South. As the News has already attempted to point out, there are men in Alabama who by nature are capable of thinking of the Scottsboro case in terms of legal and moral integrity. Judge James E. Horton, for instance, is one of those men. In the face of the most taxing circumstances he proved a consecration to truth and duty which was almost superhuman. When difficulties of the case became actually insurmountable he courageously closed the doors of the courthouse in order to avoid making a mockery of the justice which he has sworn to uphold. The state of Alamama should see to it that men with Judge Horton's brand of honor are its representatives in future trials of the Scottsboro case.

Much pendulum thinking has been done on both sides of this case. That is to say, there has been a tendency for individuals, organizations and sometimes for newspapers to fly to extreme conclusions. The steadying and conservative influences have been all too few in comparison with the radical and irresponsible factors. It goes without saying that the connection of the International Labor Defense with the case is extremely unfortunate for both sides. If it is true, as many persons have averred, that the I. L. D. wishes to make martyrs of these Negro defendants, that it wishes to insure their execution in order to add incendiary force to its worldwide Communistic propaganda, then it certainly does not behoove the prosecution to run headlong into such a trap.

Southerners should realize that the wildly radical International Labor Defense is no more respectable in the North than it is in this part of the country. It is erroneous for us as Southerners to leap to the conclusion that representatives of the I. L. D. are men who embody the characteristically Northern view on the Negro question. As a matter of fact, conservative and balanced attitudes on the Negro in the North are not very different from views on a corresponding plane in the South. Although it is frankly seeking the best interests of the Negro, the American Association for the Advancement of Colored People is almost aristocratic as contrasted with the unruly, chaotic and anarchistic International Labor Defense. The one compares with the other about as the extremely radical I. W. W. organizations have compared with the American Federation of Labor.

In reality, the Scottsboro case is not a grand fight to the finish between the state of Alabama and the rest of the world. It has deevloped into an important test involving the legal situation of the Negro in the United States. The South is profoundly interested in a fair and equitable settlement of that question. In placing a man like Judge Horton on the bench the state of Alabama has gone a long way toward establishing its good faith. Now if the legal counsel on both sides at the next trial can be composed of men capable of seeing the larger issues at stake, the whole matter of racial attitudes in the United States will be advanced as much as that cause would be hindered by a further display of single-tracked rancor and malice.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE

The Scottsboro case in Alabama has brought about a number of regrettable incidents. Negro sympathizers and certain labor agitators are claiming that a fair trial was not given to Heyward Patterson for the second time when he was again convicted and sentenced to the electric chair for criminally assualting a white girl.

It seems almost impossible that two different juries of twelve men each would find this man guilty of the crime if the evidence did not warrant it. If, under the circumstances the negro was not guilty, justice in Alabama would be at a low ebb. It is our opinion that it would have been impossible for twenty-four men to agree upon such a verdict if there was not a proper cause. These men heard all the evidence and should have been in a position to judge accordingly.

However, persecution is being charged and negroes are being told that they are suffering from white supremacy. We do not believe that the more intelligent negroes will support the cause of the condemned negro. He brought disgrace and dishonor upon his race and if such deeds go unpunished then lynch law will be adopted.

Labor agitators are endeavoring to make capital out of this case by appealing to the southern negro. Wo do not believe that they will get far with the matter.

Reasonable Doubt!

It Still Exists in Those Scottsboro Cases

Heywood Patterson, one of nine Negroes for whom the Supreme Court ordered a new trial, is sentenced to death after the jury had deliberated nearly twenty-four hours. He and the eight other Negroes are accused of a crime against two white women, a crime punished by death in Alabama.

One of the women, who formerly accused the men, swore at Patterson's recent trial that he and the other Negroes were innocent, had never molestad her or the second woman. The Rev. Dr. Fosdick of New York, she said, persuaded her to tell the truth. The second woman swore that the nine, Patterson included, were guilty, as she had sworn at the first trial.

Seven of the other Negroes will be tried, one at a time, with one woman, presumably, swearing to their guilt, the other swearing to their innocence. The ninth is a minor.

The strange thing, which makes the case unusual, is that the Southern judge, in his jury charge, describes both women as "women of the underworld." They were traveling in a freight car with hoboes at the time the crime is alleged to have been committed.

With one woman swearing one way, the other swearing the other, and the judge describing both as unworthy of belief because of moral turpitude, there would seem to be considerable possibility of "reasonable doubt" in the case.

NEW YORK.—Between 10 and 11 a. m. this morning the New York column of the "Free the Scottsboro Boys" march will leave from Union Square on its way to Washington. Buses, trucks and private cars, bearing slogans, demanding the freedom of the Scottsboro Boys and enforcement of the 13th, 14th and 15th amendments to the constitution, will convey the delegates of Negro and white organizations. At Trenton, N. J., a contingent of marchers organized after a mass meeting in the Elk's Temple, will join the New York column. From all over the East coast and as far south as El Paso, Texas, thousands of marchers are en route to converge in Washington on Monday, May 8.

Press Demands Monday

In Washington, Monday morning, a conference will be held where the National Scottsboro Action Committee, will present the draft of the Civil Rights Bill to the marchers for ratification. From the conference the marchers will go to the capitol to demand that Congress and Roosevelt pass this bill putting teeth for enforcement of the 13th, 14th and 15th amendments to the Constitution. They will at the same time raise the demand for the freedom of the Scottsboro Boys, Angelo Herndon and Tom Mooney.

Trial of Arrested Workers

NEW YORK.—Nine Negro and white workers, arrested for holding a Scottsboro open air protest meeting were tried by Judge Brodsky yesterday in Harlem. The judge angrily ordered Charles Alexander, Negro Communist, to "stop propagating all your political views in this courtroom." The courtroom was packed and the defendants exposed the role of the Tammany city administration in trying to stifle the protest against Jimcrowism and oppression of the Negro people. The judge freed eight of the workers and found Alexander guilty, giving him a suspended sentence.

The value of the promises of Mayor O'Brien, "guaranteeing that no street meetings will be disturbed" was seen here late Thursday evening. A police detachment cut off the loud speaker being used at a protest meeting on Seventh Ave., near 134th St. Told by the chairman that Mayor O'Brien had promised them they would not be molested, the sergeant said: "I know all about that. I got my orders."

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE

One of the main difficulties in the administration of justice in the United States is the tendency to turn every major trial into a sideshow. Historians suggest that this is due to the fact that in backwoods days court week was a week of real entertainment to the early American and that his descendants have inherited his fondness for dramatic trials. The Hall-Mills murder, the "Blonde Bandit" trial, the Judd affair, seemed to be shows rather than court procedure.

As to the Scottsboro case, the strange antics of the counsel, both for the state and for the defense, have completely obscured the questions involved in the case. Both sides have lain down smoke screens behind which the issues of the trial are completely obscured.

It is a regretable commentary upon the status of justice in America that such a condition can exist.

Church Groups Back Defense

SCHENECTADY, N. Y., May 2.—A resolution denouncing the attacks on the Scottsboro boys in the Jefferson County jail in Birmingham and a demand that they be freed, was adopted by the Young People's Union of the Mt. Olivet Baptist Church there.

The delegates will be given a farewell meeting to be held at Lithuanian Hall, 703 Windsor Terrace, on Thursday.

The resolution follows:

"We, members of the Mt. Olivet Baptist Young People's Union of Schenectady, strongly protest the attack of the prison guards on the defenseless nine innocent Scottsboro boys. We condemn this as an attempt to seek excuse to lynch the boys behind prison walls. We hold the Governor of Alabama responsible for the safety of the boys. We demand unconditional release of all the boys, and we will do what we can to help secure their freedom."

No Friends of Negroes

The black man in the South ought not to have to contend with the manufactured prejudices which his pretended friends pile up against him while they purport to be acting in his interest. He has prejudice enough to meet as it is. Whatever the justice of the Scottsboro cases, in which negroes are charged with violating two young women who were catching rides on a freight train, it is clear that the defendants have been hurt by efforts ostensibly in their behalf.

The Pittsburgh Courier, a Pennsylvania negro weekly, quotes Attorney Leibowitz as explaining his loss of a jury verdict recently in the Alabama cases:

> If you ever saw those creatures: those bigots whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs', whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy, you would not ask how they can do it.

The Courier sees in that statement reason enough for the withdrawal of Leibowitz from further jury pleading in Alabama. It says that the Communists and National Association for the Advancement of the Colored People have meddled in the cases until a fair trial is all but impossible. "The agencies at work on both sides of the case," comments the Courier, "have lost sight of the boys. The prosecution is mad because the I. L. D. (Communist) long ago sent telegrams to the Judges and to the Governor, attempting to intimidate them, brow-beat them and threaten them. . . . The Scottsboro case was lost when those intimidating telegrams were sent to Alabama. . . . The prosecution went into the courts to defend what it considered the traditions of Alabama, the pride of Alabama, the insults to Alabama intelligence, and not to prosecute nine negroes."

The Courier's appeal to the interloping propagandists to get out of the case is common sense. Its appeal to Alabama officials to ignore them is common justice. Anger and hatred will never bring settlement of racial problems.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE

To the Editor The News:

Why all this hullabaloo about the Scottsboro affair? It looks now as if it is likely to cause trouble throughout the South. It should not. It is a sectional matter, and does not brook outside interference. I am neither a Southerner nor a Northerner by birth, but having lived more than 20 years in the South, I believe that I am in a position to form an opinion without being biased by the evils of the Reconstruction period. It is no use trying to explain, either by radio or through the press, to people north of the Mason and Dixon line what the white man's attitude toward the Negro in the South really is, and that that attitude is fundamentally sound. The only way in which a Northerner can get a complete and fair understanding of the relations between the two races in the South is for him to come down here and stay at least two years, and then he would find out that the supremacy of the white race is an absolute necessity, and at the same time he would find out, with very few exceptions, that the lot of our "colored brother" is much more congenial in Dixie land than it is in territory north of the Ohio River and in the Eastern and Central states.

Above all, however, it behooves all right-minded citizens to keep their heads cool and thus demonstrate the fact that justice in Alabama can be and is administered in as fair and equal a manner as it is in any other state. Any criticism that is made for the sole purpose of creating race hatred and prejudice should be treated with the silent contempt which it amply deserves.

More Decatur Negroes Bring Testimony in Trial of Scottsboro Boys to Prove Jury Exclusion Policy

Daily Worker 3-31-33

DECATUR, Ala., March 30.—"The most militant solidarity with the Scottsboro defendants is being shown by the Negro workers and farmers of Morgan and surrounding counties, and this solidarity is slowly drawing in the support of white workers and impoverished farmers."

This was the statement made by the official representative of the International Labor Defense as lawyers for the Scottsboro boys brought a succession of witnesses to prove that Negroes are systematically excluded from both grand and petit juries in Morgan county, where Haywood Patterson, one of the Negro boys, is now on trial on a framed-up "rape" charge. The others go on trial later.

The statement by the I.L.D. representative revealing the solidarity with the Scottsboro defendants is shown in a moving way by the fact that Decatur Negroes sent a barber to the jail to shave and give haircuts to the boys. At the same time the Negro families sent over changes of linen to the boys who are now being kept in a jail in Decatur which defense attorney Liebowitz, after a visit yesterday, denounced as "unfit for human habitation."

Negroes Defy Threats

Moreover, if further proof were needed, it is seen in the courage displayed by Negro witnesses in voluntarily appearing in court to expose vicious legal apparatus, which is only one aspect of the whole system of Negro oppression and lynch rule in the South. A number appeared in spite of threats which they had received.

Today 25 such witnesses were in court ready to take the stand, to testify that no Negroes had ever been called for jury service in Morgan county.

Dr. F. J. Sykes, of Decatur, a Negro witness for the defense, presented to the court today a list of 120 Negroes eligible for jury service who had never been called to serve.

Wants Venire Out

Liebowitz, I.L.D. attorney, opened the session by presenting a motion to quash the entire venire of prospective jurors on the ground that no Negroes had been called for jury service—at the same time charging that this is a violation of the rights of the Scottsboro defendants under the fourteenth amendment to the U. S. constitution.

Determined to maintain the pose of impartiality so necessary in perpetrating an effective legal frame-up, Judge Horton reversed his previous action at the first hearing in which he refused to permit the further introduction of evidence regarding Negro exclusion on juries. At the same time he overruled the defense objection to separating Haywood Patterson from the rest of the aroused merriment from some of the "better" white spectators in the courtroom, the defense attorney shouted: "If snickering or laughing continues, I will demand that the judge clear the court. This is no Roman holiday."

Knight received the surprise of his life when Banks, 55-year-old Negro bill-poster replied at one point: "I refuse to answer your question," when the prosecutor tried to show that Banks could not show conclusively that Negroes were excluded from jury service. At this point the judge once more prevented defense counsel from showing the tremendous difficulties involved in Negroes voting in Morgan County.

Challenges Judges to Question

In addition to Banks, Dr. N. E. Cashin and L. R. Womach, both Negroes and the latter a Decatur preacher, presented an additional list of Negroes qualified for jury service, but all declared that they never knew of a single Negro who has served.

After defense attorney Liebowitz had revealed by questioning that Banks was fully eligible to serve on a jury and had never been called although a voter, he asked that Judge Horton himself examine the witness to determine, if possible, why he was excluded from jury service. The judge, however, refused to do this.

An indication of the great support for the Scottsboro boys among the Negroes of the section is seen in the fact that many local Negroes are voluntarily presenting to the defense names of Negroes eligible for jury duty who would willingly appear in court to testify.

Under sharp questioning by the defense attorney, J. H. Greene, clerk of the circuit court, was compelled to admit that during four years' service he had personally not seen one Negro out of 2,500 jurors.

[illegible]

Earlier, Dr. Sykes, a graduate of Harvard University, and a resident of Decatur, who was called by the defense, said that he had "never seen nor heard of a single Negro juror in Morgan county.

Despite interjections by Judge Horton and Prosecutor Knight, Liebowitz declared:

"I want to show that Negroes in order to vote here must pass such an ordeal that proves them fit for jury service."

Sentiment Noted in Favor of Occasional Calling of Negro Talesmen.

PENAL REFORMS SOUGHT

Burns, Scottsboro and Crawford Cases Focus Attention on Both Systems.

By VIRGINIUS DABNEY.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

RICHMOND, April 27.—Action of United States District Judge James A. Lowell of Boston in thwarting the efforts of Virginia and Massachusetts to bring to trial a Negro suspected of a double murder in the Old Dominion, has served to focus public attention once more on the fact that Negroes are seldom called for jury service below the Potomac. It was on the ground that the Negro sought for trial in Virginia would be tried by a jury of whites, and that his trial would therefore be pronounced illegal by the Supreme Court, that Judge Lowell declined to permit his extradition.

Remembering the recent attack on the Southern jury system by defense counsel in the Scottsboro case, and the somewhat less recent action of Governor Moore of New Jersey in refusing to extradite Robert E. Burns to Georgia, because of the allegedly inhuman treatment he would receive on a chain gang there, the South is doing some soul-searching.

Loose Talk Deplored.

Those who view the action of Judge Lowell objectively deplore the abuse which he has received from certain Southern sources. They point out that whereas the Boston jurist apparently went outside his proper province when he attempted to forecast the action of the Virginia authorities and the attitude of the Supreme Court he stated specifically that he had no "doubt the defendant would get a fair trial in Virginia."

Although believing strongly that the district judge erred in refusing to send the Negro George Crawford back to Virginia, they deplore the public expression by a Richmond lawyer of the opinion that among Judge Lowell's ancestors "were plenty of Southern carpetbaggers"; nor do they feel that anything is to be gained through such unrestrained denunciations as that indulged in by Representative Dies of Texas, who stated that the judge displayed "a venom and prejudice unparalleled in the judicial history of this or any other country." These statements from Southerners were matched by Representative Luce of Massachusetts, who said on the House floor that "to send a Negro back to Virginia for trial would be like sending a Jew to Germany."

Negroes Rarely Called.

It is true that Negroes are not often called for jury service in Virginia, except in the Federal courts, but it cannot be assumed that when a Negro is tried in Virginia the jury is certain to be entirely white.

However, the Crawford episode has brought many Virginians and other Southerners to a realization that something probably will have to be done about the Southern jury system. The opinion seems to prevail that the Supreme Court would reverse the latest Scottsboro conviction on the ground that there were no Negroes on the jury, and now the action of Judge Lowell has tended to confirm that view.

The attitude of many thoughtful Southerners toward the situation which has been precipitated by the Scottsboro and Crawford cases is that it would be wise for Southern courts to begin calling Negro jurors from time to time. Some fifteen or twenty years ago this was done in the Richmond Hustings Court, for example, and with satisfactory results. The Richmond News Leader has the following to say of the existing situation:

"Failure to call Negroes for jury service in the South will produce more and more complications as time goes on. The second trial of the Scottsboro case probably has marked an epoch in this respect. Increasingly it will be contended that white juries are prejudiced against Negro prisoners in cases involving alleged crimes against white women. This, in turn, may increase the difficulties of extraditing Negroes who escape into Northern States. To avoid this, the fair and prudent course, in our opinion, is to remove the cause of complaint by using Negro jurors on occasion."

As for the final adjudication of Judge Lowell's action, there is anparent confidence in legal and judicial circles here that the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, to which the decision has been appealed, will bring in a reversal.

Possible Changes Seen.

The more level-headed observers are deploring the abuse that has been indulged in by both sides. There was similar recrimination in connection with the Burns case last December, when the Governor of New Jersey refused to honor extradition papers of the Georgia authorities. Here is another decision which may set a precedent, for any Northern Governor who is convinced that a Southern State is without an up-to-date penal system may feel at liberty hereafter to decline to send a fugitive South to prison.

In the case of Georgia, the iniquities of the prison system were exaggerated, but William B. Cox, secretary of the National Society of Penal Information, testified at the hearing that "there is no State in the Union where the penal system is as bad as it is in Georgia."

One surmises that Mr. Cox knows whereof he speaks when one considers that so loyal a Southerner as George Gordon Battle joined with Clarence Darrow in petitioning Governor Moore not to extradite Burns.

Thus the past five months have seen the Southern penal systems brought sharply into the spotlight, along with the Southern jury systems. It may be that we are about to witness substantial changes in both of them as a result of the recent episodes.

DECRIES RACE BIAS AT NEGROES' TRIAL

Dr. Chalmers, Back From the South, Says Prejudice Rules Social Order There.

FOUND SITUATION TRAGIC

New York

Scottsboro Case Only One of Many, Most of Which Are Never Heard of Here, Pastor Declares.

The Rev. Dr. Allan Knight Chalmers, pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle Congregational Church at Fifty-sixth Street, who has just returned from a tour of the South, commented yesterday in his sermon on the Scottsboro case and deplored the prejudice to which he attributed the recent conviction of one of the Negro defendants.

"The passions and the prejudices of men make them do strange things," he said. "They set them on opposite sides from their real desires and make strange alignments on difficult issues.

"The immediate example of this for us all, made particularly pertinent by my recent trip through the South, is the so-called Scottsboro case. The discouraging thing is that cases fully as important are going on constantly and we never hear anything about them. We use the Scottsboro case today because it is so well known.

"I inquired about it every place I went—Southern white men, Negroes of different classes. Let us grant the fact that my contacts were in the main with those who had inclination to be partisans. Yet over and over again I found myself thinking about the French Revolution. Do you remember in those days how the accusation was enough? The cases were frequent of grudges paid by lodging information with the citizens' committee, and the suspicion was enough.

"We do not rightly understand the difficulties of white and black alike in the South unless we recognize this powerful and oftentimes unrealized influence on their thinking. The greatest tragedy to me in it was to see the faces of the Negroes as they spoke of it. A hopeless acceptance of a fact.

"That is the fundamental issue. A social order has grown up around an experience and a fear and it makes it almost impossible for right-thinking men to do the right, the true thing, even if they see the issue clearly."

SOUTHERNERS AND NEGROES

Editor of Citizen:

THE Scottsboro case again discloses the extreme ignorance of the average northerner about the race question in the south. Contrary to what most northerners believe, the southern people do not hate Negroes. In fact, the average southerner is a much better friend of the Negro than the average northerner.

With a tremendous colored population, the south has long found it necessary to separate the white and colored races to prevent race friction. This is simply an honest and intelligent way of handling a social problem, and educated Negro leaders approve and insist upon this separation.

No one knows better than I do that the commission of a vicious crime against a white woman or a child makes the ordinarily good natured southerner's blood boil, and he is altogether too likely to take the law into his own hands. Such crimes endanger to otherwise harmonious relations between the races. For these reasons, the crimes with which the Scottsboro boys are charged are of the most serious nature.

I do not know whether these boys are guilty as charged, but I do know that their "defense" has not been to their best interests. It is unfortunate that a certain organization is using this case merely for publicity. The boys are not Communists, but simply irresponsible youths who got themselves into serious trouble.

The services of any number of skilled attorneys, white and colored are available in Alabama. A "defense" based upon class, sectional and race prejudices, conducted by a lawyer who has not the slightest sympathy with American institutions or social conditions in the south, cannot represent the true interests of the accused in this case; neither can any court, no matter how fair, assure an impartial trial.

Furthermore, southern people, white and colored, resent the meddling of outside agitators in affairs of which they have no real knowledge or interest. When Heywood Broun stops the sale of judgeships, the purchase of juries and witnesses and the "taking for a ride" of state's witnesses, the good people of Alabama will be ready to welcome his advice.—Alabaman.

"BOXCAR HOBOES"

Editor of Citizen:

WHETHER the Scottsboro Negroes are guilty or not, I wouldn't have supposed that southern white "ladies" would lower themselves to become boxcar hoboes. As for the north not knowing how to deal with Negroes, the north does know how to give anyone a fair trial, white or black.—Lucille Williams.

THEORY VS. FACT

Editor of Citizen:

THE statements of "Southron" and "Southern Rebel" are based on pure theory, not fact. At the first trial, about two years ago, Ruby Bates testified under oath that the Negro defendants had assaulted her. At the recent trial she testified, again under oath, that her previous testimony had been a lie. The only thing she proved at both trials was that her testimony was false.

Yet it was her evidence, in the first trial, that convicted the defendants. The district attorney charged that "northern Jew money" had bought her off, before the second trial, but there was no evidence to support this charge. Just another theory.

If the Scottsboro defendants are proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, I believe firmly they should be punished, as should any man who commits such a crime as they are charged with.—W. D. M., Delaware, O.

NEGROES IN THE NORTH

Editor of Citizen:

WHAT, asks "Southron," does the north know about how to deal with the Negro? Well, the north knows that the Negro is decidedly human; that in a few brief years of freedom he has made progress that the free white race required centuries to make; that he is entitled to decent respect.

The crime charged against the Scottsboro youth is, in reality, not a crime. The prosecution is exploiting southern hatred of the Negro. Great numbers of southerners have never realized that the Negroes are no longer slaves, and continue to regard them as less than human beings.

I do not uphold my people, or any other people, in wrong, but my sense of justice is strong. I have small respect for people like "Southron" and "Southern Rebel," who ask newspapers to print letters they are afraid to sign with their real names.—William Davis.

REGARDLESS OF COLOR"

Editor of Citizen:

SO the north does not know how to handle Negroes! Well, the north does give men accused of crime a fair trial, regardless of their color. We don't go in mobs, like hounds on the trail of a rabbit, after a man who has committed—or is suspected of having committed—a crime. The Negro, in the north, knows his place and stays in it. If he makes a mistake, we or our fair courts teach him correctly.

The Negro, in the north, has a chance. Knowing that he will be dealt with fairly, he trusts the law. There are no race wars; there are almost no lynchings, legal or illegal.

It is the north, and not the south, it seems to me, that does know how to handle Negroes.—Arden Brown.

SCOTTSBORO PLEA MADE IN CAPITAL

Delegation Accompanied by Girl in Case Visits White House With Petition

5-9-33

Macon Ga.

WASHINGTON, May 8 (AP).—A parade of 3,000 whites and Negroes Monday sought from President Roosevelt and congressional leaders, intervention to free the nine Alabama Negroes convicted of criminal assaults in the renowned Scottsboro case.

In the van of the march was the girl, who after once swearing the men had attacked her, reappeared at a new trial as a surprise witness and reversed her testimony. With her went James Ford, Negro Communist and William L. Petterson, Negro national secretary of the International Labor defense. Along also was Janie Patterson, mother of Haywood Patterson, at whose retrial the girl changed her story. He was convicted again and is for the second time under sentence of death.

At the White House the leaders saw Louis McHenry Howe, presidential secretary. They complained bitterly upon being told the president was too busy conferring with Dr. Hjalmar Schacht, special German envoy, to receive their petitions in person.

Rainey Meets Delegation

They marched then to the capitol. Speaker Rainey saw them.

"We demand congressional action for the unconditional release of the Scottsboro boys," Ford told Rainey. "We present also a bill of rights demanding legislation to guarantee enforcement of the 13th and 14th amendments."

"The petition will be referred to the judiciary committee," Rainey replied. "As for the Scottsboro case, that is a matter for the courts. Congress has no authority to direct the release of men charged with a crime."

The girl said: "The Scottsboro boys are absolutely innocent."

"You testified once they were guilty?" Rainey asked.

"Yes, sir."

"Now you retract?"

"Yes, sir."

"Gesture of Contempt"

"What caused you to change your mind?"

"Well, I didn't want to see innocent boys suffer."

"Because you had perjured yourself?"

"Yes sir, under duress," replied the girl.

Then they called on Vice President Garner, who told them he would refer their petition to the appropriate senate committee.

Although at the White House attaches said the president was making a practice, now that business is so heavy, of referring petitioners to Howe, Patterson as spokesman for the marchers said they regarded Mr. Roosevelt's refusal to see them as a "gesture of contempt."

SCOTTSBORO WRITS SOUGHT TO FREE TWO

Defense Lawyer Says Wright and Williams, as Juveniles, Are 'Incapable of Crime.'

5-6-33

A new plan to obtain the immediate release from jail of two of the nine Negroes awaiting a second trial on a charge of attacking two white girls near Scottsboro, Ala., two years ago was announced yesterday by George W. Chamlee, one of the defense attorneys, upon his arrival here to confer with officials of the International Labor Defense, the Communist organization which is supporting the attempt to save the defendants from the electric chair.

Mr. Chamlee, former attorney general of Chattanooga, Tenn., and the only Southerner associated with the defense at the recent trial of Haywood Patterson in Decatur, Ala., said he was preparing petitions for writs of habeas corpus for Roy Wright and Eugene Williams.

Wright and Williams, both juveniles, are in the Jefferson County jail in Birmingham with their seven co-defendants, for whom the United States Supreme Court ordered new trials. Under the laws of Alabama defendants under 16 must be tried in juvenile court. The fact that Wright and Williams were only 13 years old when arrested rendered them incapable of committing a crime, according to Mr. Chamlee, because they were under the age of "accountability" in Alabama.

Mr. Chamlee said that an amended motion for a new trial for Haywood Patterson would be filed soon. Patterson, the only one of the Negroes to be tried since the United States Supreme Court reversed the verdict of the jury in the original trial in Scottsboro, has been convicted again and sentenced to death.

DECATUR DENTIST SAYS "AIR STILL HOT" IN ALABAMA TOWN

Because he had the courage and honesty to go on the stand at Decatur, Ala., during the Scottsboro boys' trial and testify to the exclusion of Negroes from the jury rolls of the state, Dr. Frank J. Sykes, former Howard University and Baltimore Black Sox star pitcher, shown above on the stand, has been intimidated along with other friends and members of his family who testified "We are still going about our business in the usual manner," Dr. Sykes wrote the Guide this week. He also confirming the burning of crosses recently before his office and the home where the Guide reporters stayed while in Decatur.

"The air here is still a little hot," he adds. It was plenty hot while he was on the stand. This exclusive Journal and Guide and Coouerative Publishers photograph is a most interesting courtroom study. Note the dead aim a deputy sheriff has on the cuspidor and the peculiar look a spectator, at the right with his feet on the rail, is giving Dr. Sykes. Both the white men are sitting in the jury box, which was unoccupied until after the jury was selected following a week's arguments in various defense motions.

THE SCOTTSBORO FUND

Many are obsessed with the idea that the Scottsboro boys must be saved from death and that every legal means must be found in doing so. To wage such a legal battle funds are necessary and in no small amounts. The attitude of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in this cause is to be commended. At first it withdrew from the case because officials of the other organization were not in favor of being in co-accord. Noting the present situation and the necessity for increased and immediate funds, the National Association is asking all of its branches and friends to contribute liberally. This request should be heeded. In this action the Association has thrown aside whatever idea of differences there might have been and has united in the one purpose of saving the boys and at the same time settling certain legal grounds that will be far-reaching so far as the standing of the Negro in a certain section of the country is concerned. Grand jury service has been denied the Negro in the South and in but very few places are they permitted in a limited way to serve on the petit jury. The United States Supreme court has already decided that the conviction of a colored man by jury from which his race is denied service is illegal. This is being stressed especially in the Scottsboro case and the question will again be presented to this court after following the usual course. The lawyers for the boys have adroitly planned their action and gathered evidences and admissions from the Alabama officials and the court that will strengthen the jury serving contention. All of our people must become aroused to this momentous question and should respond with sufficient funds to have it finally settled by the Supreme court.

Ministers' Alliance Endorses Scottsboro Defense Fund Move

WASHINGTON. — Following a lively discussion on the merits of maintaining the present defense counsel for the Scottsboro boys, in which members of the Washington Ministers' Interdenominational Alliance took issue with the Rev. Robert W. Brooks, president of the group, that body [illegible] on record this week as endorsing the nation-wide campaign being conducted by the Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity—to raise money for further trials of the boys.

A symposium of ministerial opinion expressed by members of the alliance is as follows:

Bishop E. D. W. Jones: "This cause links the Jew and the Negro. I want the ministers of Washington, not only to endorse, but contribute to this fight. We need to get down into the mainstream with the people."

Rev. Brooks Speaks

The Rev. Robert W. Brooks, president of the alliance: "Let me be understood. If we find it more difficult to get justice for these boys under present auspices, wouldn't it be the better part of wisdom to get better auspices? If these boys die we will have less standing, legally, than before.

"I think these boys are exceedingly unfortunate in having Jewish lawyers, under the auspices of the Communists, to represent them. I believe that the N.A.A.C.P. lawyers could have shown a better diplomacy."

The Rev. H. B. Taylor, pastor of the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian Church: "I believe these boys were fortunate in having Leibowitz because he has forced the South to show its rabid, uncontrolled prejudice as no other, type of lawyer could have done. The white man of the South is capable of the grossest form of prejudice, without provocation. This man has brought this to the attention of the whole world."

The Rev. R. A. Fairley, pastor of Tabor Presbyterian Church: "I believe we should endorse the stand taken by the Alpha Phi Alpha fraternity."

The Rev. A. F. Elmes, pastor of People's Congregational Church: "The issue is the Scottsboro boys. It doesn't make any difference who is behind their defense—Jew. Gentile, red or non-red—let's get behind the cause."

"Reds" Praised

The Rev. T. H. Medford, secretary of the A.M.E. Zion board of foreign missions: "I think we should stand squarely behind whoever is fighting this case. I think the Communists, through Mr. Leibowitz, have done more than anybody else could have done. I do not believe you could have gotten a Southern white man to push the case forward as far as it has gone. Nobody has the courage to do what those reds do."

5-3-33 New York, N.Y.

NEW YORK.—"The struggle for the freedom of the nine innocent Scottsboro boys has spurred the fight for all the rights of the Negro people, the violation of which the Scottsboro case is one of the most drastic expressions."

This is the keynote of a statement just issued by the National Scottsboro Action Committee, contained in a leaflet now being distributed by the hundreds of thousands in Harlem and other centers of the country.

The statement continues:

"On Saturday, the 6th of May, the great Scottsboro March to Washington will start from New York. The marchers of New Jersey, Philadelphia and Baltimore will join the New York contingent and unite in the mighty conference with the delegations from the South and West in Washington.

TO PRESENT DEMANDS.

"The marchers assembled in Washington will convene in a conference to send a delegation to present to the President of the United States and to Congress the demands of the Negro people, the demands of the millions of white and Negro workers of the U. S. A.:

"1.—Immediate unconditional release of the Scottsboro boys.

"2.—The immediate release of Angelo Herndon, the five Tallapoosa share-croppers and Mooney and Billings.

"3.—The real enforcement of the rights of the Negro people, as guaranteed by the 13th, 14th and 15th Ammendments to the U. S. Constitution; abolition of Jim Crowism, of discrimination, peonage, lynching; the exercising of the right to vote, the right to sit on juries.

"LET US MARCH."

"Let us march! Let us build a tremendous movement for the freedom of the Scottsboro boys and at the same time strike a blow for the full rights of the Negro people!

"All those who are ready to take up the struggle for these demands and save the lives of these nine innocent Scottsboro boys, shall register as marchers at one of the following stations:

77 W. 131st St.; 15 W. 126th St.; 119 W. 135th St.; 114 W. 135th St.; 1412 Fifth Ave.; 2249 Seventh Ave.

"All those who do not register through organizations, or at the above mentioned stations and who wish to join the march, paying the $3 fare, shall register at the following offices:

International Labor Defense, District Office, Room 338; 799 Broadway (at 11th Street).

National Scottsboro Action Committee, 119 West 135th Street, Harlem.

All Harlem marchers shall assemble on Saturday, May 6th, at 7 a. m at 114 W. 135th St., where the buses will be stationed. This column will unite at Union Square with the other New York columns.

All organizations—churches, lodges, unions, etc.—participating in the Scottsboro march should immediately notify the National Scottsboro Action Committee, 119 W. 135th St., and should see that their delegates are on hand at the Harlem assembling point at 114 W. 135th St., Saturday, May 6, at 7 a. m. All organizations are to take care of the transportation and food of their marchers.

Those collecting contributions for the Scottsboro march are urged by the Scottsboro National Action Committee to turn them in at once at the headquarters of the Committee. Hundreds of cans, containing donations, have not yet been turned in, it is pointed out, and funds are urgent to defray the expenses of the march.

Ruby Bates To Speak

NEW YORK,—Ruby Bates, Southern white girl whose dramatic repudiation of her previous charges of rape caused a sensation at the recent retrial of the nine Scottsbro boys in the Scottsboro case at Dectaur, Ala., will address the send-off mass meeting for the "Scottsboro marchers to Washington" next Friday evening at the new St. Nicholas Arena, 66th street and Columbus Avenue, the National Scottsboro Action Committee announced today.

Carter Also Speaks

The Committee which is sponsoring the meeting also reported that among the other speakers at the meeting would be Lester Carter, who was with Ruby Bates and Victoria Price on the Alabama freight train two years ago which carried the Negro boys whom the girls later accused of assault.

Carter testified at the recent trial that the Negro boys had not molested either girl during the ride.

Joseph Brodsky and Gen. George W. Chamlee, attorneys for the International Labor Defense, which handled the defense of the boys, will tell the meeting the details of the trial which led to the conviction and death sentence of Haywood Patterson, first of the nine youths to be retried, and he will also outline the next steps to be taken in the case.

MR. SPIVAK TAKES EXCEPTION

Courier 5-6-33 Pittsburgh Pa.

MR. JOHN L. SPIVAK, author of that excellent expose of Negro exploitation and persecution in the South, "Georgia Nigger," who recently covered the Patterson trial in Decatur for The Pittsburgh Courier, takes lengthy exception to our editorial in the April 22nd issue on the conduct of the case by the International Labor Defense. He thinks we are wrong in saying there was too much Communist propaganda in connection with the case; holds that the N. A. A. C. P. would have been ineffective in handling it; contends that Attorney Leibowitz was right in denouncing the Southern white jurymen, on the ground that such denunciation will force a change of venue; that the Communist focusing of world attention on the case and on Southern persecution of the Negro generally was helpful to the Negro's cause and that of the accused boys, and insists that the International Labor Defense methods should be lauded and supported.

The Pittsburgh Courier makes no apologies for its stand. We were leading the fight for full citizenship rights for Negroes many years before the Communists came on the scene. We shall continue to do so with unabated vigor. We are probably more familiar with the South and conditions prevailing there than either Mr. Spivak or the I. L. D. We are certainly not opposed to telling the world about the persecution and exploitation of Negroes down South and elsewhere. We have been doing it ever since 1910, but we are opposed to injecting such extraneous issues as the class struggle where it is not only unnecessary, but calculated to unduly prejudice the case. It is difficult enough to get justice for Negroes because they are black without adding the burden of Red propaganda, which only further infuriates those from whom we are trying to get a square deal.

It is true the N. A. A. C. P. MIGHT have been ineffective in handling the Decatur trial, but it is reasonable to suppose that, after handling successfully the Louisville housing segregation case, the Elaine sharecroppers' trial, the 24th Infantry rioters' case, the Texas Primary cases, the Sweet case, the Parker appointment and other memorable cases that have become landmarks in the fight for Negro freedom, it might have done equally well in the Scottsboro case. It certainly has shown good sense in not lugging in extraneous issues. Anybody with the slightest knowledge of legal procedure is wise enough not to make the defense more difficult by arousing deeper hatreds than already exist.

Attorney Leibowitz was entirely wrong in launching his attack on the habits and appearance of Southern white jurymen when eight other lives were in jeopardy. It may be true that his outburst will win a change of venue from Decatur to, perhaps, Birmingham or Mobile, but will the white jurors in any other part of Alabama love Leibowitz any more than those in Decatur, knowing how he indicted ALL Southern whites? Since the trials must be held in Alabama, Leibowitz and his associates are a burden to the boys wherever they are tried.

We doubt that international protests make local juries any more liberal and just. Indeed, this "mass pressure" makes them less willing to listen to reason. Only the other day Superior Judge Ward in San Francisco had to delay the second trial of Tom Mooney because of wild demonstrations outside the courtroom, saying "I will not try this case under these circumstances. These acts preclude giving him justice under such conditions." Denying that the shouters were friends of Mooney, his chief attorney, Frank P. Walsh, stated: "Any man who takes part in such demonstrations is doing Mooney harm, almost fatal harm." Later Mooney expressed his impatience at the demonstrations. What is true in the conduct of a white man's trial is doubly true where Negroes are the defendants. Wild protests and demonstrations were held all over the world in favor of Tom Mooney, Eugene Victor Debs, Big Bill Haywood and Sacco and Vanzetti, but without the slightest effect on the outcome of their cases—and they were white men.

In our recent editorial we stressed the necessity of raising a tremendous Scottsboro defense fund, and again we take occasion to urge Negroes to give liberally to help pay the enormous expenses of these trials. Nevertheless, we would be criminally negligent were we not to insist that the defense be conducted more sanely and the Communists stop their "mass pressure" and "class struggle" propaganda in connection with these cases, if they are sincerely interested in saving the boys.

JUDICIAL MONSTROSITY

Southern judicial monstrocity has once more been revealed in all its traditional nakedness.

For the second time the electric chair has been decreed for one of the nine Scottsboro boys accused of attacking two white women on a freight train two years ago.

The case will be appealed we are told and it should be.

The verdict as arrived at by the jury at Decatur, Aala., represents a bold travesty on Democracy, but it is all unexpected on the part of intelligent Americans.

What is wanted in Alabama is the blood of the youths whether or not they are guilty of the charges filed against them.

4-13-33

That is as true as the whole trial from its incipiency has been an open mockery of justice and fairplay; a deliberate farce in the eyes of common decency; an impudent slap in the face of the Constitution of the United States.

And yet the state of Alabama, through its officials and press, has had the effrontery to insult the nation with its false declarations as to the high type of justice which it metes out to all its citizens alike. —Stubborn determination to exterminate the Scottsboro youths proves how untrue these statements are.

That the entire nation, (and the whole civilized world for that matter) is interested in the final outcome of this Alabama case is disclosed in press dispatches from all over the land.

As pointed out in these columns last week, not only the unfortunate youths are on trial.

That is only one feature of the notorious one-sided Scottsboro case.

Standing at the bar of justice also in connection with the long drawn out legal battle are the many sins involved in the system in the courts below the Mason-Dixon line.

Out of the battle now being fought against this rotten system by the able defense in the case, might result for Alabama and other sections of the southland a measure of badly needed reform in judicial matters. At least we hope so.

Amidst an atmosphere charged with bigotry, baseless race prejudice, treachery born of ignorance and the burning of firery crosses for the accused youths should hardly be expected in Alabama.

Such, we think, is only obtainable in the United States court.

Indications are that the case will finally be taken to the highest tribunal of the land.

And that is exactly what should be done if the youths are not to be sacrificed to Alabama's altar of hate and legal slaughter.

Monday Morning—

DECATUR, Ala., Mar. 30—With 30 National Guardsmen surrounding the Morgan County courthouse with fixed bayonets, the world-famous Scottsboro case did not open at the scheduled hour because of a misunderstanding which failed to bring in the defendants at the proper time. Court was adjourned until 2 p. m., to await their arrival from the Birmingham jail, where they are now confined.

The Circuit Court, where the nine Negroes are to go on trial again for their lives, was packed to its capacity of 425 seats, when Judge James E. Horton of Athens, Ala., who is to preside, appeared. Attorneys for the defense and the prosecution were ready to start when word came that the defendants had not yet left Birmingham. Court was promptly adjourned until 2 p. m. to await their arrival.

This comparatively large town for this section of the South, seemed to view the forthcoming trial more with curiosity as a good show than with any animosity or realization of the important problems affecting the lives of both Negroes and whites that hinge upon it.

The courthouse square began to fill up shortly after 8 o'clock this morning with the average types frequently seen in small southern towns. Men in baggy store clothes or in overalls, lean, sun dried, and a few Negroes gathered a distance away from the whites, stared morosely at the guardsmen resting on their arms in the open lot facing the square and the county jail.

The soldiers had been ordered by Judge Horton "to maintain order." As the morning wore on the court room became hazy with the smoke of the many men puffing away at cigarettes or pipes. Outside the crowds slowly increased until the whites numbered about 500 and the Negroes about 150. There was no demonstration, most of those outside content to stand around in the warm spring sunshine and wait curiously for the appearance of the defendants.

REIGN OF TERROR STILL ON

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., Apr. 20.—(By ANP)—Local police added two more victims to their long list of killings here last week, when F. Jeffries and Charlie Davis were slain while "resisting arrest."

The killings, which occurred within thirty-six hours of each other, were declared justifiable by County Investigator Evans following the hearings given the slayers. Officer J. M. Maynor, who killed Jeffries, Wednesday night, testified that he and his partner, Patrolman J. M. Early, were told that Jeffries had beaten a woman at 4113 Fourth Alley, South, and went to investigate. They found Jeffries growling around the yard in an "ugly mood" and when they attempted to arrest him, he knocked Early down. Maynor then grappled with him and in the attack, the officer shot Jeffries three times, killing him instantly.

In the case of Davis, who was shot Tuesday night, the slayer, Officer T. M. Scott, declared that he found Davis stealing gasoline from an automobile parked on his beat. He placed him under arrest and was en route to the police station when Davis seized his gun and attempted to wrest it away from him. The officer won the battle for the gun and shot his opponent fatally wounding him. Davis died Thursday morning.

"Green Pastures" Cast Aid Scottsboro Fight

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Jan. 9.—The entire cast of "Green Pastures" now playing in this city, will participate in a Scottsboro Night Benefit to help to raise funds for the defense of the nine innocent Scottsboro Negro boys facing electrocution in Alabama. The date and place of the affair will be announced later.

Mr. Wheaten, well-known Negro playwright and manager of the show, has expressed his willingness to co-operate with the International Labor Defense to the fullest extent.

Scottsboro collection lists are now being circulated among the famous group of players, all of whom have expressed sympathy and solidarity with the fight to free the Scottsboro boys.

AN APPEAL FOR SCOTTSBORO BOYS

[New York City, Apr. 12.]—On Sunday, April 9 an all-white jury filed into the Decatur court-room. With grins on their faces, they delivered a verdict of legal lynching for Heywood Patterson, first of the nine innocent Negro Scottsboror boys to be tried on framed rape charges.

This was the verdict asked for by Wade Wright, Morgan county solicitor, and Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., of Alabama, who disregarded all the testimony presented and demanded a verdict based solely on sectional, racial and religious prejudice and hatred. The other eight boys were taken suddenly to Birmingham for safekeeping as mobs of farmers jammed the town, lynch-gangs came in from Scottsboro, Huntsville and other sections. Fiery crosses were burned, hardware stores reported they were sold out of ammunition, sold exclusively to whites.

Returning from Alabama, Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief trial counsel, said, "I am not a Communist, but I want to say that had it not been for the International Labor Defense, those nine boys would be in their coffins now, buried back of the county jail."

"This verdict would not hold in any supreme court in the United States," said Gen. George W. Chamlee, Scottsboro counsel and noted Southern attorney. . . .

A lynch verdict, after two years of intense struggle . . . a struggle for nine lives—against denial of elementary human rights to 13 million Negroes. Friends of the Scottsboro boys say, "Now this fight is only beginning." Certainly it needs renewed strength. The appeal from the lynch verdict, preparation of defense of the other boys, must go forward today.

We call on you to send whatever money you can . . . and send it quickly. When you have done that, ask your friends to do the same. Help save nine innocent Negro Scottsboro boys!—William L. Patterson, National Secretary, International Labor Defense, 80 E. 11th St., N. Y. C.

Ruby Bates and Lester Carter Get Stormy Ovation at Scottsboro Send-Off in N. Y.

New York

NEW YORK.—More than 5,000 Negro and white workers pack St. Nicholas Arena Friday night for a mighty send-off [illegible] the Scottsboro Marchers to Wash[illegible] [illegible] listen to Ruby Bates [illegible] [illegible] Carter tell their stories of the Scottsboro frame-up. They cheered the [illegible] from Massachusetts [illegible] Island coming in durin[illegible] middle of the meeting. For almost five hours the hall sounds like a great drum pounding the militant beat of [illegible] historic march on Washington, [illegible] fight for the liberation [illegible] the Negro masses.

At 9 o'clock the floor and the galleries are impatient to get started. Ushers with red bands and flaming carnations are rushed [illegible] their feet helping the workers [illegible]. Here is an old [illegible] who says, "The boss class hates this unity more than the devil hates holy water." Near the platform leans a white laundry worker, member of the [illegible]. On the other side of the hall [illegible] workers affiliated with the Needle Trades Industrial Union, [illegible] houseworkers, ex-servicemen, [illegible] worker connected with the [illegible] Farmers Protective Association, whose hands are still raw from [illegible]owing, men and women in sheepskin coats and creased dresses without ties, the sweat of the day's work still wet on many of their faces. They wear tags with these defiant words, "The Scottsboro Boys Shall Not Die. On to Washington." And on the gallery railings are the great demands which strike the eyes like strong bare fists, "We Demand Equal Rights for the Negroes. We Demand the Enforcement of the 13, 14 15th Amendment."

Tell Aim of Meeting

Louise Thompson, secretary of the National Scottsboro Committee of Action, opens the meeting. She stresses the character of the meeting. She shows that this is a fight not only for the lives of the nine boys but for the lives of all the exploited Negro masses, for all black and white workers under the iron heel. And then Leonard Patterson stalks up to the microphone. He is tall and lean as a whipstock. His words crack out. This Scottsboro March, he cries, is not merely a bus ride or a playtoy. This is a most serious mission we are bent on. We go to Washington not to plead, kneel or beg. We come to demand.

A mighty cheer breaks out of more than 5,000 throats. And just then the delegation of Negro and white workers marches in from Massachusetts and Rhode Island. The whole gathering rises as one man to its feet. Through the boom of applause the delegation with its lunchboxes swings up to the platform.

Ovation for Carter.

And then Lester Carter. The enthusiasm is so spontaneous and whistling and stamping and clapping so great that Carter only with difficulty manages to face it. He tells his dramatic story, and concludes:

"These boys are framed and as innocent as any of you men. Friends I have found out there is only one way and that is co-operate and be thousands strong. I am glad I was on the freight. I know if I was shot down to tell the truth and go back down to Decatur, I would do so."

Samuel A. Liebowitz, trial lawyer in Decatur, gets up on the platform. He spikes the old lie that if not for the I.L.D., the Scottsboro Boys would have long been free. He tells dramatically how Attorney General Knight bullyragged the Negro witnesses. He explains that he no longer feels that Judge Horton was fair. "Everyone all over the country knows that Negroes are not allowed to serve on juries in the South. Judge Horton knows that full well, too, but he made no move to have the court admit it."

During Liebowitz's speech, Ruby Bates comes down the aisle. The whole mass meeting surges to its feet. William Patterson, national secretary of the I.L.D., introduces her. "Nineteen years ago a white girl was born in the South. She had schooling for only five years. As a mere child she was sent into the mills where she worked 12, 13 14 hours a day. The ruling class dared to talk to her of white supremacy! But it was only through the nine innocent Negro Scottsboro boys that she found her way back to a decent life. She found the courage and womanhood in a crucial period to take her place in the ranks of the working class."

Ruby Bates Speaks

Ruby Bates is a tall, healthy looking girl. She speaks simply and honestly. She speaks slowly and carefully as if she is searching down deep inside of her for the whole truth. "The Scottsboro boys are innocent. I saw the fight between the Negro and white boys on the freight. I want to say that the Negro boys didn't say a word to either of the two girls, Victoria Price or me. They had the boys tied together with ropes and thrown into a truck after they was arrested. I would be lynched myself if I didn't tell the story that the nine innocent boys had attacked me. I worked in the mills. I got $2.75 for 55 hours' work. I worked at night shift. Eleven hours from 6 at night to 5 in the morning. After the trial, I began to be worried. I read in the papers about the fight the I.L.D. was fighting. So I went back into Decatur where I was born and raised. My life was threatened. But I didn't think of my life. I want to say to you all that I'll go on with the fight for the nine Scottsboro boys."

Gen. Chamlee Cheered

It is about midnight. General George W. Chamlee, gets up to speak. The loudspeaker is out of order. He has a bad cold. His voice is hoarse. His face is pale and drawn. But he has come hundreds of miles from Chattanooga with a message from 500 Negro and white workers. He paces up and down the platform, his voice only above a whisper. Workers stand, so that they can hear him. Others come down from the galleries.

And so this tremendous mass meeting surges to the street. Each Negro worker knows now full well that in William Patterson's words: "If not for the white workers of America and Europe the Scottsboro boys would have been rotting for these two years in the lime pits of Kilby Prison." Again in William Patterson's eloquent words: "It won't be a De Priest or a Booker T. Washington, who was supposed to represent the Negro people, it won't be even a William Patterson, but it will be you representing 1,000 times 1,000 and more that will free yourself from this system." The march to Washington is on.

Scottsboro Boys Tell Lawyer for I.L.D. Facts of "Fight" in Cell of Birmingham Jail

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., May 19.—The vicious prison conditions and provocative tactics of jail officials in Birmingham County Jail, which resulted in friction between the Scottsboro boys confined there, driven to hysteria by the mistreatment accorded them were revealed here when Attorney Benjamin J. Davis Jr., Negro attorney of Atlanta and one of the International Labor Defense counsel in the Herndon case visited the boys here.

The story of the "fight" between Haywood Patterson and Roy Wright, greatly exaggerated in reports sent out by the warden last week, was told to Attorney Davis by the boys themselves.

"Our tempers got the best of us for just a minute," the boys told Davis.

"We Get Awful Nervous"

"We were talking and kidding about girls we used to know before we were arrested," Patterson said. "We haven't got anything to read and not much to talk about, cooped up like this for more than two years. Before either of us knew what it was all about, Roy hit me with the knife. It didn't amount to nothing. It was an accident."

The knife was slipped into the jail cell where the boys are confined by guards, with the hope that, with the nervousness induced by loneliness and confinement, it might help to frame the boys, Davis said he was convinced. None of the boys could tell exactly where it came from.

"Things like that might happen any time, between no matter how good friends, when they are held in jail so long on frame-up charges," both Patterson and Roy Wright told Davis. "We get awful nervous and irritable in here sometimes."

"The terrific strain of the frame-up ordeal has had that effect upon the boys," Davis said, "but in spite of that they are in excellent spirits in regard to their case.

"I studied their faces carefully. Their chins are up, their eyes bright with confidence, defiance, vigor. Without doubt this has been instilled into them by the world of sympathy with their cause aroused by the I.L.D. They are militant and unafraid.

Montgomery Going Blind

"Olen Montgomery is fast losing his eye sight. He cannot see a match stem in his own hand. When he was first arrested, his glasses were broken by the thugs, and he has had none since. It is impossible for him to read. Protests should be sent at once to the warden of Jefferson County Jail, Birmingham, Ala., denouncing the blinding of the boy by refusal of prison authorities to pay any attention to this, which is a definite medical need.

"The boys are, in my opinion greatly suffering from the food which is pretty bad. Regular Alabama prison fare.

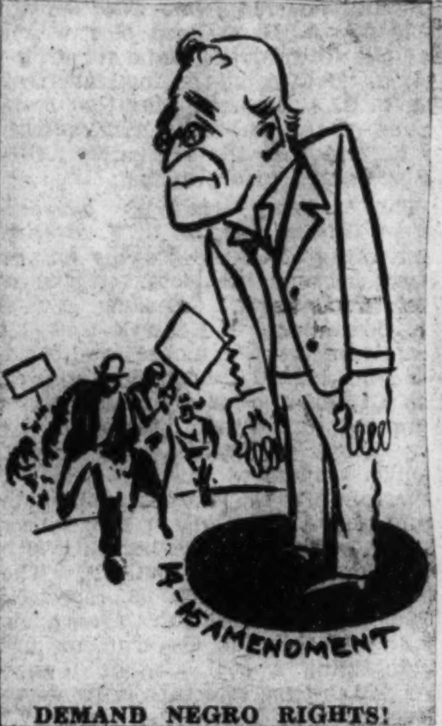
"But the mistreatment of the boys has been to some extent abated, so far as it was carried on directly, both by their militancy and by the world-wide protest. It has been replaced by such 'framing' methods as slipping a knife into the cell, hoping the boys would sometime lose their temper.

"Haywood Patterson is very militant, and understands well the militant policy of the I.L.D. Considering the isolation in which the boys have been kept, their general understanding of militant policy is really exceptional. They are very brave and aggressive.

"Sympathizers should immediately be mobilized to send the boys literature. They will all read and study together. Other things they should be sent are shoes, shirts, overalls tooth paste, cigarettes, and other such necessities."

Appeal by the I. L. D.

The International Labor Defense has called on all workers and sympathizers to send funds both for carrying on the legal and mass campaign of defense of the Scottsboro boys, and for providing the Scottsboro boys with the things necessary to make their prison life bearable. Funds should be sent to the International Labor Defense, Room 430, 80 East 11th St., New York.



DEMAND NEGRO RIGHTS!

Dothan, Ala. Eagle
May 13, 1933

NOTE ON A DEBAUCHERY

The photograph on page 1 of Thursday's Eagle of Ruby Bates leading a parade in Washington linked arm-in-arm with two Negro women, one of whom was "Mrs." Patterson, mother of Haywood Patterson, a 190-pound specimen of the notorious Scottsboro "boys," was indeed interesting. It was to be specific, revolting.

But let The Huntsville Times speak on the subject, for after all, Ruby is a former citizen of that sorrowful community:

That sterling moral crusader and witness extraordinary, Ruby Bates, erstwhile of Huntsville, but who more recently has taken to the platform in the East, in a program of uplift and light and sweetness, as she tells of her fears of the "ruling class" of Scottsboro, was noted yesterday among the van of 3,000 white and Negro marchers on the streets of Washington.

They sought to invade the White House, "gang" President Roosevelt and obtain from him some expression that could be twisted or distorted into an expression of sympathy for the Scottsboro "boys."

They got nowhere, for their committee was politely informed that the President was so busy with national and international business these days that he had no time personally to see delegations of citizens, and that they would have to leave their petition with one of his secretaries.

Their leader left with the statement that he regarded Mr. Roosevelt's refusal to see them as a "gesture of contempt."

With what other than contempt should the President regard such a set of contemptibles?

Ruby, flanked by a Negro communist, the Negro secretary of the International Labor Defense, and the mother of one of the Scottsboro defendants, thereupon descended upon the Capitol to spread their propaganda before Speaker Rainey of the House and Speaker Garner of the Senate. They were rebuffed in each case.

Now that she has become Harlem's darling, set foot in the White House and addressed the speakers of Congress, there is but one wall Ruby has to scale to make her list of "triumphs" complete. That is to invade Fifth avenue's social realms to tell her story of oppression by the "ruling classes" of the South.

That is not at all impossible, for some "parlor pink" will perhaps bob up to give her a tea.

Then on to a vaudeville engagement, where the emoluments should be more lucrative than working in a cotton mill, riding a box car as a hobo, or pursuing her avocation as a "lady of leisure-"

The Times, in another editorial, describes other activities of this ignoble creature who was, unhappily, born in the South:

"Speaking before a mass meeting Friday night at the huge St. Nicholas arena, Ruby Bates opened her address to a mixed audience with these remarks, according to the Associated Press:

"I come from the Sotuh to tell you the truth of the Scottsboro case. Those boys are absolutely innocent. I was on the train when I saw the fight (between Negro and white youths), and I must say the Negro boys did not say a word to the white girls, Victoria Price and myself. x x x x

"I was frightened by the ruling class of Scottsboro. I want to tell you that I was frightened by the ruling class, that if I didn't tell the story about those innocent Scottsboro boys, I'd be lynched myself."

"The former Huntsville gutter snipe repeated her 'triumphs' last night in Washington before a crowd so large that she had to address three separate meetings. She charged that during the Decatur trial she had been threatened with lynching.

"Apparently, being a 'martyr' to the 'cause' of the Scottsboro 'boys' is more profitable than plying the trade she once did in Huntsville.

"Is the nation to be regaled next by her appearance at the White House with Leibowitz and the International Labor Defense crew, seeking to have President Roosevelt intervene in the trial of the Scottsboro case?"

In this connection it is appropriate to reach a few words written to The Birmingham News by a Negro citizen of Tuscaloosa. How different in temperament and good sense is this colored man from the contemptible Leibowitz! Here is the letter:

To the Editor The News:

Since the date of the alleged crime of the famous Scottsboro case, almost every nation has contributed its ideas and demands as to what action the fair state of Alabama should and must take in regard to the same. Please allow me, a colored citizen of Alabama, space in your paper to take a brief review of all efforts and their effects as relates to the Negro not only of Alabama but the entire South.

The propaganda and legal efforts of the International Labor Defense and Communists have only succeeded in contributing a flame to destroy the good will of the white people, the various agencies that have and are working for the advancement and protection of the Negro of the Southland. Northern money, Northern attorneys are not needed to attack the state of Alabama to secure justice for the state's Negro population.

The Negro and all others should drop the idea that Negroes are convicted in our courts solely because they are ignorant and Negroes. When we realize that the judges, lawyers, jurors of the state are fully capable and efficient to determine the innocence or guilt of a defendant, then we will be heading somewhere. The Negro should join hands with all efforts to curb such activities of the Communists and International Labor Defense.

The Southern white man has learned that judgment is the application of the trained intellect to human lives. It is the power to see, to appreciate, and to use the truth in improving the condition of mankind, and I want my colored friends of the South to know that when we learn to fall in line with the above instruction we will then feel some relief and not before.

THOMAS W. WATSON (Col.).
Tuscaloosa, Ala.

A few days ago a Negro who insulted a white girl in a certain Alabama town suddenly disappeared; nobody seems to know what became of him. This is unfortunate, but such action is bound to result from all the sordid Scottsboro affair.

It is common talk that Alabama's increasingly fine record during the past 20 years in the matter of lynchings has been set back possibly 20 years. If this common prediction comes true, it will be terrible—but where lies the direct blame?

It lies at the feet of the I. L. D., the Leibowitzes, the crack-brained Communists and the arrogant and asinine Judge Lowells.

But it all may accomplish some good; perhaps it will demonstrate, eventually, that Alabama is capable of meting justice in her courts without the meddling of outsiders.

I. L. D. Attorneys to Tell of Prejudice, Jury Tampering, in Arguments on June 22

NEW YORK.—When lawyers for the International Labor Defense appear before Judge Horton in Decatur on June 22 to argue for a new trial for Haywood Patterson, Scottsboro boy, they will support their motion with a veritable mountain of evidence showing the prejudical character of the Decatur trial.

At least 20 grounds will be cited by the defense counsel why the lynch verdict against Patterson should be set aside and a new trial granted, it was indicated by the national office of the I.L.D. today. These will include: exclusion of Negroes from the grand and petit juries prejudice and terrorization of defense witness and defense counsel; prejudical errors made in the trial; incitement to violence in the summation of Wade Wright when he made his now famous statement about "buying Alabama justice with Jew money from New York;" and in general that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

Will Present Affidavits

In support of the motion for a new trial, the I.L.D. will present affidavits of defense lawyers, newspapermen and observers at the trial, proving definitely the charges of prejudice and threats to the lives of the boys, their witnesses and their attorneys.

While the exclusion of Negroes from jury service will be the key point in the demand for the throwing out of the death verdict against Patterson, other issues will also be strongly put forward. Among these will be a charge which created a sensation in the courtroom when first made by Attorney Joseph R. Brodsky—namely, that the jury received and made telephone calls while "deliberating" on the Patterson verdict. This alone, the defense feels is sufficient to warrant the setting aside of the verdict.

Will Describe Terror

In the argument before Judge Horton, the I.L.D. lawyers will review the whole lynch atmosphere which prevailed in Decatur during the trial and show that it was impossible to expect a "fair trial" under these circumstances.

In the event that Horton refuses to grant a new trial, the defense will proceed with its plans to appeal the verdict to the Supreme Court of Alabama.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., June 6.—R. C. Hawkins, a retired mail carrier was accepted yesterday as a juror after eleven white men had been selected to hear charges of burglary against a Negro. The defendant was found guilty.

New York

This is the first time that a Negro has been placed on a jury since the Reconstruction period following the Civil War.

Because of the Jim-Crow system prevailing in public places, the jury was not sent out to a restaurant to eat. Instead, meals were brought direct to the jury room by court attendants.

The International Labor Defense in the Scottsboro, Euel Lee and Herndon cases sharply raised the demand for Negroes on the jury.

Alabama's Stink

Roy Wright and Eugene Williams, two of the youngest Scottsboro boys, after being tried, sentenced to death and granted a new trial, have been remanded to the juvenile court.

"Fair and just" (?) Judge James E. Horton admitted under pressure that the boys had been illegally tried and held in jail for two years.

A tardy Alabama justice does now by force what it should have done with alacrity two years ago, because of an oath sworn to do its duty.

The longer the Scottsboro case lasts the worse Alabama's court system stinks.

Protests Force Prison Guards to Cease Abusing Boys

6-21-33

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., June 20.—Faced with a tremendous mass protest of Negro and white workers of all sections of the country, officials of the Birmingham City Prison have been compelled to stop their abusive treatment of the nine Negro Scottsboro boys who are confined there.

George W. Chamlee, chief of the International Labor Defense legal corps in the Scottsboro case, on behalf of the organization went to the jail and demanded the right to see the boys who for some time had been held in isolation and talked to them.

He took up their complaints with the authorities and compelled immediate remedying of the situation.

Although worn out from their more than two years life in prison cells, Chamlee found the boys in good spirits.

Chamlee will appear before Judge James E. Horton at Athens, Ala., 12 miles from Decatur, Thursday, to argue the motion for a new trial for Haywood Patterson, first of the nine boys to be retried recently who was convicted and again sentenced to death after a lynch-trial.

The hearings in juvenile court of Roy Wright and Eugene Williams, the two youngest of the innocent Scottsboro boys, is scheduled for Friday in Decatur before Judge B. L. Malone.

THE SCOTTSBORO VERDICT

(From The Birmingham Post)

Birmingham Ala.

3-15-33

Once more one of the Scottsboro Negroes is convicted and once more the case begins its journey to the chambers of the United States supreme Court.

The trial which ended yesterday in the death sentence for Haywood Patterson is different in two important aspects from those in which the Negroes were convicted two years ago at Scottsboro. In the new trial no one can deny that the Negro had competent legal defense or that the judge was inexorably fair.

If the high court at Washington reverses the case again, it will be apparently, for one of two reasons. The court could side with the defense in its contention that the accused, because of the exclusion of members of his race from the jury, was deprived of his constitutional guarantee of equal protection of the law. Or it could hold that the speech to the jury of Solicitor Wade Wright of Morgan County was prejudicial and inflammatory.

Wright's harangue to the jury, in which he exhorted them to show "that justice in Alabama cannot be bought and sold with Jew money from New York," was highly uncalled for and unfair. It is the one dark blot in the trial record.

We cannot find it in ourselves to resent that some persons, part of them in other sections and part of them in the South, have seen fit to contribute to a fund to provide adequate legal defense for the Negroes.

Indeed, we might devoutly wish that some philanthropist would endow a foundation to see that the pettiest thief or the most penniless slayer is given the same able legal defense which is purchased by the wealthiest murderer or the richest embezzler arraigned in our courts.

Or better still, we might do away with private defense lawyers altogether, not a few or them mere tricksters, and provide for every accused person a public defender whose duty it would be to see that each defendant is given the benefit of every vindicating or mitigating fact and nothing more.

The misrepresentation with which the Scottsboro case has been treated by radicals, we of course resent, but that had nothing to do with Solocitor Wright's remark. His stupid echo of Hitlerism will be resented by straight-thinking people everywhere.

Judge James E. Horton very properly instructed the jury to disregard the remark. Attorney General Knight also tried to undo the damage by asking the jury to disregard all sectional and racial angles and to look only to the guilt or innocence of the defendant.

In as trying a situation as could be conceived, Judge Horton conducted himself as the symbol of justice. He allowed himself neither to be swayed by the sentiment of hotheads in his own community nor to be prejudiced by the unfair thrusts of the radical telegrams which rained in upon him.

For simple forcefulness and sincerity, his warning against mob violence and his charge to the jury must take their place among the historic judicial papers of Alabama. His refusal to allow the prosecution to use the testimony of a reprieved murderer is a signal example for some other solicitors who have stooped to the use of stool pigeon testimony and for judges who have permitted it.

The story of Judge Horton's conduct of this trial will reflect credit on the state of Alabama in far places. He would, in our opinion, be an ornament on the highest bench of the state.

Mercy Defeated

4-15-33

After a twenty-hour deliberation, the jury in the case of Haywood Patterson returned a verdict of guilty and the punishment to be death. Throughout the entire night these exponents of Alabama justice disagreed as to the innocence or guilt of the defendant. In the minds of all of them, I'll wager, he was guilty before the trial began as is the case in 90 per cent of such trials, but contrary to that the law deems a man is innocent until he is proven guilty. The prosecution so completely failed in establishing sufficient proof in his prosecution of the defendant that a complete reversal of court procedure was inaugurated by the furious attack made on the state's star witness.

Regardless of the fact as to whether Ruby Bates was truthful or not in the repudiation of her first testimony, she was an eye witness of the alleged attack and by being so her testimony must be accepted at its face value, which, according to the verdict, was far below par in this last trial. She ceases to be the reincarnation of one of our blessed virgins as was portrayed when first she testified. Instead, she is painted in altogether different colors, a person without morals; an imbecile whose virtue could be purchased at the price of a few attractive clothes or a few dollars, and a prostitute of the lowest order. The two girls were companions and have enjoyed each other's society for some time. Could it be possible for two people whose minds evidently were parallel to possess an altogether different type of character? If Ruby Bates is declared by the prosecution to be a person of notorious character, wouldn't her companion be considered as having a similar reputation? If so, why could the veracity of one's statement be any more acceptable than the other?

It is not the purpose of the prosecution or the jury in this case to see that justice is done as set forth in the constitution but to see that southern tradition in such cases is upheld and to show outsiders that they will tolerate no meddling with the type of justice they deal out to Negroes, especially from Jews and Communists. So the eyes of the world are being opened and southern practices, long established but doubted by most outsiders, will be accepted as true. From every corner of the globe, we hear the cry of "southern justice," "Alabama justice," a cry whose volume is increasing daily and in time will shatter the walls of racial intolerance which surround their shriveled minds. We all know the maxim about "fooling some of the people some of the time," well southern justice won't be able to fool any of the people any of the time before this Scottsboro case is finished.

A move is being made by the Negro newspapers of the country to secure signatures to a protest against this type of justice to be sent to the President. They hope to secure at least one million of these signatures, but instead of one million, make it ten million and let the world know that we have not forgotten our unfortunate brother.

Leibowitz Likened To Sherman, Grant

Montgomery Ala.

NEW YORK, April 13.—(AP)—Introduced by speakers who compared him to Lincoln, [illegible] Sherman and John Brown, Samuel Leibowitz stirred a negro audience in a Harlem Church to frenzied enthusiasm today with a 20-minute address on the Scottsboro case, in which he is defense attorney.

"I promise you, citizens of Harlem," he said in a voice trembling with emotion, "that I will fight with every drop of blood in my body, and with the help of God, that those Scottsboro boys shall be free."

There was a tumultuous demonstration.

Feet beat the floor. Jennie Patterson, mother of Heywood Patterson, whom Leibowitz represented when he was convicted again in Decatur last week, smiled and wept.

"And I say to you now, from this platform, in this house of God, that they will not die," Leibowitz shouted above the roar.

The audience stood in the aisles and on the pews, shouting, nodding and shaking their fists. The Rev. D. Ward Nichols called for order in vain.

Leibowitz, amazed at the demonstration, seized his coat and fled form the platform. The crowd closed in upon him, seizing his hand, touching his clothes.

Leibowitz finally gained his taxicab. He spread his fingers and disclosed red welts on the third and fifth digits, where his diamond ring on the fourth had been pressed against them.

Lawson Goes To Aid Decatur Prosecution

Montgomery Ala.

Assistant Atty. Gen. T. S. Lawson left yesterday for Decatur where he will aid Atty. Gen. Knight in prosecution beginning Monday of Charlie Weems, one of seven negroes originally convicted and sentenced to death for criminally assaulting two young white women near Scottsboro, last March a year ago. Retrial of Weems is set for that date.

The first of the Scottsboro case defendants to be retried was Haywood Patterson, who was again convicted and sentenced to pay the death penalty for the crime of which he was found guilty for the second time. It is understood that the same array of defense counsel will represent Weems that appeared on behalf of Patterson.

THE DECATUR VERDICT.

New York N.Y.

National attention was inevitably fixed upon the second trial of the Negroes convicted of murder in the first so-called "Scottsboro case." That conviction was set aside and a new trial ordered by the Supreme Court of the United States. Its reasons were that local prejudice was so violent and inflamed, and so pronounced even in the criminal proceedings against the accused men, that they did not have a fair trial. Now at Decatur a verdict of guilty, carrying with it a death sentence, has been found in the case of one of the Negroes, tried separately. This result comes as a surprise and a shock to those who had followed the evidence given in court. The case had become of such national importance that THE TIMES sent a competent and trusted and impartial member of its staff to furnish full reports of the trial. These have told their own story from day to day.

The presiding judge bore himself with impartiality, and was evidently anxious to make Alabama justice worthy of the name. His rulings, so far as can be determined at this distance, were correct. His charge to the jury was filled with strong protests against anything like mob law or the spirit of lynching, and of warnings to disregard everything but the evidence in the case. Whether the jury was swayed as much as it should have been by his injunctions to give no weight to the fiery denunciations and appeals to race hatred by the prosecution, it is impossible to say. Although Judge HORTON took the strongest ground against anything like intimidation or threats of violence on the part of the people of the vicinage, it was all too plain that the trial was conducted in an atmosphere intensely prejudiced against the accused Negro. The jurymen deliberated a long time over the tangled evidence and the manifest untrustworthiness of the chief witnesses, both for the prosecution and the defense. But the final verdict was "Guilty," and it is now difficult to see how an appeal could lie to the Supreme Court again, or to any higher power except the Governor. He might see fit, in view of all the circumstances, to commute the death sentence into a term of imprisonment.

Rabbi Goldstein, Temple Beth Or, Leaves Sept. 30

RABBI BENJAMIN GOLDSTEIN

Rabbi Benjamin Goldstein, of Temple Beth-Or, has given notice that he will not stand for reelection as Rabbi of the Congregation after expiration of his term on Sept. 30, it was announced last night by Ernest Mayer, president of the Congregation.

Mr. Mayer said the Rabbi gave no reason for his decision. The Rabbi was present in the home of Mr. Mayer at the time the announcement was made and when asked by The Advertiser if he cared to make any further statement Mr. Goldstein declined.

The Congregation will discuss plans for engaging another Rabbi at a meeting to be held on April 30, Mr. Mayer said.

Rabbi Goldstein has served Temple Beth-Or for more than four years and recently has been active in behalf of the seven negroes in the Scottsboro case. He came to Montgomery from California.

LEIBOWITZ TO RETURN TO ALABAMA CASE

NEW YORK, April 12 (AP)—Samuel Leibowitz, who defended Haywood Patterson in the "Scottsboro case," said today that he would return to the South Monday to continue efforts in defense of the negroes accused of attacking two white women.

"There is [illegible] good deal of criticism," he added in making this announcement. "Because a northern lawyer was called into the case. The reason is very simple. The only way in which this case can be carried to the supreme court is by showing there has been some violation of their federal rights. I have shown such a violation, a violation of the 14th amendment to the constitution in that negroes were excluded from the jury. No southern lawyer would have dared bring up such a point. If he had his practice would have been ruined at the very least. So a northern lawyer was brought in. That explains the whole thing."

Tumultous Demonstration Follows Address by Scottsboro Defense Attorney

MURDER BY JURY VERDICT

We refrain from lengthy comment on the repeated death sentence of Heywood Patterson the Scottsboro victim of Southern race prejudice. In view of the character of the witnesses, especially the principal one of the flimsy and conflicting testimony of the other witnesses and the positive denial of any attack by the boys upon her or upon the other prostitute, principal witness for the state by the other penitent prostitute this was a black miscarriage of justice. It historically proves that there is positively no chance for justice for Colored persons accused by white persons in the South where the juries are all white. In fact under race domination the white race feel they must deal out injustice and take the most doubtful word of the lowest whites over the word of honest worthy Colored parties, to keep up the domination by always showing the Colored they are inferior to the whites.

3-15-33

Boston Mass.

This is a murder by jury verdict. It should be and will be appealed to the U. S. Supreme Court on the ground no Colored were in the panel for the jury. Let us all support this fight by the I.L.D. to the last stitch and decide that these boys of ours shall not be executed.

Mr. Liebowitz Is Out

Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of defense counsel for the Scottsboro negroes, has disqualified himself for further participation in the Alabama trials. Safe in Brooklyn, he gave this description of the people of Alabama as a reason why they could condemn these Negroes on the evidence offered:

Montgomery

"If you ever saw those creatures, those bigots, whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like a frog's, whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy, you would not ask how they could do it. When I got back home I felt that I needed a moral, mental and physical bath."

That is Mr. Leibowitz's opinion of the people of Alabama, among whom he proposes to go once more for the trial of the remaining defendants. We say without hesitation that when he appears again, the courts should tell him politely but firmly that he cannot appear in any court in Alabama. 4-16-33

Mr. Leibowitz, if he had an open mind himself, if he were not as narrow in his own way as he pictures the people of Alabama to be in theirs, if he were not so steeped in his own prejudices, would consider what they might be thinking about the fact that fifty-two city blocks of disorder and rioting attended his return to New York. Hand to hand fighting, policemen beaten, men and women yelling themselves hoarse while marching to municipal defiance—how is that any better than Alabama?

We hope a way can yet be found to give these negroes a trial in accordance with justice—that is, to prove them guilty beyond a reasonable doubt or let them go. But it will never be accomplished by prejudice and bigotry from New York slapping in the face bigotry and prejudice in Alabama.—Milwaukee Journal.

PATTERSON'S MISFORTUNE

It was Heywood Patterson's misfortune at Decatur that no lawyers in the case were genuinely concerned with justice for him except the lawyers for the State.

The others were variously concerned with their own professional interests, the economic and political prejudices of the I. L. D. and the Communists and with the old and familiar idea of outsiders that a wall should be run between Negroes and whites in the Southern States.

Same Troops To Guard Weems At Decatur Trial

3-16-33

Montgomery

The force of national guardsmen detailed to aid the sheriff and his deputies in maintaining order during the trial beginning Monday at Decatur of Charlie Weems, the second of the Scottsboro case negro defendants to be tried there, will be the same as that which was on hand during proceedings in the case of the first defendant, Heywood Patterson, it was learned yesterday.

The guardsmen on duty will total 38 officers and men from Troop C, 127th Engineers Squadron, with headquarters at Hartselle. As before, the soldiers will be under command of Capt. Joe Burleson. Following the reconviction and resentencing of Patterson, only a small detachment of guardsmen remained on duty at Decatur to look after military property there.

HISTORIC PROTEST FROM HISTORIC CHURCH BRINGS OUTBURST OF APPLAUSE—TROTTER, SIMPSON, MOORE PROTEST

Boston Mass

In Boston's South Meeting House, fulminating point of the American Revolution, on Tuesday night, before a large and enthusiastic mixed audience the Scottsboro-Mooney Defense Committee staged a strong meeting of protest, remarkable for its militant spirit.

Wm. Monroe Trotter declared the verdict of guilty with death sentence for Haywood Patterson in Alabama, in view of the trial, was "murder by Jury Verdict." He declared his support of the I. L. D. in its fight for the boys, who he said "must not die."

Haywood Patterson was never the real issue in the trial at Decatur so far as the inhabitants of Morgan County, Alabama, were concerned. The transcending question was the right of outside participation. Therefore, the Hymn of Hate sung by the prosecution was more musical and imploring to the ears of the jurors than Judge Horten's instructions to banish all bigotry and prejudice or appeals of Mr. Leibowitz for fair play. Swayed by demagoguery, the twelve men "tried and true," gave a pitiful braggadocian exhibition of thumbing noses at the outside world. Law or no law, it was their unsworn duty to express the sentiments of the lyncher and the Ku Klux Klan

Therefore a rotten verdict which stinks to the heavens.

While the jury's verdict finding Patterson guilty is incredible and difficult for the normal-thinking person to understand, it must be remembered that Decatur, Ala., is a decadent community dominated by morons. It is just such moribund spots as this that progress and enlightenment are unwanted and, like eating cancers, hold back the New South in its forward march.

Thank God there is a United States Supreme Court at Washington, D. C. which, on appeal taken by defense counsel, will be given opoprtunity to review this travesty on justice.

He said the white folks wanted to take three Negroes without any evidence at all, and mob them. He said when the crowd of 45 men got to this white man, he told them that the Communist Negroes did it. So they wanted the Negroes, and all that saved them was the sheriff told them that was his business and he would run it. He sent for track dogs. Then they found who really did it.

This lawyer also said Communists were all right. Everything was together but the farmer, and it was time that they were getting into a unior

NEGRO VETS AND SCOTTSBORO CASE

Daily Worker

4-26-33

In the last imperialist war 400,000 Negro workers, who were called upon to fight "to end all wars" and "make the world safe for democracy," were subjected to the worst form of Jim-Crow persecution by the military authorities. Immediately after the U.S. entered the war, 13 Negro soldiers of the 24th Infantry were legally massacred by U. S. Court Martial because they had been driven to protest against the fiendish Jim-Crow persecution of the military and civil authorities. (During the war there occurred more than a hundred lynchings of Negroes in the United States, many of these Negro soldiers in uniform.)

New York

After the war the Negro veterans were further separated from the white veterans. They were Jim-Crowed in the vocational training schools; denied admittance into Federal Administration, except as menials; their disability compensation was either very low or cut off within a short period after the war. Thousands of veterans, especially Negroes, were hounded by officials, framed up and thrown into hospitals for the insane and into prisons.

Tens of thousands of Negro veterans in need of medical attention in the South were either forced to accept treatment in Jim-Crow wards of white hospitals or were forced to wait for months to get treatment in the Jim-Crow hospital at Tuskegee, Ala. The dependents of Negro veterans are often gyped by various officials, death compensation checks as well as other allowances being withheld for months or denied altogether.

(The Negro Gold Star Mothers were rewarded for their supreme sacrifices by being Jim-Crowed on their trip to France to visit the graves of their sons. They were transported by the government to France on leaky cattle boats.)

Many Negro veterans have fallen victim to the present wave of lynching and lynch frame-ups. The most notorious case is that of Willie Peterson, tubercular Negro veteran, who contracted tuberculosis because the Veterans' Bureau failed to certify him for treatment and compensation. Peterson was framed-up in Birmingham, Ala., in August, 1931, on a murder charge, a raw frame-up for a crime of which he is innocent.

Following the frame-up against Peterson, white veterans who defended him in Alabama were horsewhipped in prison. In Florida, Al McBride, a white war veteran, was sentenced to 10 years in prison for organizing tobacco factory workers.

These attacks upon the Negro war veterans are part of the attack upon the Negro people as a whole. This is shown clearly in the frame-up of Haywood Patterson, one of the nine Scottsboro boys who has been sentenced to death in the electric chair.

The Workers' Ex-Servicemen's League has from the very start supported the fight, which is led by the International Labor Defense, for the release of the nine Scottsboro boys. The Workers' Ex-Servicemen's League has as one of its principles "No Jim-Crowing or any kind of discrimination against Negro war veterans."

Action to Take.

In order to actively support the fight for the release of the Scottsboro boys, Willie Peterson and all other victims of the lynch gangs the National Headquarters of the Workers' Ex-Servicemen's League recommends to all posts of the W. E. S. L. the following action:

. That they approach the Negro Posts of the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, etc., with the proposal for a united front in defense of the Scottsboro boys.

2. In order to give the greatest of strength to this defense, work must be carried on with the Scottsboro Defense Committees.

3. Posts should immediately start the work of mobilizing Negro and white veterans for the Scottsboro March to Washington which takes place May 8. These veterans should stay in Washington and report to the Veterans' National Liaison Committee, Room 210-11, Maryland Building, 14 and H Sts., Washington D. C.

200 Delegates in United Front Session Put Off March to Allow for Larger Numbers

New York Delegation Will Leave May 6; Other Details of Plan Remain Unchanged

NEW YORK.—Postponement of the Free-the-Scottsboro-Boys March to Washington until May 8, to give opportunity for better organization and larger numbers to participate, was voted Sunday afternoon by the Scottsboro Emergency Conference at its second meeting, in Imperial Lodge Hall in Harlem.

More than 200 delegates of organizations of every sort, including churches and ministerial alliances, the International Labor Defense, Conference for Progressive Labor Action, the Communist Party, the Universal Negro Improvement Association, the N. A. A. C. P., the Elks, the Masons, and many other organizations, took part in the conference.

Leave New York May 6

Under the new plan, the New York march contingent will leave here May 6. Other plans, with changed dates, stand as previously announced.

Attempts to disrupt the United Front by Lovestonite agents in the conference, who harangued from the floor against making a united front with ministers, were defeated by overwhelming vote on a motion to include in the conference delegates from the Ministerial Alliance, and from other groups.

Samuel Patterson, chairman of the Action Committee, and representative of the Carribean Association, put a stop to other attempts to disrupt by putting forward a "new organization" to replace the International Labor Defense.

"The I.L.D. is the only organization in America," he said, "that can defend the Scottsboro boys as they should be defended."

In his main report, in which he put forward the proposal of the National Action Committee for a postponement of the Washington march to May 8, William L. Patterson, national secretary of the I.L.D., and a member of the Committee, stressed that within the ranks of the United Front are persons in close relationship with the lynchers of the South, who pretend to be friends of the Scottsboro boys.

"We can't lose sight of the fact that the Scottsboro case cannot be fought on the evidence alone," he said. "The Decatur verdict proved that if it ever needed proving.

NEGRO ATTORNEY WILL SPEAK SUNDAY NIGHT

Benjamin Davis, Jr., Will Tell of Scottsboro Case, in Place of Miss Thompson

.Miss Louise Thompson, secretary of the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners, who was to speak at the mass meeting to be held in Carnegie hall Sunday evening at 8 o'clock on the Scottsboro case, telegraphed this morning that she would be unable to come because she has just been appointed secretary to the National Scottsboro Action committee, a union committee of various organizations working on the case, and holding its first meeting in New York on Sunday.

In her place the local citizens' committee has secured an able speaker in the person of Benjamin Davis, Jr., an outstanding Negro attorney now defending Angelo Herndon, whose case is attracting wide attention. This is the case of a Negro boy sentenced to 20 years in a chain gang on what is termed a "revived slave law."

Attorney Davis is a graduate of Amherst college, 1925, and Harvard Law school, 1928. His father is editor of the Atlanta Independent and for ten years has been national committeeman from Georgia. For the past 25 years he has been a delegate-at-large to the Republican National convention. Benjamin Davis, Jr., has taken a deep interest in the Scottsboro case and is reported to be an excellent speaker.

Rev. S. Ralph Harlow, professor of religion and Biblical literature at Smith college, and chairman of the local citizens' committee arranging the meeting Sunday evening, will also speak on the Scottsboro case.

Appreciate Gazette Editorial

The citizens' committee stated this morning that it appreciates the spirit of the ediorial in yesterday's Gazette. The aim of the committee, it is stated, is to keep this meeting free from all political and sectional propaganda of any sort. The committee's desire is to lay before the citizens of Northampton the facts in the world-famous Scottsboro case, which is bound to attract increasing attention, as the lives of eight young men are at stake and the justice of their trial is being seriously questioned.

The committee feels that intelligent and loyal American citizens will want to know the facts, and they will be presented by Atty. Davis and Mr. Harlow as they find them, giving, among other things, to Northampton people a statement as to what leading editors of southern newspapers are writing on the case. Mr. Davis will present the legal aspects of the case and will explain what steps need to be taken to protect the rights of these Negro boys.

SAYS MORGAN COUNTY HAS QUALIFIED NEGROES JURORS—Dr. Frank Sykes, colored dentist, in the witness chair at Decatur, Alabama, testifies that no Negroes, although qualified to serve, had been called for jury service in Morgan county. His testimony was one of the highlights of the second Scottsboro case in which Haywood Patterson was found guilty Sunday, April 9. Sykes was a former baseball pitcher on the Baltimore Black Sox club. Chief Defense Counsel Samuel S. Leibowitz had Sykes' admission placed in the records along with the testimony of nine other Negroes showing that colored were barred from jury service in Morgan county.

Leibowitz vs. Knight

Much criticism that is wholly deserved has been heaped upon Samuel Leibowitz, the New York lawyer defending the negroes in the Scottsboro case recently tried at Decatur, for his published statements on the outcome of the trial and the uncalled for comment that he is quoted as making which reflects on the jurors who found the negro, Haywood Patterson, guilty and imposed on him the death penalty. Leibowitz came to Alabama for the purpose of stirring up all the hatred that he could for himself and his negro clients and he has succeeded remarkably. The New Yorker is no fool; quite the contrary. He knew that if he could get things in a big enough mess he could probably find ample grounds for the reversal of any conviction that the state might get in the cases. And he not only played his hand well in the Patterson trial but by his comment on the verdict in that case caused the remaining defendants to secure an indefinite postponement of their trials, the continuance being granted by the judge of his own motion.

Leibowitz cares nothing for what the people of Alabama and the south may think of him. He clearly displayed that when before the trial he attacked the jury system of the state because the jury boxes contained the names of no negroes. But he is vitally interested in the acquittal of the negro rapists and is willing to sacrifice to that cause any good feeling that might have been borne to him in this section. Every lawyer knows that it is possible to make himself highly obnoxious to the court and juries by continually quibbling over technical and frivolous points and at the same time stay within the rights of himself and his client. This is exactly what Leibowitz appears to have done and his efforts may bear fruit when the Patterson case is carried to the higher courts.

But while we are placing just condemnation on Mr. Leibowitz it should not be forgotten that the State of Alabama contributed in a large measure to the sensationalism and general disgust that resulted from the trial in the person of Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, Jr. who went up to take charge of the prosecution of the cases. Considering what should be the dignity of his high office his conduct at Decatur is hardly less reprehensible than that of Leibowitz. It is well known that Mr. Knight loves publicity like a debutante likes orchids and he is never happier than when his likeness is reproduced on the front page of some daily newspaper in connection with some opinion that his office has rendered or some statement he has issued.

With a table in the court room surrounded by a group of newspaper writers representing the great news agencies and several correspondents of the big New York newspapers, it was more than the Attorney General could stand. He played every bet for all possible front page space and he succeeded in making of himself the kind of animal that once spoke to Balaam as he rode with the princes of Moab. Were he capable of such to begin with the sight of the scribes and visions of his photographs adorning Page 1 of the metropolitan dailies dispelled any possibility of Mr. Knight's conducting the trial in an orderly and dignified manner. Newspaper accounts of the trial stated that at one point in the proceedings the Attorney General actually applauded and made ejaculations of delight when a witness testified to something that the prosecutor was evidently not expecting and that was in favor of the state's case. Picture, if you can, the sight of an Attorney General with any regard for the dignity of his office or the orderly enforcement of the law clapping his hands in support of a statement from the witness stand. Shades of Thomas C. McLellan!

If the International Labor Defense League is really anxious for the Scottsboro negroes to have a fair trial, let them keep Mr. Leibowitz in New York and if the governor of Alabama is of the same frame of mind, let him keep Mr. Knight in Montgomery. Send the cases to any county in Alabama and give the negroes two lawyers from the local bar there who know negroes and who know the juries. Then allow the regular prosecuting officers of the circuit to handle the cases for the state without any interference from the Attorney General's office. There would be no need for any armed guards around the court house and it would not require a week to try one of the cases. Under such circumstances we would be willing to leave it to Mr. Leibowitz himself to pass upon the fairness and justice of whatever verdict might be rendered.

Just so long as Mr. Knight injects himself by authority of his office into the Scottsboro cases, just that long will the people of Alabama wait for a dignified and orderly trial of the negroes involved. And so long as there is a newspaper representative in the court room the present Attorney General may be depended upon to exercise his authority and take charge of the prosecution. Where the reporters are, there will Tom be also.

THAT SCOTTSBORO CASE.

On Wednesday an Alabama mol vas ribbing itself up to the point o ynching the eight Negroes when un lergoing a second trial for an al eged attack at Scottsboro on tw white girls and having once beer entenced to death for the crime Only the very firm attitude taken y the trial judge, who insisted that he prisoners be protected even if heriffs' officers and guardsmen had to shoot to kill, in all probability prevented the carrying out of the ynching plan.

On Thursday, just as the trial was about to terminate, there appeared in court one of the two girls upposed to have been attacked. She had been missing a long time. In court she told the judge and jury that there was no truth in the story she had previously told about being attacked by the prisoners. She had been in New York, she said, had gone to see Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick there and confessed to him that she had lied. Dr. Fosdick sent her to a clergyman in Birmingham, Ala., and the clergyman sent her to Decatur, where the trial was going on, in charge of a woman settlement worker.

Since the girl's latest story is pretty well confirmed by evidence already brought out in the case there is hardly a possible doubt of the innocence of these eight young men who have twice narrowly escaped death, first at the hands of a biase jury after an unfair trial and se ondly at the hands of a typic Southern mob impatient of any fai ness extended to an accused Negro

Even after the girl's confession court the prosecutor, instead acknowledging that he had been de ceived, immediately prepared to sti further fight for the conviction the prisoners.

The South as a whole hates to le go its grip on a Negro, innocent guilty, whom there is a chance hang.

THE SCOTTSBORO VERDICT

THE conviction of Haywood Patterson, first of the Negro defendants in the second trials of the Scottsboro cases, will be appealed. It should be.

Among other things prejudicial to a fair trial, the defense attorney was able to show that the jury law apparently was administered to exclude Negroes from the panel for this case. On more than one occasion during the trial the state attorneys conducted themselves in such a way as to prevent orderly and judicious consideration of evidence by the jury.

In repudiating her testimony at the earlier trial, Ruby Bates last Thursday swore that the other girl in the case, Victoria Price, had framed the Negro youths. Lester Carter, a white friend of the two girls, confirmed the testimony of Ruby Bates.

To execute boys on the discredited evidence of a woman of Victoria Price's character, and following a trial in which racial discrimination seemed to operate in the jury panel, would be unthinkable.

Just as the chief justice of Alabama dissented from the first Scottsboro conviction, and just as the United States Supreme Court threw out that conviction as a violation of the 14th amendment of the Constitution which prohibits states from depriving "any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law," so the Decatur verdict yesterday appears certain to be set aside by a higher court.

An Outrageous Verdict

Upon evidence which could have been convincing to no one save the thoroughly prejudiced, twelve citizens of Alabama have voted to send a fellow human creature to the electric chair.

For, "gentlemen" of Alabama, there is no difference in the sight of God and his ultimate justice between a white skin and a black one . . . like it or not the Negro is your fellow human creature!

Regardless of medical testimony, regardless of the recantation of her previous story by one conscience-torn witness, regardless of a mass of evidence sufficient to have raised doubts in the minds of any impartial individual, the first of the nine Negroes on trial in Decatur, Ala., for the alleged rape of two white women hoboes, has been sentenced to death.

The trial was unusually fair. It was evident the judicial system of Alabama felt the eyes of the nation were upon it. Judge Horton, who presided, did so with a high sense of impartiality, the sole consolation the white race can draw from this depressing drama.

The prosecution on the other hand descended to every inflammatory and despicable trick in its repertoire. The recanting witness had been "bought by Jew money," the defense was the work of Communists, etc., etc., ad nauseam. The result might have been expected and once again proves that to accuse a Negro of a sexual offense against a white woman in the South is to convict him, regardless of evidence.

The people of Alabama have been described as resentful of the intrusion into the case of "foreigners." Much was said of "New York Jews" by the prosecution. Yet the fact remains that the case of these unhappy and unfortunate Negro boys is not one which solely concerns the state of Alabama . . . for, perhaps unfortunately, Alabama is a part of the United States and to the foreigner, to world opinion, this is, alas, a sample of American justice.

One can only hope that the higher courts, perhaps the Supreme Court of the United States, which has intervened once in the case, will intervene again to prevent this black disgrace to all decency and justice.

National Civic Group Lays Plea Before Gov. Miller.

A plea for commutation of the death sentence imposed on Heywood Patterson, one of the Negro defendants in the so-called Scottsboro case, is contained in a letter addressed to Gov. Miller of Alabama by the executive council of the National Civic Federation, the text of which was made public here today.

The letter is signed by Matthew Woll, acting president of the federation. The other members of the executive council are Howard E. Coffin, Samuel McRoberts, Ralph M. Easley, Ellis Searles, James W. Gerard, John Hays Hammond, William R. Willcox, Archibald E. Stevenson, Joseph P. Ryan, Maude Wetmore, Gertrude Beeks Easley and Mrs. Coffin Van Rensselaer.

"The executive council of the National Civic Federation does not pretend to pass upon the guilt or innocence of the defendant," the letter states in part: "It is, however, deeply concerned for the good name of American justice.

"Together with Americans almost everywhere, it is shocked by the harshness of the penal code of your State permitting the imposition of capital punishment for a crime which, however abhorrent, is treated with less severity in practically every other civilized jurisdiction.

"In addition, the circumstances attending the trial, involving the injection of alien influences and the raising of social prejudices, create the impression that the jury could hardly escape being influenced by considerations other than the cold facts of the case.

"Under these circumstances we urge you, in the interest of justice, to commute the sentence of Haywood Patterson to life imprisonment pending a thorough and searching investigation on your part into his guilt or innocence."

From the racket we hear about there being no Negroes on the jury in the trial of the seven Negro youths at Decatur where they are being retried in accordance with a majority opinion of the United States supreme court, there is going to be trouble in the South over the question of all white juries. This case will in all probability be taken up to the United States supreme court on this point, since there are no Nergoes on the jury, and the high court of this country will be asked to pass on this point. If the court holds that this trial is illegal on account of there being no Negroes on the jury, then it will mean that every case tried in the South will be illegal unless there are Negroes on the jury. So in the event the Negroes are again convicted and given the death sentence, and the high court of the United States hands down an opinion that it is illegal on that account, then in every court in the South there will have to be some Negroes in order that the case will stand before the highest court of the land.

It is impossible to believe that the Negro youth, whom a Decatur, Ala., jury sentenced to death Saturday after haggling for 21 hours in the jury room, would have been adjudged guilty had he been white. The so-called "Scottsboro cases" reek of race prejudice. In that atmosphere seven hapless colored youths seem destined for death on the testimony of a prostitute, contradicted by a female companion who admits that she perjured herself in the first trial. The Supreme Court of the United States upset the first convictions and remanded the cases for retrial. It is extremely doubtful, however, if a fair trial is possible in the Kuklux-infested region where the alleged crimes were committed. It will be a shameful disgrace not alone to Alabama but to the whole country, if the legal murder of seven men because their skins are black is permitted in the ironic name of Justice.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE

It looks like the Scottsboro case will continue to give us something to talk about for several months to come. Judge James Horton has indefinitely postponed trial of the negroes because of the recent action of defense counsel.

The International Labor Defense, which is atking a great interest in the defense of the accused negroes, has done much more to hurt the cause than they have to help it, and the sooner they cease their activities in the case and get out of the way, it will be just that much sooner that the accused get a fair and impartial trial.

Samuel Liebowitz, chief of the defense, upon returning to New York, launched an attach upon jurors in the case describing them as "those creatures, those bigots, whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs, whose chins drip tobacco juice." It was upon this statement by Liebowitz that the trials were indefinitely postponed.

The Chattanooga News, edited by George F. Milton, says concerning the unusual turn of this case:

"It is quite obvicus that Mr. Liebowitz is more fanatically devoted to "warring on the ruling class" than he is on defending seven ignorant Negroes accused of assult. The I. L. D. has made a radical holiday at the expense of the Negroes ever since taking charge. It crowded out the true friends of the Negroes, members of their own race who sought to provide for them an adequate defense. We happen to know that the service of the leading criminal lawyer of Birmingham was offered to the Negroes, but the I. L. D. had taken out its mortgage on their lives.

"The I. L. D. made no concessions to Alabama pride. It made no use of capable Southern lawyers, students of Southern psychology, who would have pitched the defense on actual evidence instead of radical propaganda.

"From the start, the I. L. D. built up the case as a cause celebre, soliciting funds from Northern sources. It was not a trial of Negroes for rape, but the I. L. D. lost sight of the nature of the case entirely and purposely made it appear that innocent people were being rescued from biased, unfair Southern courts, and that the Negroes were being lynched by America's perverted social conscience.

"The result of the entire affair has been to create an emotional atmosphere which made postponements of the trials highly advisable."

Our hat is off to Judge Horton, who acted so wisely in postponing the cases. If the court had continued with them, it is evident that the defendants would have received less consideration than the remarks of Liebowitz

WITHOUT COMPLICATIONS.

Alabama may take pride anew in its Judg ames E. Horton, whose conduct of the first he Scottsboro retrials has already won him the praise of persons throughout the country.

His action in continuing all others of the trials ndefinitely—there are seven of the defendants yet o be retried—was the only way left if they were ot to be the mockery of justice that the defense attorneys make the first trial out to be. For it ad become finally impossible for the negroes to get a fair trial at Decatur and to blame for this fact is not Southern prejudice but the foolish bitterness or bitter foolishness of the man who was their chief of counsel.

Concerning the Alabama jury—which was probably much like juries in New York and South Carolina—that convicted Haywood Patterson, first of the negroes to face retail, the New York Herald-Tribune quoted Samuel L. Leibowitz, New York attorney, as saying:

"If you ever saw those creatures, those bigots whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs, whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy, you would not ask how they could do it."

This statement, reeking of prejudice, was obviously calculated to arouse animosity and resentment. It left the jurors who would have tried the other defendants in no position to give them a fair trial and Judge Horton puts the fact mildly enough when he declared that the accused negroes would be the victims of this statement.

"His leading attorney," the judge said of the second of the defendants called for trial, "would be a millstone about his neck."

It is a pity that it should so often turn out this way, but Mr. Leibowitz is not the first intervening gentleman to talk about justice and maybe intend to promote it while actually hindering his own case. If the Scottsboro negroes are to be given a fair and impartial trial Alabama citizens must give it to them and at least one Alabama citizen—Judge Horton—has done more to insure it than any New York attorney could. If the lynching spirit in the South—it has its counterpart in the North—is to be defeated the men and women of the South who have been striving toward this end must accomplish it. Their job is difficult enough without imported complications.

Properly Postponed

AT DECATUR, ALABAMA, yesterday Judge Horton, trial judge in the famous Scottsboro case, indefinitely postponed the remaining cases because of the reported statement of Samuel Liebowitz of the International Labor Defense about the jury which convicted the Negro Patterson of criminal assault.

As Judge Horton properly held, the publication of the chief defense counsel's bitter tirade, whether he was correctly quoted or not, makes a fair and impartial trial impossible. Liebowitz would became, as Judge Horton put it, a millstone around the neck of any defendant he represented in the case.

Thus once more the trial of these defendants is disclosed not as a judicial search for facts and an effort to administer justice, but a contest in the exhibition of unrestrained emotion and bitted prejudice.

In the first trial before Judge Horton the prosecutor for the state asserted in his address to the jury that one of the women witnesses repudiating her former testimony had been "bought by Jew money."

Both the women were of the underworld and at least one of them was guilty of perjury. Both of them gave evidence against the Negroes in the first trial.

The conscience of Alabama itself must be aghast at a conviction obtained in part by such exhortations and by such evidence. The Supreme Court of Alabama ought to reverse the conviction and all eight defendants should be tried at some time when the present atmosphere of excitement and violent denunciation on both sides has cleared.

This would also be a good time for the International Labor Defense to withdraw from the Scottsboro cases. Whatever service it may have originally rendered the Negroes is now lamentably counter balanced by the damage inflicted by the Liebowitz attack upon the jury in the Patterson case.

Moultrie, Ga., Observer

The famous rape case at Scottsboro, Alabama, has been to the United States supreme court one time and will probably go again. This time it will go on the question of the rights of negroes to have representation on our juries. Attorneys Leibowits of New York, employed by communists of his city, will present the question to the higher court. It is not likely that there will be any decision by the higher court that will effect the jury commissioners in their privilege to put such names in the jury boxes as they choose to put in. The court may decide that the negro has a legal right to serve on juries when he is regularly chosen for that service. The principle of selectivity in choosing jurors is not at stake.

JUDGING UNDER DIFFICULTIES

If ever an American trial judge faced trying situation it was the gentleman presiding over the Scottsboro attack trial, which ended Sunday with conviction of the defendant.

In addition to the normal racial prejudices that prevail when white and black are mixed in affairs of this kind, the court had to contend with other prejudices aroused by the injection of an alien element into the situation by the International Labor defense, and finally by personal exchanges between opposing counsel that had no place in a court of justice.

Despite these handicaps, the charge of the court to jury was remarkably clear, and fair to the point of perfection. Indeed, no juris could have defined more intelligently or more dispassionately the rights of the accused or have stressed more plainly that color, creed and social standing are not questions for jury consideration.

Something of the same elements entered into North Carolina's famous communist murder trials at Charlotte, with the exception that no racial differences were involved. On that occasion Judge BARNHILL, the presiding judge, did an excellent job just as his Alabama prototype has in the Scottsboro affair.

Attempt to Enforce 14th Amendment

TEN young Negroes, mostly boys, were riding in a gondola freight car loaded with stone down in Alabama. Two young whites, in overalls, were in the car. The two young whites, in overalls, were girls. All were stealing a ride.

Something atrocious happened to the two white girls. Hence the much-talked-of Scottsboro case. Nine of the Negroes were sentenced to death, by an Alabama jury, all whites. The United States supreme court set aside the death sentences and ordered a new trial.

Counsel for the Negroes irritates Alabamans by stirring up the 14th amendment which says, among other things, that no good citizen, whatever his color, shall be deprived of his right to serve on a jury. Alabama is quite carefree about its attitude towards Negroes on juries. In fact, Alabama is quite brazen about keeping Negroes off juries.

The states that have the greatest scorn for the 14th amendment made the 18th amendment the holiest part of the constitution.

Nine young Negroes down in Alabama do not know what it is all about, but over them wages a great battle, in which the august gentlemen of the mighty supreme court have participated—on the side of the Negroes.

Of the guilt or innocence of the defendants we have no opinion. But we have an opinion about what chance a Negro has when accused by a southern white woman. With the legal punishment we have no quarrel. Our insistence is that the prosecution make sure it gets the right men to punish. Sometimes even the rural chivalry is rather careless in picking its victim.

A Disgraceful Verdict

Reasonable men the country over knew that the first trial of the Negroes in Scottsboro, Alabama, was grossly unfair. There was a howling mob about the courthouse, and the atmosphere was charged with a blind and unreasoning race prejudice. Thanks to a decision of the United States Supreme Court, a re-trial was obtained; and now again a jury lost to all sense of decency has disgraced the state of Alabama by bringing in a verdict of guilty.

The two women whom the Negro boys were accused of assaulting have been proved to be disreputable characters. "Remember," said Judge Horton in his charge, "both these women were of the underworld." One of them, Ruby Bates, made a complete recantation, confessing that her testimony against the Negroes in the original trial had been false from beginning to end.

"The judge practically directed the jury to bring in a verdict of acquittal," says the Raleigh Times, "on account of the established incredibility of the chief witnesses for the state. Yet, in spite of all this, a besotted jury once more convicted and recommended the death penalty . . . Judicial murder by Alabama will somehow be prevented in the end, but the decree by a fanatical jury will leave a most sour taste on the tongue of all those who look for justice in the courts."

That the appeal of the prosecution was not to justice but to race hatred is made plain by the words of the prosecuting attorney, Wade Wright. "Are you gentlemen," he asked the jury, "going to allow Jew money from New York to buy and sell justice in Alabama?"

Public opinion in America is indignant at the persecution of Jews by Hitler and his hordes, but no manifestation of race prejudice in Germany has been as outrageous as this verdict in Alabama.

The Decatur Trial

Again the necessity for different procedure in southern courts has been demonstrated. While the outcome of the trial of Haywood Patterson, the 19 year old Negro accused of attacking a white girl hobo, was not entirely unexpected, it leaves much to be desired in the way of justice. He was found guilty and condemned to death.

Because of the international character which the case has assumed and of future effects, details are timely. It was two years ago that the events transpired which have led to conditions arousing such concern as to transform certain towns in Alabama into veritable armed camps. Racial hatreds have developed the results of which cannot yet be fully estimated.

The trouble originated on a freight train running between Chattanooga and Memphis, Tenn. On this train were two white hobo women, a dozen Negroes and seven white men hoboes. The whites and the blacks became involved in a fight and the latter forced the former off the train.

The white hoboes flashed word of their battle with the Negroes to Paint Rock, where an armed posse of between sixty and seventy-five countrymen stopped the train, arrested nine of the Negroes and took two women into custody as material witnesses. At Paint Rock the girls charged that they had been criminally assaulted by the Negroes.

Judge A. E. Hawkins, at Scootsboro, convened a special session of the grand jury, and while the town seethed with excitement and open threats of lynching, the Negroes were indicted jointly and severally. Within two weeks they were tried, and all but one, Roy Wright, then 13 years old, were convicted.

We have already outlined in these columns how the International Labor Defense, a Communist adjunct, took up the case and appealed. The supreme court of Alabama affirmed the original verdicts and sentences. The United States supreme court, however, reversed the decisions and ordered new trial on the ground that the first were unfair, because the Negroes were not adequately represented by counsel.

A change of venue was granted as it was contended an impartial trial at Scottsboro would be impossible. Throughout the trial at Decatur it was obvious that racial antipathies would play a part of such importance as to lead to possible injustice on both sides.

The defendants alleged that defense counsel had been threatened. In his plea for his client Samuel Leibowitz, prominent criminal lawyer of New York, condemned the exhibitions of racial hatred and scored the exclusion of Negroes from jury service. He dramatically produced one of the white girls who had previously alleged she was attacked and she repudiated her statement.

In arguing the state's case to the jury the county solicitor, Wade Wright, urged the 12 men to demonstrate that "Jew money from New York can't buy and sell Alabama."

It was known that the Communists were organizing Negroes and using the Scottsboro case for that purpose.

The word went abroad that the case was being used as a wedge toward effecting social equality for the Negro in the South, and no amount of argument from Mr. Leibowitz, who disclaimed the role of reformer and crusader, could counteract that belief.

Judge Horton's address to the jury was characterized by a sane plea for judgment based on the evidence without bias in any direction. He urged breadth of vision and justice divorced from all racial or religious bigotry. That his address was appreciated by the defense was evidenced when, after the verdict was rendered, Mr. Leibowitz walked up to the bench, grasped Judge Horton's hand and said: "I am taking back to New York with me a picture of one of the finest jurists I have ever met."

Of his plans for the future Leibowitz gave the public an idea when he said:—

> "Will we appeal this case? Most assuredly; up to the highest court of our land that once before hurled this mess back into the laps of the bigots, and we'll continue to fight until hell freezes over, not only to save nine innocent men, but to uphold the good name of our country to the rest of the world on the plane where every decent citizen feels it rightly belongs."

The whole miserable business which has aroused racial and religious and political antagonisms of serious proportions, could have been avoided had archaic court methods not been in vogue in the small towns where the Negroes were tried.

The spirit, if not the letter of lynch law, was obvious. The wish was father to the thought when the particular crime of which the Negroes were accused was considered.

Had each man been given a trial with proper counsel, there would have been no excuse for intervention by the Communist contingent. Because the men were railroaded, and because the community whipped itself into a state of mind where no other methods would have been approved, the South fell into the trap which the International Defense welcomed.

Communists took immediate advantage of the wedge and split open a wound which it will be difficult to heal.

It begins to look as if a blunder in court procedure has saddled the country with another case which from a molehill has developed into a mountain, through which it will be difficult and dangerous to tunnel.

HE PREFERS ALABAMA

Editor, The Advertiser:

I do not pretend to pass judgment on the notorious Scottsboro case. Let the case be judged according to the laws of the State in which it occurred. But it seems to me that the undue outside interference is misguided, impudent, and at the end it will do more harm to the negroes than good. With all these, however, I am not at present concerned. The opportunist lawyer of the Negroes has made some derisive remarks regarding the people of Alabama. He has done so from a safe distance; when he had the opportunity of expressing his views of the people of Alabama in Alabama itself. But he put approximately one thousand miles between himself and the subjects of his highly diverting pronunciamento, before he gave to a waiting world his valuable opinions of the people of this state.

Why the delay? I do not doubt, that if confronted with this fact of conveniently delayed personal judgment, he would say that he intended all the time to tell the people of Alabama what he thought of them, but somehow he forgot until he crossed Brooklyn Bridge, and when he saw the men with beautiful eyes, beautiful lips, beautiful chins—chins sans tobacco juice but dripping with garlic juice—only then he remembered the bewhiskered, bigots with frog's eyes.

"When I got home," says Attorney Liebowitz, "I needed a moral, mental, and physical bath."

Alas and alack! I too have lived in Brooklyn and I know whereof I am speaking. I too, have been subjected to indignities in the subways that even mules would resent.

Six millions of them in the "City of Dreadful Necessity" where, to use Ben de Carseras's simile—"A how do you do, is not the conventional, interested greeting of the State of your mind and body, but is meant as an inquiry as to the size of your bank account."

It seems to me I have the qualifications to be an impartial judge regarding the merits and demerits of Alabama and New York City, for I belong to neither. Consequently I am not biased toward either. I have lived seven years in New York, and six years in Alabama.

In retrospect, I often wonder how I escaped committing murder when a knee was put against my back and I was shoved into those atrocities known as subway trains, where the stench of human bodies in the Summer time is such that I need not go into.

Wonderful New York, enlightened center of freedom, where at the time I lived there, it had signs in the windows of some of its restaurants—"for whites only." Where it is not safe to go to extreme East or West sides without being cracked on the head. Where, one night having been arrested for the sweet vice of gambling, I was thrown into jail with 20 others. It was in this same jail that an accommodating policeman, for five dollars, let us out of our cells so that—"You boys play all you want,—when I knock at the door, put them dice away and run to your cells." Where the arresting detectives, the police captain, the bondsman, and the judge the following morning, make things "easy" for you for $125.00. Oh! Mr. Seabury, where were you when they were taking my dollars?

Such is the place to which Mr. Leibowitz has returned for his diversified baths.

I prefer Alabama. GEORGE BARBIER

Defying the Constitution

THE second conviction by an Alabama jury of Heywood Patterson, the first of the seven Negroes to whom the upreme court of the United States granted a new trial, on the charge of attacking two white girls, thrusts the famous Scottsboro cases more prominently than ever into the arena of national controversy.

Rivaling the Mooney-Billings and the Sacco-Vanetti cases in the degree of public interest, the Scottsboro trials present for determination entirely different questions.

In both the former cases, popular opinion was divided because of the alleged insufficiency of circumstantial evidence presented and because the accused were alleged to have communistic leanings.

It is the fourteenth amendment to the United States constitution that is on trial in Albama. This amendment specifically provides that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States . . . nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Under the selective jury system prevailing in Alabama as in other southern states, Negroes are banned from the jury roll. In last week's trial, transferred from Scottsboro to Decatur, a neighboring county seat, Negroes were once more prevented from serving on the jury, thus depriving the defendants of their constitutional rights.

New strength for the defense at the second trial was presented in the confession by one of the girls alleged to have been attacked that in the first trial she had falsely accused the defendants. This time she made a full and frank detraction, but evidently it had no effect upon the jury, which brought in a verdict of guilty, fixing the death penalty.

One may well conclude that the Alabamans are more concerned in emphasizing their domination over the Negro than in any question of the guilt or innocence of the accused.

No doubt the case will go back again to the supreme court and there is little doubt that the verdict will again be annulled.

Alabama is one of the states that has frequently made a mockery of justice. At the top of the illiteracy percentage column and one of the noisiest shouters for the strict observance of the constitution—notably the eighteenth amendment—Alabama openly flouts the amendment which defines citizenship, guarantees justice to all and is recognized as one of the traditional bulwarks of our form of government.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASES.

In view of the inflammatory statements made in New York by Samuel Liebowitz, leading attorney for the defense in the Scottsboro trials, the action of Judge Horton in indefinitely postponing the hearing of the remaining trials is the only wise course.

The injection of Liebowitz in the trial of the Patterson negro and the tactics employed by him have made matters worse, instead of increasing the chances of acquittal for the seven negroes whose cases are still to be heard.

His unwise and prejudicial utterances reveal, in the opinion of the Chicago Tribune, the real motive behind the assumption of the defense of the Scottsboro cases by the Civil Liberties Union. "Only a very ingenuous observer of these proceedings could miss their intent," believes this influential northern newspaper. "Pretending to be a defense of innocent individuals from injustice and oppression and an assertion of civil guaranties, the objective aimed at was the disparagement of American courts and the American social conscience."

The Tribune points out that "the attorney brought from New York by the International Labor Defense could not have been as tactless as he has been save intentionally. The very fact that he was chosen in place of counsel known and respected in the region in which the trial was to be held was evidence of lack of good faith, of a sincere concern for the fate of the defendant. In and out of court his words and actions have appeared to an impartial observer studiously provocative of local feeling, and the inference must be that he intended not to win his case but deliberately to lose it, to make sure of a martyr for his cause and an excuse for more propaganda."

The same position is assumed by the Louisville Courier-Journal, which holds that "the attorney for the defense added fuel to the flames by a senseless and bombastic remark made when the verdict was read, accusing the jury of 'spitting on the tomb of the immortal emancipator' by judging Patterson guilty."

This outstanding southern newspaper also feels that "in the interest of justice, it would be a vast improvement if a southern lawyer could be retained for the defense of the negroes, instead of Liebowitz."

Told of the postponement, Attorney Liebowitz issued a statement in New York in which, while expressing respect for Judge Horton, he refers to "the baying pack and the wolves of bigotry."

Such statements tend to make extremely difficult the meting out of fair and impartial justice in the remaining cases should the same counsel be presented for the defense. Certainly it is to be hoped that when they are held that, for the sake of the defendants and that there may be no more cause for justifiable resentment upon the part of the people of Alabama, the defense will be represented by lawyers whose conduct will not be such as to make their task all the more difficult.

THE DECATUR CASE

THE jury in the Scottsboro case brought in a verdict of guilty against the negro Patterson who with six other negroes, is charged with an attack on two white girls.

One Samuel Leibowitz, of New York, representing a liberal and some sort of Communist gang in the East, came down to defend the negroes.

He was bitter in his comment on the verdict of the jury, saying it was an act of bigots.

Coming from a radical element that has caused nothing but trouble in this country for years, and a gang that would scuttle the Republic and turn it over to the Reds, a lot of misguided and unbalanced sentimentalists who know nothing whatever about race problems come down here and attempt to tell the people of the South—the negro's greatest friend on this earth—how to run their affairs and maintain that amity and relationship between the races that is essential to peace and harmony.

The Scottsboro case has run the gauntlet of all of the courts of the land.

Now it has come back to the original court jurisdiction and the original verdict has been sustained.

Further expense, trouble and agitation of the case is unwarranted and the decree of the Decatur court should be allowed to stand.

The negroes have had every safeguard and every protection which the law allows, and they were entitled to it.

Now the law should be allowed to take its course without further resort to technical evasion and selfish and slushy sentimental designs to defeat the established justice of the courts.

PREJUDICE BEGETS PREJUDICE.

Lynchburg News.

If the Negroes accused in the so-called Scottsboro case have not received justice, as seems probable, the reason is to be found in prejudice, racial, religious and sectional. That is deplorable. It has been deplored so much and so vigorously that more words would appear to be futile. The remedy now being sought in a higher court is the only remedy.

It would not be wholly unprofitable, however, to consider the following statement made by Samuel S. Liebowitz, employed by the International Labor Defense to conduct the case for the Negroes:

> If you ever saw those creatures, those bigots, whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like a frog's, whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy, you would not ask how they could do it. When I got back home I felt that I needed a moral, mental and physical bath.

He is talking about the people of a section of the State of Alabama—talking thus about them, of course, after leaving the vicinity and putting a safe distance between him and them.

The statement requires no comment, excep perhaps, to point out that all the prejudice wa not on one side, that prejudice begat prejudice that Attorney Liebowitz was probably father o some of that shown by the jury, and that if the purpose of The International Labor Defense is to see that justice is done, rather than to spread propaganda, it will find another attorney for the Negroes yet to be tried.

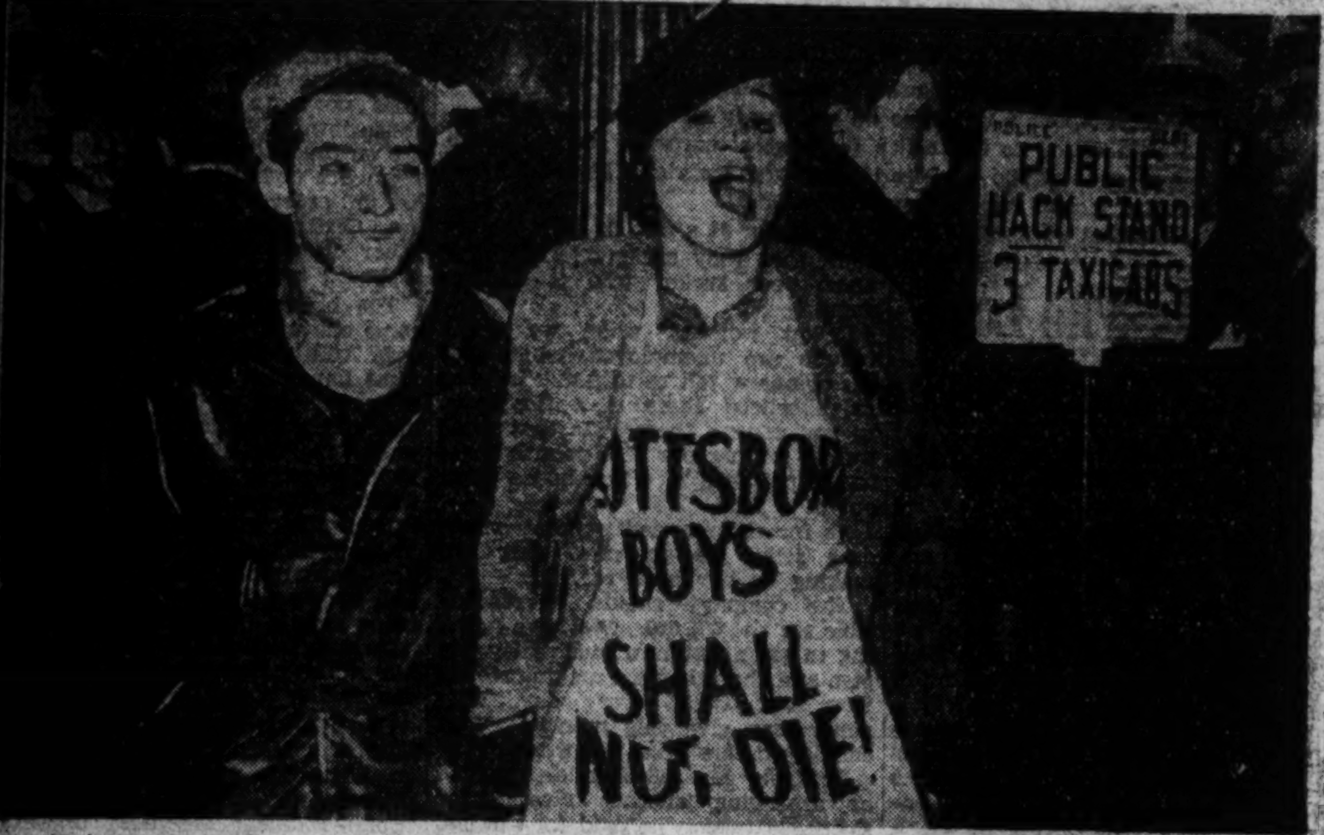
Chains Defy Police in Scottsboro Protest



These four members of the Young Communist League chained themselves to a lamp post in the Times Square area Saturday in order to exercise their constitutional rights of free speech in protesting the infamous Decatur lynch verdict against Heywood Patterson, one of the innocent Scottsboro boys.

The four young workers are Shirley Cooperman, Ben Secundy, Jack Rosenberg and Bill Friedman. They were arrested by the police, who brutally beat them up while filing the chains.

They were taken to the 53rd Street Night Court, where the judge refused to give them an immediate hearing and ordered them held in jail. Their hearing takes place this morning, at 10 o'clock, in the 54rd Street Court, between 8th and 9th Avenues. Every worker, every opponent of lynching, every supporter of free speech, is urged to pack the court in a mighty demonstration to prevent the railroading of these workers to prison.

Action, Still More Organized Action, to Save the Scottsboro Boys!

THE Decatur lynch court, having "disposed" of Heywood Patterson, is rushing Clarence Norris, another of the nine innocent Scottsboro boys, to a similar lynch verdict.

The ruling class of America has issued a brutal challenge to the Negro masses and the entire working-class. The workers, black and white, must answer this challenge!

Last Saturday's demonstration in Harlem, organized by the Young Communist League, was a striking example of the correct, immediate reaction of the Y.C.L. in organizing and giving leadership to the outburst of protest against the sentence of death passed upon Patterson.

Tens of thousands of workers have given their answer in militant protest demonstrations in scores of cities and towns during the past few days. But this is not enough. There must be more action and still more action!

* * * *

THE Scottsboro boys have so far been saved from death for over two years by the determination of the masses of toilers throughout the world that they shall not die. The lynch courts and the capitalist class behind them now hope to rush through the trials with such speed as to bottle up and prevent any protest. The demonstration of Saturday in New York is proof that where the Communist Party and Y.C.L. organized the immediate protest, the workers responded in masses. These demonstrations are proof that if the Communist Party, in every district and unit lives up to its responsibility, a tremendous wave of protest can be immediately developed, despite the speed of the trials.

The task of mobilizating the toiling masses against the fascist lynch terror lies first of all with the Communist Party, revolutionary leader and vanguard of the oppressed masses of all races. The Communist Party in every district, section and unit must see that the message of militant struggle against the lynchers is carried into every shop, into every neighborhood into every rural district. Mobilize the workers in the revolutionary unions, in the reformist A. F. of L. unions,

Members of the A. F. of L. and other unions, and all organizations where workers gather, should be brought into the united front against lynching, against the lynch verdict.

The International Labor Defense, which has led the fight for the freedom of the Scottsboro boys, has a special responsibility in the mobilization for Saturday's demonstrations.

* * * *

SUNDAY'S emergency conference in New York City decided to set aside next Saturday, December 9, as a day of nation-wide mass protest against the Scottsboro lynch verdicts. Hundreds of thousands of workers must be brought out in protest on Saturday. The united front must be broadened. Neighborhood, shop, and unemployed demonstrations of all workers and all organizations must be mobilized. Organize the protest in your shop and neighborhood!

The Scottsboro lynch verdict and the frame up trial are aimed to serve the same purpose as the greatly increased wave of lynching against Negroes. The Patterson verdict is a part of the growing fascist attacks of the employers and their courts and government upon the entire working class.

Hold mobilization meetings in every section to prepare Saturday's demonstrations.

Hurl into the face of the lynchers the million-throated roar: THE SCOTTSBORO BOYS SHALL NOT DIE!

ALABAMA'S WHITE WOMANHOOD

"WE all have a passion," said Attorney General Thomas E. Knight of Alabama in summing up for the State in the third trial of Heywood Patterson, one of the Scottsboro boys, in Decatur last week, "and that is a passion for protecting the womanhood of the State of Alabama, and when we do protect the womanhood of the State, it doesn't lie in the mouth of any man to tell you what's best for your Commonwealth."

As usual with white Southern "gentlemen," Attorney General Knight was romancing. In the first place, Alabama has never shown any passion for protecting the womanhood of its black women. Thousands of them have been raped by white men and the law officers have merely winked. Hundreds of thousands of its black women have not been protected from illiteracy, misinformation, ignorance, ruthless economic exploitation and brutal persecution.

In the second place, Alabama has shown no great passion to protect its white womanhood from terrific economic exploitation and brutalizing living conditions. The lives of Victoria Price, Ruby Bates and scores of thousands of their kind are living witness to that. In order to attract Northern business firms to Alabama, the merchant-manufacturing oligarchy, through its Chambers of Commerce, has held up the attractively low wage scale of its women workers, which until recently averaged about six dollars a week. It remained for the NRA codes enforced from Washington increase the weekly wages of women mill slaves from $6 to $14 a week. Living conditions of the white and black proletariat of Alabama are still deplorable and the habitations of these workers are worse than those of the average African native.

Under the circumstances, we wonder what Attorney General Knight is talking about when he refers to Alabama's "passion for protecting womanhood."

Ruby Bates, From Sick Bed, Defends Southern Workers

Anxious to Return to Struggle, She Criticizes Leibowitz for Attack on South's Toilers

New York

NEW YORK.—From her hospital bed where she is rapidly recovering from a major operation, and has been declared out of danger by the physician in charge, Ruby Bates, [illegible] defense witness in the April trial of Heywood Patterson, in a letter addressed to the working class of the workers and sent to the International Labor Defense for forwarding, joined today with Lester Carter in criticism of slurs upon the white workers of the South made by Samuel S. Leibowitz, I. L. D. defense attorney in the case.

"I have just read the statement made by Lester Carter, and published in the Daily Worker, about the things Attorney Leibowitz said at the Decatur trial," she writes.

"When Leibowitz made that statement, he was including me too, and all Southern workers. He charged us with being just 'hoboes.' We were hoboes, in a sense, but that is no reason for Leibowitz to attack the whole white southern working class.

"Lester Carter and myself were not on this freight train because we wanted to be hoboes. It was the capitalist system that caused us to be on that freight train.

"Lester Carter had no job. I had had a job, but what pay was I getting?—$2.75 a week! This is why we were on this freight train, because we had no money, nothing to live on, and no other way to go.

"Since the trial of Heywood Patterson in April, I have come into the ranks of the working class, consciously, and I have begun to help in the fight to free the nine innocent boys.

"I was born and raised in the South, and I know that race hatred is not born into the minds of the white workers. It is taught and scared into the minds of the poor white people.

"I am going to fight with the workers of the entire world until I die.

"I will go back to Decatur or any other place where the Scottsboro boys are tried, until they are set free.

"I know that when the Scottsboro boys are set free the workers of the world will be happy, and friends, I will be the happiest of all to see them free.

"I am not able to be in the fight just now, but soon I will be where I was a few months ago. I am now getting stronger every day.

"Workers, the Scottsboro boys must be freed. They are depending on us to free them. So while I am ill, and cannot do so much as I want to do toward their freedom. I call on you workers to put yourself stronger in the fight. Take your place and mine too.

"Don't let the Scottsboro boys die.

Yours truly,
RUBY BATES."

State To Wind Up Norris Case

Trump Cards Slated Today As Last 2 Prosecution Witnesses Take Stand

Montgomery
Ala.

DECATUR, Ala., Dec. 3.—Trump cards will be played tomorrow in the trial of Clarence Norris, second of the seven negro defendants in the Scottsboro case to face a Morgan County jury on charges growing out of an alleged attack on two white women in 1931.

Norris was brought to trial on a charge of attacking Mrs. Victoria Price, Huntsville mill worker, whom the State alleges was attacked with Ruby Bates by a group of negroes aboard a Southern Railway freight train in Jackson County on March 25, 1931. The trials are being held here under a change of venue.

On adjournment of court yesterday afternoon the State had only two more witnesses to offer, Orvel Gilley, the "wandering poet" of Albertville, Ala., and Luther Morris, a Jackson County farmer.

Gilley was the State's principal corroborating witness and testified that he witnessed the attacks during the trial of Heywood Patterson, convicted and his punishment fixed at death, for a third time last Friday.

In the Patterson trial, the State for the first time offered Gilley as a witness to corroborate Mrs. Price's story. In the first trials in Scottsboro, Ala., in April, 1931, within three weeks after the alleged crime, Ruby Bates was the corroborating witness.

Although the Bates girl now is recovering from an operation in a New York hospital, the defense will through written interrogatories offer her repudiation of her Scottsboro testimony in Norris's defense.

The Bates girl, last February, disappeared from her home at Huntsville, and no trace of her was found until she made a dramatic appearance in the court room here last April just as the defense prepared to close in the second trial of Patterson.

Previous testimony that she was attacked was repudiated and the girl charged Mrs. Price, her companion on a hobo trip to Chattanooga, had made up the story to keep from being arrested.

Mrs. Price from the stand had seven times reiterated that she was attacked, and yesterday retold the sordid story and identified Norris as one of her attackers.

The direct and cross-examination of Mrs. Price yesterday was slightly more than two hours against more than four hours on her previous appearances in the two Patterson trials here.

Atty.-Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., directing the State's prosecution, and Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of counsel retained by the International Labor Defense in behalf of the negro, sparred for points from each others witnesses yesterday.

Leibowitz sought to discredit the testimony of previous witnesses through questioning of W. [illegible] Branum, who on direct examination [illegible] a woman sink to the ground," on the opposite side of the train from him. Under cross-examination by Leibowitz, Branum fixed his position several cars nearer the engine of the train at Paint Rock, Ala., where the arrests were made than where other witnesses had testified they saw Mrs. Price leave the train.

Knight shot at the testimony of Percy Ricks, negro fireman on the train that he had seen two negroes taken from an empty near an oil tank car a little past midway of the long freight, by establishing through R. S. Turner, conductor of the train called by the defense, that the only two empties on the freight were back within five cars of the caboose.

Sam Mitchell, negro farm hand, called by the State to testify that he had seen the fight between a group of negroes and whites aboard a gondola car as the train passed within two miles of Stevenson, on cross-examination had testified that he saw some negro boys riding in the doors of empty box cars.

Through the Norris and Patterson trials, witnesses have been asked to demonstrate their testimony regarding their positions on the train, on a miniature freight set up on a platform before the jury, the train, painted in loud colors has been dubbed "The Scottsboro Special."

Norris with Patterson and six others was convicted in Jackson County in April, 1931, at Scottsboro, but the United States Supreme Court set the sentences of death aside on seven of them after the Alabama Supreme Court had held the eighth was a juvenile, but affirmed the other sentences.

Last March, Judge A. E. Hawkins, who passed the original death sentences granted a change of venue and designated Morgan Circuit Court for the new trials.

It appeared doubtful that any of the other negroes would be called to trial until next year. Five more are in the jurisdiction of the Morgan Circuit Court and two are in custody of the Morgan County Juvenile Court.

THE first trials of the Scottsboro cases were conducted amidst such glaring injustices to the defendants that the United States Supreme Court set aside the verdicts. In the second trial, Judge Horton, who presided, also set aside the verdict of guilty after only one of the defendants had been tried, on the ground that the decision of the jury was a palpable miscarriage of justice. When the new series of trials began a fortnight ago at Decatur, Alabama, every honest and intelligent Southerner must have hoped with all his heart that this time the trials would be conducted in such a way that there could be no question of the fairness of the proceeding and that the honor of the South in a question of justice to Negroes charged with a serious crime, which has been so seriously questioned throughout the world, would be vindicated. Unhappily, the conduct and result of the first case have given exactly the opposite result.

JUDGE Callahan, who supplanted Judge Horton in presiding at the new trials, has seemed singularly insensitive to the fact that the eyes of the world were upon him. He swept aside evidence tending to support the view that the general feeling in and around Decatur was such as to make a fair trial almost impossible. He refused to permit the introduction of vitally important evidence showing that the two young women (one of whom has denied that there was any attack) had spent the preceding night in a hobo jungle with two young white men. He flatly asserted from the bench that no Southern white woman, however degraded, would voluntarily have sex relations with a Negro. His attitude toward the chief defense counsel, Samuel Leibowitz, can only be described as one of half-concealed hostility. His mental bias was strikingly revealed when, in charging the jury, he forgot to instruct them how to bring in any verdict except one of guilt. Under the circumstances, it is not surprising that the jury should once again have shut its eyes to the evidence and sentenced the defendant to death. It will be no surprise if similar verdicts are found in the cases of the other Negroes. Appeals will of course be taken; and it seems reasonable to believe that the miscarriage of justice is again sufficiently obvious to bring the question before the United States Supreme Court. But the real tragedy in the case is still Alabama's.

City's Workers Plan Huge Scottsboro Protests

12-2-33

NEW YORK.—David Schriftman, International Labor Defense attorney, just returned from the Decatur trial of the Scottsboro boys, will report on the trial at a monster protest meeting Sunday evening at Rockland Palace, 155th Street and 8th Avenue, 8 p.m.

New York

Lincoln Steffens, prominent author and member of the National Committee for the Defense of Political Prisoners, Richard B. Moore, General Secretary of the League of Struggle for Negro Rights, William Fitzgerald of the Harlem Section of the International Labor Defense, James W. Ford, Harlem Section Organizer of the Communist Party and John Moore, Tallapoosa County, Ala., sharecropper, will be among the speakers.

The giant protest meeting will be preceded by a huge demonstration this afternoon in Harlem, beginning at 2 o'clock, from 131st Street and Lenox Ave. The parade and demonstration, called by the Young Communist League, is supported by scores of organizations throughout the city whose members will attend in a body with their banners and slogans.

The two protest actions will climax a week of open air protest meetings in Harlem, whose working-class population is seething with indignation over the lynch preparations by the Decatur court, the charge of Judge Callahan to the jury telling them how to convict Haywood Patterson the lynching of Lloyd Warner in Missouri this week and the release two days ago by Eastern Shore judges of the four arrested leaders of the mob which lynched George Armwood on October 18.

Thousands of white workers will show their solidarity with the Negro masses by taking part in to-day's parade and to-morrow's mass meeting at the Rockland Palace.

Huntsville Mill Worker Describes Attack In 15-Minute Testimony

MINIATURE TRAIN SET UP IN COURT

Leibowitz Is Frequently Interrupted By Judge In Cross-Examining

BY T. M. DAVENPORT

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 27—(AP)—Pointing to Heywood Patterson, Mrs. Victoria Price late Monday afternoon identified him as one of six Negroes who allegedly attacked her aboard a Southern Railway freight train in Jackson County on March 25, 1931, and then faced a rigid cross-examination of two hours and 50 minutes.

The crowd leaned forward as on direct examination Mrs. Price swung her arm toward Patterson, who was hunched forward with his chair tilted against the wall, and said, "That defendant over there, Heywood Patterson, was one of them," and nodded her head in his direction.

Birmingham Post 11-28-33

Patterson, twice convicted and sentenced to death for the alleged attack, is the first of seven Negroes in the Scottsboro case brought to trial at the special session of the Morgan County Circuit Court. Six other defendants, all of whom have been sentenced to death once for the alleged crime, face trial here in the coming weeks, and two others are in custody of the Juvenile Court of this county.

Leibowitz Cross-Examines

Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of counsel retained for the Negroes by the International Labor Defense, subjected Mrs. Price to cross-examination.

The New York attorney, in his cross-examination, dwelt at length on the movements of Mrs. Price and Ruby Bates, her companion on the hobo trip who has repudiated her testimony in the original trials, on the freight train from the time they boarded it in the yards at Chattanooga, Tenn., until they climbed out of the gondola car at Paint Rock.

Mrs. Price's direct testimony completed her story of the attack in 15 minutes, and her voice carried throughout the courtroom in which there was not a vacant seat.

After two and a half hours of examination, Leibowitz asked Judge W. W. Callahan to recess, saying, "Judge I'm tired and cannot go on. I've been on my feet all day."

"Tomorrow I think I'll ask you to take a seat, so you won't get tired," Judge Callahan said. "You wore yourself out running up and down the train getting all excited."

The train referred to was a miniature freight train in circus colors, Leibowitz had mounted before the jury to demonstrate movements of witnesses and principals on the train.

Judge Callahan frequently interrupted Leibowitz in his cross-examination to shut him off, but the attorney generally worked back to the point at issue again. Several times, the judge cautioned both attorney and witness about arguing.

During the cross-examination, Mrs. Price several times showed heat in her answers and was visibly fighting for control.

Her eyes flashed several times and once as she referred to a previous statement, Leibowitz retorted, "I didn't ask you for your statements, you have made plenty of them here."

As court recessed, Judge Callahan warned Bailiff Aaron Walters, not to permit any photographs of them adding, "Some man tried that project on me this morning, and there wasn't a deputy near."

The judge also ordered that strict watch be kept to prevent the jurors from conversing with outsiders or discussing the case before they retire to deliberate on a verdict.

"You must not under any consideration talk to anyone on the telephone," Judge Callahan instructed the jury. "If some member of the family wants to tell you something, let them tell it to the bailiff."

Birmingham Age-Herald 12-?-33

The codefendants have been tried only once, and then were sentenced to death, but the United States Supreme Court set the verdicts aside. Last Spring, Patterson was retried here and again given a death sentence, but Judge James E. Horton, who presided, set the verdict aside.

Mrs. Price, dressed in a blue dress, a black hat with a short veil and a bright scarf draped over her shoulders, told the story of the alleged attack upon herself and Ruby Bates, who now is in a New York hospital in serious condition from an operation, under direct examination by Solicitor H. G. Bailey, of Boaz.

Her voice did not falter as she told the details of the story.

Tells Of Incidents On Train

The woman told of boarding the train at Chattanooga, Tenn., with the Bates girl, who in the last trial repudiated her original story of the attacks, and at Stevenson, Ala., of moving from an oil tank car to a gondola or coal car.

Patterson, Mrs. Price said, led the group of Negroes into the car and ordered the seven white youths in there with them to jump out. All except one of the white youths, she testified, were forced from the train. She identified the youth remaining, as Orvel Gilley, who was frequently mentioned in the last trials and probably will follow Mrs. Price to the stand.

After the fight, she said the Negroes, 12 of them, attacked her and the Bates girl and that Patterson said he was going to "make us his women."

She told of getting off the train when it was stopped at Paint Rock, Ala., where a posse arrested nine of the Negroes, two of whom are in the custody of the Morgan County Juvenile Court, and the others are facing retrial here.

Just before Mrs. Price took the stand, the "Scottsboro Special," a miniature train used in the trials last Spring, was assembled on a platform before the jury. Samuel S. Leibowitz, of New York, chief counsel retained by the International Labor Defense, informed the court he would use it in cross examination of Mrs. Price.

"It is just adding flirts and frills," said Judge W. W. Callahan, presiding, who had been seeking to speed up proceedings throughout the day, "but I guess it will be all right." Later the courtroom roared as he said, "Looks like Santa Claus has come here."

The jury that was finally accepted after searching examinations of each venireman by the defense attorneys consists of 10 farmers, a merchant, and a truck driver, and only one of them is from Decatur.

The jury personnel is:, Hickory O. Bridges, farmer; Elbert M. Cobb, farmer; Gladstone G. Isby, farmer; Edward H. Nelson, Decatur, truck driver; Avery Roberts, farmer; Claude J. Roberts, farmer; John H. Russell, farmer; John Holbrooks, farmer; Homer Johnson, farmer; Ditchler Johnston, farmer; Floyd H. Lyle, farmer, and Homer Summerford, merchant.

During the qualification of the venire of 100, 32 were excused for various reasons, 21 had fixed opinions, 12 objected to capital punishment, and 23 were struck in selecting the 12 for the trial.

Leibowitz Asks Delay

Just before the jury was struck, Leibowitz informed the court that the defense was not ready, due to the condition of the Bates girl preventing taking her depositions by a commissioner before Wednesday.

Judge Callahan overruled any motion for delay and said if the testimony could be obtained by Wednesday it could be offered, otherwise it woul not be.

The jurist previously had signified that he believed the case could be completed in three days.

Leibowitz noted an exception, and with other preliminaries cleared away, Mrs. Price was called to the stand.

Taking Them to the Lynch Court

A group of officers taking the Scottsboro boys from their cells in the Decatur jail to the courtroom, where District Attorney Knight and Judge Callahan are attempting to railroad them to execution.

Concord, N. C. Tribune
December 6, 1933.

LAW'S DELAY ONE CAUSE OF LYNCHINGS.

One of the reasons why there is so little resentment against lynchings in certain quarters is because of the slowness of the courts. If punishment for wrongdoing were certain and sure, there would be no cause for lynchings. It is when an outraged populace, feeling that the courts are powerless to act, take the law into their hands, that we have lynchings.

The Hickory Record cites the Scottsboro case as typical of this line of reasoning.

"For a third time," says The Record, "a death verdict has been returned against Heywood Patterson, 21-year-old negro for an alleged assault on a white woman, at Scottsboro, Ala., in 1931.

"Regardless of what the people of the country at large may think concerning the affair, few persons would argue that it should be necessary to try a case three times and then perhaps prolong the procedure by another appeal.

"The case has been submitted to three different juries and each time the verdict of guilty has been brought back.

"If a mob had taken the accused negroes out and hanged them following the alleged attack, the press of the land would have voiced the indignation of law-abiding citizens. We should stop to consider, now that a third verdict of guilty has been returned in the case, with further delays probable, that here is an instance upon which those guilty of mob violence justify their rash acts.

"Courts must be made to function with greater expedition if we are to stamp out the disposition of people to take the punishment of certain criminals into their own hands. It will do little good to denounce lynching unless we are able to convince the masses that the courts are dependable agencies in the meting out of justice through the imposition of proper penalties for capital crimes."

The Scottsboro Case.

The Scottsboro case, in which the negro, Heywood Patterson, was sentenced to death Friday afternoon for the third time, provides an outstanding example of the manner in which the justice machinery in this country is often all but snowed under by tactics of delay.

Patterson and his companions are charged with attacking two white girls on a freight train March 25, 1931, lacking only four months of being three years ago. In fairness to every person concerned, for the sake of orderly processes of justice and to avoid waste of time and money to the state, the cases against these negroes should have been disposed of long ago Even now, after two years and eight months the end is not in sight. Patterson's attorney's have announced they would file a motion for a new trial, and if denied, would proceed to a higher court and eventually to the United States Supreme Court if necessary to obtain a new trial. And Patterson's companions have yet to face hearing in the lower courts.

Many factors have entered into the Scottsboro case to confuse the issue, whether the negroes are guilty of attacking these two girls as charged. The flaming of racial prejudice, the intercession of the International Labor Defense, the resentment against the northern attorneys sent to Alabama by it, radical influences, which have grasped upon the Scottsboro case to make a "cause celebre," the repudiation by one of the alleged assault victims of the testimony she had given against the negro defendants—all these have tended to obscure the issue of innocence or guilt of the negroes, and the many delays have only given additional time for the injection of more extraneous matters into the public discussion of the trials and has made it increasingly difficult to keep the case on the single issue at stake.

A WISE JUDGE

Business of commending Judge CALLAHAN, of Alabama.

By expediting the trials of two negroes under indictment in the famous Scottsboro case, he has robbed lawyers imported by radical societies from staging a show that while doubtless of tremendous personal advantage to them is not conducive to judicial dignity and nct in keeping with the sane ideas of justice.

We would not venture to risk an opinion as to what may happen after this trial—Alabama was overruled in the first—but whatever the result Judge CALLAHAN deserves the thanks of all and sundry citizens of all states who believe in keeping the courtroom a place of dignity, unruffled by prejudice and unsullied by dramatics.

SCOTTSBORO NEGROES GIVEN A CONTINUANCE

Trials of the remainder of the defendants in the "Scottsboro Case" on charges of attacking a white woman, Monday were postponed indefinitely at Decatur by Judge W. W. Callahan at the request of the defense counsel. The postponement was granted while the jury was deliberating the case of Clarence Norris, the second of the negroes to be tried at Decatur. Heywood Patterson, another of the seven negroes, was found guilty and sentenced to die in the electric chair.

SCOTTSBORO TRIAL TAKES NEW TURN

SCENE OF ATTACK SHIFTED

Times

By Impugning Veracity of the Accuser, Leibowitz Hopes for Acquittal of Norris.

12-3-33

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., Dec. 2.—The defense adopted new tactics today as the State opened its case against Clarence Norris, one of the nine Scottsboro Negroes, seeking to prove from the testimony of State witnesses that Victoria Price or the farmers called to corroborate her charge of criminal attack were lying.

New York

Under cross-examination by Samuel S. Leibowitz before Judge W. W. Callahan two of the State's witnesses located the place at which they saw Mrs. Price in a faint at a point 520 feet from the spot at which she says she swooned in alighting from a gondola car of a freight train.

The other witnesses for the State admitted under cross-examination that they saw three Negroes in an empty bor-car near the end of the train, far from the gondola in which black and white hoboes staged a free-for-all and in which Mrs. Price says she and Ruby Bates were attacked.

Contradicting the Accuser.

Lee Adams and Tom Dobbins, Jackson County farmers called by Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr. to bolster up Mrs Price's story, retold in court for the eighth time this morning, admitted that they distinguished no woman in the freight car in which they saw white men and Negroes fighting.

Dobbins and his plow-hand, Sam Mitchell, also testified that they saw "darkies" standing in the open door of an empty box car far behind the one in which they saw the Negroes and a gang of white hoboes who were thrown off the train, "rassling and tussling."

W. W. Hill, station agent at Paint Rock, where a posse stopped the train, and W. E. Branum, a member of the posse, were the State's witnesses who contradicted Victoria Price regarding the spot at which she fainted upon leaving the train.

Percy Ricks, Negro fireman of the train, called out of turn in order that he might return to his job, testified for the defense that he saw Victoria Price and Ruby Bates running back and forth alongside the train as though they were as anxious to escape as the nine Negroes who subsequently were rounded up and "carried to jail," in Scottsboro.

The defense has contended all along that the case grew out of the Price girl's fear of an arrest for vagrancy or some other offense and that the condition in which doctors found the young women at Scottsboro could be accounted for by their conduct in the hobo jungle at Chattanooga the night before.

Judge Criticized in Press.

At the third trial of Heywood Patterson, who was convicted yesterday and condemned to death, Judge Callahan refused to admit any testimony regarding the relationship among the two girls and Lester Carter and Orville Gilley, two of the white hoboes who appeared to testify at his trial, the former for the defense and the latter for the State.

The judge, who announced this morning that he would go through the formality of sentencing Patterson to death in the electric chair at Kilby Prison at the conclusion of the Norris trial, was criticized today by The Birmingham Post in an editorial headed "A Questionable Trial." The editorial said in part:

"The record of this trial, when it comes to review by the United States Supreme Court, will not be a favorable commentary on Alabama judicial procedure.

'Blame rests on those responsible for removing Judge Horton from trial of the cases. This blame apparently is borne either by Chief Justice John C. Anderson alone, or by him and his associates on the Alabama supreme court bench."

Bars Preachers and Barbers.

Before adjourning the trial until Monday morning, Judge Callahan cautioned the jurors against listening to barber shop gossip and forbade them to attend church services tomorrow.

"There's no way of telling in advance what a preacher is going to say than there is about a barber," he said.

The question of the jurors' beards was brought up by a bailiff at the close of the day's session. Remarking that while Alabamians "may go barefoot, they shave occasionally," Judge Callahan at first gave permission for them to visit a barber shop provided there was none there but the barber. Then he rescinded his permission, asserting that there was "no way to keep a barber quiet short of killing him."

"Where are we going to get razors?" one of the jurors inquired.

"I don't care whether you buy them or borrow them, but you'll have to shave yourselves or shave one another," the judge replied.

Pistol Confuses Mrs. Price.

Victoria Price was the State's first witness at the opening of the trial of another one of the Negroes whom the United States Supreme Court saved from the electric chair on the ground that their first trials at Scottsboro were unfair.

She repeated her story briefly in direct examination, pointing out the fifteenth car of a toy freight train as a replica of the one from which she alighted when it was stopped by the posse at Paint Rock. Bruised and beaten, she said, she fainted on the spot and could not possibly have tried to get away.

One of the Negroes hit her on the head with the butt end of a pistol, she asserted, describing it as of .45 or .38 calibre. Mr. Leibowitz borrowed a pistol from one of the deputies and handed it to her. She could not tell the butt from the muzzle and admitted she knew nothing about firearms except what she had "been told."

Frequently she turned her eyes toward Mr. Knight before answering the defense lawyer's questions. Mr. Leibowitz at last protested, asking the witness if she were "looking for signals." Judge Callahan flared up, declaring that he would not allow "such tactics" in his court room.

Witness Crosses Testimony.

Arthur Woodall, a storekeeper at Stevenson, was called by the State to testify that he had taken a knife and "a fifty-cent piece" from Norris when the Negroes were rounded up. He admitted under cross-examination that he had testified before Judge James E. Horton at Patterson's trial last Spring that he could not say from which of the Negroes he had taken the knife and money.

"Were you yourself in the Scottsboro court house as a defendant charged with murder since this case started?" asked Mr. Leibowitz. This question brought another denunciation from the bench, but not before Woodall had answered the question affirmatively.

John Simmons, chief deputy sheriff of Jackson County, of which Scottsboro is the seat, said he had seen Woodall take the knife and the coin from Norris. In the jail, the night of his arrest, Simmons said, Norris had denied his guilt, but had "accused all the others."

Liebowitz and Judge Clash.

Mr. Liebowitz protested that such testimoony was inadmissible, but Judge Callahan refused to hear him on the legal issues involved and allowed it to stand. When the New York lawyer tried to amplify his point, Judge Callahan bounced in his chair, became red in the face and shouted:

"That's enough, Mr. Liebowitz! Don't say another word; not one word."

"Except," snapped Mr. Liebowitz, biting his lips.

"You're entitled to that, but that's all you are entitled to," Judge Callahan retorted.

Despite the seeming rebuffs from the bench, Mr. Leibowitz had succeeded during the day in establishing apparently friendly relations with one or two of the jurors who returned the smiles he gave them and followed with interest his explanations of photographs introduced to prove that Victoria Price could not have been in two places at once.

At the close of the session, Mr. Leibowitz asserted that he proposed to prove "mathematically out of the mouths of the State's own witnesses that this whole case was a contemptible frame-up by those two girls." For the first time since the International Labor Defense brought him into the Scottsboro case, he said, he was hopeful of obtaining a jury verdict of "not guilty."

SCOTTSBORO JURY CONSIDERS FATE OF SECOND YOUTH

First of Seven Defendants Faces Sentence of Death as New Verdict Nears.

By BEN COTHRAN

(United Press Staff Correspondent)

Decatur, Ala., Dec. 5.—The third Morgan County jury to hear evidence in retrials of the Scottsboro defendants began its deliberation today.

The fate of Clarence Norris, on trial for his life the second time as one of a group of colored youths accused of attacking two white women aboard a freight train near Scottsboro, Ala., March 25, 1931 was put in the hands of the jury last night.

The jurors were instructed to wait until court convened today to begin deliberations. They entered the jury room at 8:25 A. M.

Death Sentence Today

Judge W. W. Callahan planned to pass sentence today on Heywood Patterson, who was found guilty and given the death penalty for the third time last week.

Patterson and Norris are two of seven youths granted new trials by the United States Supreme Court.

The new hearings opened in Morgan County Circuit Court last spring on a change of venue from Scottsboro. Patterson was convicted again, but granted another new trial, this time on the grounds of insufficient evidence, by Judge James E. Horton who postponed second trials for Norris and the other defendants and excused himself from hearing them.

Additional postponement of the five cases still awaiting retrial until consummation of an appeal from Patterson's third conviction was expected to be announced today.

Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of defense counsel, who was rebuked yesday by Judge Callahan for conduct indicating lack of respect for the Court, tentatively planned to leave today, for his home in New York.

Thirteen Exceptions

Judge Callahan's charge to the Norris jury was much the same as that given to the jury that convicted Patterson last week.

Leibowitz made 13 exceptions to the judge's charge. In granting some of these, Judge Callahan expanded his instructions to include, that Mrs. Victoria Price, one of the alleged attack victims, was an interested witness as prosecutrix; that under the law a juror must stand his ground even if all others oppose him; that jurors are not duty bound to reach an egreement, and defined a reasonable doubt.

The judge refused a defense request to tell the jurors that the past conduct of the prosecutrix should be considered, holding that the question of the previous chastity of the women allegedly assaulted was "wholly immaterial."

Asking for an acquittal in the defense argument to the jury, Leibowitz termed the charges "a contemptible frame-up by two bums to send men to the electric chair just because they are black" and told the jurors they should "stop this mockery of justice."

NEGRO'S CASE GOES TO ALABAMA JURY

Second Scottsboro Trial Ends With Judge Amending Charge on Demand of Defense.

COLOR LINE DISAVOWED

But Callahan Cites New York Law in Barring Evidence About Woman Accuser.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., Dec. 4.—The second of the Scottsboro cases went to the jury tonight after a dramatic scene in which Judge W. W. Callahan, at the insistence of Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of defense counsel, amended and emended the charge he had just delivered.

Informed that the general exception entered to Judge Callahan's charge to the jury which convicted Heywood Patterson would be valueless on appeal under Alabama law, Mr. Leibowitz entered thirteen specific exceptions to the charge delivered in the trial of Clarence Norris.

It was 6:17 P. M. when the long session ended, and, at the request of the jurors, consideration of the evidence on which Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr. asked the death penalty for the Negro defendant accused of attacking Victoria Price was deferred until tomorrow morning.

At that time also the sentence of death which the jury's verdict against Patterson makes mandatory upon the trial judge will be pronounced, and the trials of the five other Negroes now in the jail here will be postponed until another term of court. Both sides are understood to feel that further trials pending appeals would be a needless expense.

Judge Disavows Color Line.

Judge Callahan's charge to the jury today differed in only one important respect from the one which he gave to the Patterson jury on Thursday. This afternoon he failed to tell the twelve white jurors that when a white woman charges she has been ravished by a Negro "the presumption is great" that she did not yield willingly. Instead he said:

"The law forbids rape, and the law is made for all and intended to protect all, and it will protect all womankind, regardless of their standing in society or their past acts or station in life or their race or color. And I'm not raising the color line either; I'm telling you the law."

As he said this Judge Callahan peered over his spectacles at the representatives of Northern newspapers.

He proceeded to explain to the jury the forms of the verdict they might return—guilty with a sentence of death or guilty with a term in prison of not less than ten years. He paused a moment and added:

"Gentlemen, that is about all on the law."

Mr. Leibowitz arose from his chair and it seemed for a moment that Judge Callahan again was going to forget to instruct the jury on the form of their verdict if they should decide to acquit.

But Judge Callahan explained that he had merely finished giving "the State's side of it" and that if the jurors were not convinced of the Negro's guilt "beyond a reasonable doubt" they should write the following words on a piece of paper and sign it:

Tilt of Judge and Defense.

It was after this that Mr. Leibowitz announced that he intended to offer several specific exceptions to the charge. Judge Callahan, who earlier in the day had sent the jury out while he reprimanded the New York attorney for what he termed disrespectful conduct, left the bench and sat in the witness chair.

Then began in the almost empty courtroom a battle of wits which lasted nearly half an hour with Mr. Leibowitz pressing the judge almost as though he were a hostile witness. Some of the lawyer's demands the court granted. Others he declined to grant and some he granted in such manner that Mr. Leibowitz took exceptions.

The first four of the defense attorney's exceptions were directed to that part of the charge in which Judge Callahan had told the jury that the past conduct and character of the complaining witness, in this case Victoria Price, was immaterial and irrelevant when "consent" was not the defense."

"What I said was that it was wholly out of place in establishing or tending to establish her consent," the judge declared. "Of course her conduct may shed light on what credence is to be given to her testimony."

Accuser "An Interested Witness."

Judge Callahan, who had charged the jury that the defendant, who in this trial did not take the stand, was "an interested party," then was asked to inform the jury that the status of Victoria Price was also that of an interested witness.

"That's not the way to make that request," replied the judge. "It's not a legal request but I will say, regardless of the way in which you tried to get it done, that the fact that she is the prosecutrix does make her an interested witness."

Mr. Leibowitz then asked Judge Callahan to revise his charge and instruct the jurors that in the case of a witness who has been shown to have testified falsely about any material fact, the jury may disregard all his testimony.

"I decline to do that in the manner in which it is put," replied the judge, who had instructed the jury that they might decide for themselves which parts of a witness's testimony they would believe and which they would cast aside.

"Exception!" snapped Mr. Leibowitz.

As to "Reasonable Doubt."

Mr. Leibowitz proceeded to his next exception:

"I now ask your honor to charge this jury that if any among them have a reasonable doubt after a consideration of the evidence, it is his duty under the law to stand his ground until and unless that doubt can be removed by logical, reasonable argument based on evidence."

"The law doesn't require me to do it," the judge said. "However, there can't be a verdict unless all twelve agree. Each man has a right to his own honest convictions."

Urged by Mr. Leibowitz to direct the jury that they were "under no legal duty to agree" if the honest opinion of even one man was arrayed against the other eleven, the judge responded: "I think I have already done that." Mr. Leibowitz noted another exception.

In his charge Judge Callahan reminded the jurors that the case was not a suit between Victoria Price and Clarence Norris but an action between the State of Alabama and a defendant charged with a crime "against the peace and dignity" of the Commonwealth.

Asserting that, as the defense had raised no claim of "consent" by the prosecuting witness, the issue of her reputation could not be brought up, the Judge said:

"The rule is that prior unchastity is inadmissible as a defense. The question of chastity or unchastity is a wholly immaterial issue in the case.

"That, gentlemen, is the law of Alabama. It is also the law of Connecticut, Massachusetts, Michigan, Ohio, Vermont and New York."

As he pronounced the name of the Empire State, from which come all the lawyers associated with the defense, except G. W. Chamlee of Chattanooga, Tenn., Judge Callahan allowed his voice to rise and he cast a challenging look at Mr. Leibowitz.

Regardless of his race or color, or condition in life, Judge Callahan said, the defendant was entitled to a fair trial.

Bates Deposition Admitted.

Mr. Leibowitz made the closing argument for the defense after Wade Wright, the circuit solicitor, and Attorney General Knight had demanded the death penalty for Norris. The summations began after Lester Carter, a white hobo who was thrown off the train before the alleged attack took place, had testified and after the deposition of Ruby Bates had been read to the jury.

The Bates girl's assertion that the Negroes did not molest her or the twice-married Price woman was allowed to go into the record along with her admission that at the first trial in Scottsboro she had testified they had.

All details of what went on in the hobo jungle in Chattanooga, where the defense contends the two girls spent the night with Orville Gilley, a State witness, and Carter, were barred.

In his charge Judge Callahan said that the deposition of Miss Bates, taken in a New York hospital, must be given the same weight as though she had appeared in court as she did last Spring at Patterson's second trial.

Mr. Wright, opening the argument for the prosecution, urged the jury to "have in mind that this crime could have happened to any woman, even though she were riding in a parlor car instead of a box car."

Plea of Mr. Leibowitz.

Mr. Leibowitz spent about an hour trying to convince the jury that his client should be acquitted on the evidence, citing the points on which Mrs. Price had been trapped in untruths and in variances from the testimony of other State witnesses.

He spent most of his time, however, trying to overcome the bitter local prejudice against him and the International Labor Defense, a Communist organization, which brought him, a Democrat, into the case.

He sometimes wondered, he said, why the whole country should be aroused over "a contemptible frame-up by two bums," and he declared that was all that was left of the State's case with the "blah-blah," the "hurrahs for Jackson County and Morgan County," eliminated.

"Aren't we all American citizens?" he asked.

Referring to the occupants of the press seats, Mr. Leibowitz told the jurors that the "eyes of the world" were upon them. Then he concluded:

"If you have a reasonable doubt, hold out. Stand your ground, show you are a man, a red-blooded he-man—a Southern gentleman, ready to do justice even to this lowly, insignificant worm of a Negro boy. If the State had showed his guilt, I'd be the first to say hang him. But the State has failed to do this. Its case smells to heaven. We've had enough of this expense, enough opprobrium upon this State of Alabama. Let's end it now."

Deposition Took Seven Hours.

Miss Ruby Bates told yesterday how she talked for seven hours last Tuesday giving her deposition in the Scottsboro case. Recuperating from a major operation in a city hospital, she is out of danger now, but when she gave her deposition she was still dangerously weak, according to Dr. Louis Drosin, her physician.

She got word of the conviction of Heywood Patterson last week about an hour after the verdict was announced.

"It struck me bad when I heard it," she said last night. "He's not guilty. Why should he be punished for something he's not guilty of? I never saw any of those boys until I went to Scottsboro. That's the only time I saw Heywood Patterson. I hope they all go free."

JUSTICE FOR ALL OR NONE

Judge Callahan in his charge to the jurors in the trial of Haywood Patterson in the famous Scottsboro case in Decatur, Alabama, on Thanksgiving Day stated the doctrine of the equality of all men, black and white, before the law in terms worthy of remembrance. Unfortunately the new verdict of guilty brought in by the Alabama jury after more than a day of deliberation will arouse a widespread wonder as to whether they heard him or acted upon the fundamental doctrine which he gave them. He said:

> Something has been said through this case in argument, about the defendant's being a Negro.
> I would be ashamed of you if that is to enter into your consideration for search for truth in this case. No man is worthy to be in a jury box that would reach the guilt or innocence of a man on any such contemptible grounds.
> Before the law of Alabama and before the law of this nation, men stand on equal rights, as far as the law is concerned. He is entitled to expect and receive the administration of the law in that manner and no other.
> Whenever it is administered in any other way, the law has failed, and when the law fails, eventually the government will fail.

No doctrine is more fundamental to our civilization than that all men regardless of creed or color or wealth or place are equal before the law. Once that doctrine is invaded to destroy the equality before the law of any men than the hope of all others to secure impartial justice in our courts is gravely threatened. Only tyranny or anarchy can prevail where all men are not granted equality in the quest for justice.

Ruby Tells Judge, "They Didn't Do It!"

Planet 12-9-33 Richmond Va.

New York—From her hospital bed where she lies convalescing after a major operation, Ruby Bates, important Scottsboro defense witness who was unable because of her illness to appear in the Decatur court, and whose deposition Judge Callahan refused to wait for the court to receive, has written to Attorney-General Knight and to Callahan, repeating her statement of the innocent of the boys.

Ruby's letter, written the day after she went through the dangerous and grueling ordeal of questions and answers for five hours to make her deposition of testimony in defense of the Scottsboro boys, follows:

"New York City,
"November 29, 1933.

'Attorney-General Knight.
"Judge Callahan,
"Decatur, Ala.

"I hope the statement that I made yesterday is clear enough for the court. If I had been in better condition I could have made the statement much better.

"Mr. Knight and Judge, in this statement I did not tell every little thing that happen during this trip because it would have taken too long and my physical condition would not allow me to.

"Mr. Knight, I am a Southern girl, and I would say if these boys had committed this crime of which they are charged, I would say hang them, but they did not commit this crime.

"I hope the jury will believe my statement, as I cannot appear there.

"It is not because I came up here that I changed my testimony, but I changed it because the nine Negroes did not commit this crime. They are innocent boys.

"If these nine lives are taken by electric, nine lives are taken because they are innocent, not because they are guilty, for they did not rape Victoria Price or myself.

"I will tell this any place, any time. I wish to say again that in the statement taken by Mr. Applebaum yesterday is not every little thing that happened during this trip.

"I hope the court of my home town will believe my statement.

"This letter is written in the person of myself. There is no one that has ask me to write this. Neither is there anyone present in my ward. I again say the nine boys are innocent.

(Signed) "RUBY BATES.

"P. S.—I write this as a witness who cannot appear."

The Scottsboro Verdict

Courier 12-16-33

For the third time one of the seven defendants in Scottsboro's cause celebre has been convicted. For the third time he has been sentenced to death.

The defendant had all the benefit of brilliant legal counsel and financial aid from sources outside of Alabama. Between now and the time set for execution he will have, apparently, all the benefit of the delays provided by the law's red tape.

About all that the Scottsboro case has demonstrated is that it is often a long time between a verdict of guilty and fulfillment of the court's sentence.

By this time it would seem that those who have gone to such pains to defeat justice in Alabama would be convinced that the first verdict in the Scottsboro case was correct.

But for the meddlesome interference of agencies outside the state the case of the seven Scottsboro defendants would have been disposed of in the usual manner long ago. It now appears that it will be one of those interminable things which ultimately results in the original point of dispute being entirely lost sight of.

The most extraordinary phase of the Scottsboro affair is the patience of Alabama courts and of Alabama citizens. None will ever be able to charge that there was hasty action.

SCOTTSBORO

NEGRO GUILTY, GIVEN DEATH

Counsel at Once Takes Step Toward U. S. Supreme Court Appeal; Norris Jury Ready

DECATUR, Ala., Dec. 1 (AP).—The third verdict of death was returned today against Heywood Patterson, 21-year-old Negro, one of seven defendants in the "Scottsboro case," for an attack on a white woman who was hoboing on a freight train.

In a hushed courtroom, Walter Green, clerk, read the verdict:

"We, the jury, find the defendant guilty as charged, and fix his punishment at death."

The Negro, who twice before has heard identical words read in his case, appeared unmoved.

He was tried on a charge of attacking Mrs. Victoria Price aboard a Southern freight train on March 25, 1931.

There was not the slightest sign of a demonstration.

The jury had deliberated for 25 hours and 10 minutes.

NEW JURY READY.

Judge Callahan was preparing to swear in a jury, just selected for the trial of Clarence Norris, second of the defendants to be called on charges of attacking Mrs. Price, a Huntsville mill worker, when the jury reported.

Samuel S. Leibowitz of New York, chief of defense counsel announced he would file a motion for a new trial which, if denied, would be a step toward the United States Supreme Court.

The fight against the first death sentences imposed on Patterson and his co-defendants was carried to the Supreme Court after the Alabama Supreme Court had affirmed the decision of the Jackson County Circuit Court.

It was after the U. S. Supreme Court had held that the Negroes did not have the benefit of adequate counsel that a change of venue from Jackson County to Morgan was granted.

SAME TESTIMONY LIKELY.

Testimony in the Norris trial was expected to be largely the same as that in the Patterson trial since each side has called the same witnesses.

The defense, however, has interrogatories from Ruby Bates, who was the companion of Mrs. Price on the hobo trip and who last Spring made a sensational appearance in Patterson's second trial to repudiate her former testimony. She denied she was molested by the defendant.

The jury sworn tonight for the trial of Norris, like the one that convicted Patterson, consists largely of farmers.

William L. Patterson, national secretary of the International Labor Defense, last night assailed as a "legal lynch verdict" the conviction of Heywood Patterson. He said:

"The verdict, after a trial in which W. W. Callahan acted as an open provocator, is not surprising. His charge to the jury was an open proclamation that there is no justice in American courts for Negroes. The class conscious white workers and the Negro masses will not accept this verdict of the rulers of America."

But Victoria Price Is Hazy on Details and Sometimes Defies Defense Counsel.

New York, N.Y.

JUDGE LIMITS QUERIES

He Asks 'Respect' for Witness Under Fire Before Jury of Middle-Aged Farmers.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 27.—Before a jury of middle-aged farmers chosen today to try Heywood Patterson for his life, Victoria Price repeated her charge that he attacked her, but about the details she was hazy and alternately apologetic and defiant.

Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr. made few objections to the relentless cross-examination of Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of defense counsel, but Judge W. W. Callahan, who is presiding over the retrials of the so-called Scottsboro cases, lived up to the traditions of Southern chivalry.

Once when the New York attorney asked the only remaining complaining witness in the case whether she had not removed the overalls she says were torn from her by the Negroes, Judge Callahan warned him to "treat the lady with more respect."

The restrictions imposed by the rural jurist, whose witticisms often turned court-room laughs against the International Labor Defense lawyers from New York, left off the record many essentials of the defense offered last Spring before Judge James E. Horton, but the record was dotted with scores of exceptions which may prove valuable when and if the case is reviewed again before a higher court.

Judge Holds Limits Aid Defense.

For instance, the court forbade Mr. Leibowitz to press the witness regarding who accompanied her and Ruby Yates on their hitch-hiking expedition to Chattanooga on March 24, 1931.

He stuck to this ruling even after Mr. Leibowitz explained that he was trying to prove that the nine accused Negroes were not to blame for the condition in which doctors found the girls after they were removed from a Southern Railway freight train by a posse at Paint Rock on the afternoon of March 25.

"The more I shut you off the better shape you're in," the judge remarked once when Mr. Leibowitz protested against the limitations imposed upon his cross-examination of the woman's past life and associations.

At the last trial Lester Carter, one of seven white hoboes the Price woman says were hurled off the train "before the attack began," testified that he and Orville Gilley, another Nordic knight of the road, spent the night before the arrest of the Negroes in a hobo jungle near the railroad yards in Chattanooga. Although Gilley waited in court today to testify for the State, all questions by Mr. Leibowitz about the "hobo jungle" were taboo.

Within the narrow limits laid down by Judge Callahan, Mr. Leibowitz led the witness, dressed in a blue chiffon dress with many bangles, into more than a dozen contraditions of her earlier testimony.

Sometimes she would just look helplessly toward the prosecution table. Occasionally she made faces at Mr. Leibowitz and made argumentative or evasive replies to his questions. Most often she fell back upon the excuse that the lapse of time had made it impossible for her to "be positive."

Difficulties in Picking Jurors.

The selection of the jury took from 8:30 A. M. until 3 P. M. One hundred talesmen were examined by the defense and prosecution. The panel contained the son of a man who sat on the jury which convicted Patterson here last Spring, many with fixed opinions and a few with objections to capital punishment.

One man said he had no faith in circumstantial evidence and was excused after flunking tests prepared by Judge Callahan.

"Let's see if he knowns what it is," proposed the judge. "Suppose you went down to four cornfield—if you had a cornfield—and you were to see some ears of corn lying on the ground destroyed and suppose that near where you saw the ears of corn you saw tracks and suppose you knew those tracks to be the tracks of a hog. Would't that cause you to know that a hog got the corn?"

"Yes, but I wouldn't know it for sure," he answered.

"Well, let's try again," said Judge Callahan. "Suppose you were put in a dark house and kept there until you lost track of the day and the week and a man who said he had just come from the outside and there wasn't a cloud in the sky, and then he passed out and another came in and said it was noonday. Would you need any further evidence to know the sun was shining?"

"I'd have to take his word for it," the talesman said, looking far from satisfied.

The judge tried it again, asking the prospective juror if he followed the tracks of a man to a cabin with a tenant wearing the same size shoes resided would not convince him that the tracks were made by the man who lived there.

"There might be two men with the same size feet," insisted the skeptic, who was excused.

Jury as Fi ally Selected.

At the conclusion of the examination of the talesmen thirty-two had been excused at their own request, twelve had been cast out by the State because of conscientious scruples against the death penalty and twenty by the defense for holding fixed opinions about the guilt or innocence of the defendant.

Thirty-six remained in the box. The defense struck sixteen of these from the list and the State disposed peremptorily of eight others. The twelve remaining were:

HICKORY O. BRIDGES of Danville, a farmer.
ELBERT M. COBB of Eva, a farmer.
GLADSTONE J. ISELY of Hartselle, a farmer.
EDWARD H. NELSON of Decatur, a truck driver.
AVERY ROBERTS of Decatur, a painter.
CLAUDE J. ROBERTS of Somerville, a farmer.
JOHN H. RUSSELL of Decatur, a farmer.
JOHN HALBROOKS of Somerville, a farmer.
HOMER JOHNSON of Somerville, a farmer.
DITCHLER JOHNSTON of Somerville, a farmer.
FLOYD H. LYLE of Somerville, a farmer.
HOMER SUMMERFORD of Flakville, a merchant.

Only three of the present jurors are town-dwellers. Last Spring there were only about that many farmers on the jury, whose verdict of guilty was reversed by Judge Horton. All the others were residents of small towns.

[illegible] was sworn and warned not to discuss the case among themselves, with outsiders or even speak with members of their families by telephone as some members of last Spring's jury admitted they had done. Judge Callahan said they must not read newspapers until the trial was over.

Then all the witnesses for the State and the defense were sworn at once, seventeen white witnesses including the determined-looking Victoria Price for the prosecution and one lone Negro for the defense facing each other with upraised hands before the bar of justice.

Toy Train Intrigues Court.

With that done, Mr. Leibowitz, with the assistance of grinning deputies, began assembling his toy replica of the freight train on which the attack is alleged to have taken place.

Judge Callahan began bouncing up and down on the bench. He wanted to know if the record showed the train to be an exact replica of the original. Assured that it was, he said he didn't see much sense in it because everyone knew "the difference between engines, box cars and cabooses."

Mr. Leibowitz said he had only about half a dozen cars to put in place, and Judge Callahan, fidgeting and looking at his watch, said to go ahead, adding that he supposed a "few more flicks and frills may be all right." A moment later he said:

"I hope you'll get this done before Christmas because Santa Claus is going to get all that anyway."

At last it was done. Wade Wright, Circuit Solicitor of Morgan County, opened for the prosecution by reading the indictment charging Patterson with "forcibly ravishing Victoria Price against the peace and dignity of the State." A moment later she appeared in person to tell the judge and jury as much about it as she could remember.

H. G. Bailey, Circuit Solicitor of Jackson County, who prosecuted the trials at Scottsboro, led her through her direct examination, which lasted less than ten minutes. He did not press her about any details other than those immediately connected with the essential fact set forth in the indictment.

Cross-examination disclosedt hat Victoria Price was the Huntsville equivalent of a Lucy Stoner. Although twice married and once divorced, she never had used any but her maiden name, adding the title of the married state.

The name of her first husband, she said, was Henry Presley. Judge Callahan informed her she need not tell whether he divorced her or vice versa. She was still married to Ennis McLendon, she said, but was not living with him now and was not quite sure of the date when they were married in the Huntsville City Hall.

She was 25 years old, she said, and with her nondescript blond hair tightly curled in ringlets, her face powdered and her lips just faintly rouged she seemed nearer that age than he did last Spring. Then she appeared in court in a frayed sweater and a wrinkled [illegible] her hair was straggling and unkempt.

"Do you know Leslie Carter?" snapped Mr. Leibowitz.

"I wasn't acquainted with him at that time," she said.

"Did you know Jack Tiller?"

"Yes, I did."

"Wasn't he your boy friend?"

"Sort of ."

"And he was a married man?"

"Yes, sir, but he wasn't living with his wife."

Led U to Events in Case.

After Judge Callahan had forbidden the witness to answer the defense lawyer's questions about what had happened between her and Tiller and Orville Gilley, and between Ruby Bates and Lester Carter on the night before the alleged attack, Mr. Leibowitz asked if she ever had been convicted of "lewdness, drunkenness and vagrancy." Judge Callahan barred her answering.

Mr. Leibowitz then demanded to know whether she ever had been convicted of any crimes involving "moral turpitude." She complained that she did not know the meaning of the words. After they were explained in more simple terms, she said she had not.

Prevented from asking more about Victoria Price's acquaintance with a mysterious Chattanoogan identified only as "Red," Mr. Leibowitz took the witness over the events upon the train and there he fared better, although Judge Callahan frequently urged him to "get on to something else."

Discrepancies in Testimony.

Today Victoria Price said she thought it was Patterson who tried to hurl her off the train. At Scottsboro the record showed she had said it was Clarence Norris, who is awaiting a new trial with five other Negroes.

She said this afternoon that she knew nothing about firearms. Mr. Leibowitz reminded her that she had testified before that the weapon in Patterson's hand was a 45 calibre automatic and she said that to the best of her recollection that was so. The lawyer then read from the record of the Scottsboro case showing that she had said then that it was a .38 calibre pistol.

The other contradictions were of a similar nature, having to do with the number of times she was struck, the extent of her injuries and the actions of the Negroes and the white men whom they threw off the train. Twice the witness showed signs of agitation bordering upon panic.

The fencing continued until long after dark. At 6:15 Mr. Liebowitz asked the court to declared a recess, saying he was fagged out.

"That's too bad," said Judge Callahan, ordering him to go into training for night sessions beginning tomorrow night. At 6:25 court was recessed until tomorrow.

Fosdick and Horton Called.

At the request of the State a subpoena was issued for the Rev. Dr. Harry Emerson Fosdick, pastor of the Riverside Church in New York City. It was to him that [illegible]

[illegible] went for guidance, she said, when her conscience troubled her over the false testimony she said she gave at the first trial.

The defense countered late in the day by demanding a subpoena for Judge Horton, when Judge Callahan refused to concede that Mr. Leibowitz was reading correctly from the record of last Spring's trial.

Ruby Bates Still Very Ill.

Louis Colman, of the International Labor Defense, said yesterday that Ruby Bates, defense witness in the Scottsboro case, was "not yet out of danger" following a major operation in a local hospital on Friday. Julius Applebaum, the lawyer commissioned to take her deposition, said that he had not seen her yet, but Mr. Colman said he understood that if her deposition was not available for the Patterson trial her previous testimony could

Scottsboro Case Defense Charges Jury List Fraud

This photograph shows the seven defendants in the famous Scottsboro case. They are leaving the Morgan county jail for the courtroom. The Negroes are accused of attacking two white women in Jackson county, Ala. (Associated Press photo.)

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 24 (AP)—A formal charge of fraud in preparation of the jury roll in Jackson county from which the grand jury was drawn that indicted the seven Negro defendants in the "Scottsboro case" [illegible] today was added to the application of "systematic exclusion of Negroes" on the defense motion to quash the indictments.

Samuel S. Leibowitz, chief of counsel retained for the Negroes by the International Labor Defense entered the fraud charge as an additional ground just before the record of testimony on a similar motion in the cases last spring were read.

"I desire to add to the grounds pending," he said, "the aditional ground that there was fraud in the compilation of the jury roll from which the grand jury was purportedly drawn and therefore the indictments are null and void."

The defense last Monday on arraignment of the seven Negoes who are facing new trials entered a motion to quash the indictments on the ground that "systematic exclusion of Negroes from the jury rolls, solely because of their race and color" violated their constitutional rights.

The Negroes are charged with mass attacks on two white girls aboard a Southern railway freight train as it rolled through Jackson county March 25, 1931. The United States Supreme court set aside death sentences imposed at Scottsboro April 9, 1931, and under a change of venue last March the cases were moved here.

The slowly moving examination of the jury roll was interrupted this afternoon by Judge W. W. Callahan presiding, to arraign Clarence Norris and set his trial for Nov. 30. Norris was arraigned and the motion to quash the venire, the same as that entered when Heywood Patterson was arraigned Monday, was entered. Judge Callahan then fixed the date of the trial.

When Leibowitz demurred at the early date set for Norris, Judge Callahan said, "I am going to move with speed Monday morning." He added that he expected the Patterson trial, set for next Monday, to be completed either Wednesday night or Thursday morning.

The arrignment was the only break in the monotonous turnings of pages of the big book in which the qualified jurors are enrolled with J. E. Moody, member of the present jury commission of Jackson county, on the stand most of the day completing his identification of the persons inscribed on the roll whom he knew personally.

RGUMENTS ARE LIMITED

New York,

ourt Gives Each Side Two Hours to Address Jury in Patterson Case.

By F. RAYMOND DANIELL.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DECATUR, Ala., Nov. 29.—An issue which has plagued the State of Alabama for nearly three years was rgued again today before a Morgan County jury which tomorrow will be asked to decide whether Heywood Patterson, a Negro, shall live or die.

That issue is whether Victoria Price and Ruby Bates were attacked by nine Negroes on a freight train on March 25, 1931, or whether the whole Scottsboro case was a frame-up concocted by white hoboes of both sexes to avoid arrest for vagrancy.

Circuit Judge W. W. Callahan, who is presiding at Patterson's third trial, sat with his feet upon the bench while opposing lawyers harangued the twelve jurors, sitting stolidly and outwardly emotionless through flights of eloquence.

Wade Wright, solicitor of this county, which inherited the case from Jackson County after the United States Supreme Court sent it back for a new trial, roared at the jurors to remember that a white woman had sworn that she was criminally assaulted by the Negroes and to forget all else.

H. G. Bailey, who prosecuted the Negroes originally at Scottsboro, suavely asked for a verdict on the evidence and urged the jurors to weigh the plausibility of the defense charge that "citizens of their neighboring county" had helped to "frame the Negroes."

The long court day ended with Samuel S. Leibowitz, in the part of a stranger in a strange land handicapped by unfamiliarity with its customs, pleading "as man to man" to choose whether to believe the contradictory testimony of "a white girl tramp" or that of Dr. H. H. Bridges, "a reputable local physician." One or the other had committed perjury, he said.

Negro Listens Intently.

Outside the courtroom, beyond earshot of the harsh things that were said about her, Victoria Price sat upon a high stool peering through the doorway with Jack Tiller, her present "boy friend," looking over her shoulder.

Patterson, a glimmer of everlasting hope in his almost expressionless face, listened more intently than at any other time since his trial opened.

At the prosecution table making notes sat the young Attorney General, Thomas E. Knight Jr., who expects to run for Lieutenant Governor when his present term expires. Now and then he smiled broadly as the New York attorney, better dressed than any other man in the courtroom, tried to convince the jury that the "city slicker" had been outmanoeuvred and outgeneraled by local talent.

Mr. Knight will have the last word tomorrow after G. W. Chamlee, an associate of Mr. Leibowitz, concludes the summation for the defense. After that Judge Callahan will charge the jury, send them out to begin their deliberations and begin selecting a new one to try Clarence Norris, another Negro defendant in the famous case.

Defense Wins a Point.

Just before the final arguments began, the defense won its first important victory in the legal fencing which has marked the case, when Judge Callahan refused to permit Major Joe Stearns, who commanded the National Guard detail assigned to the trials at Scottsboro, to tell the jury of an alleged confession by the Negroes while they were in the jail.

With the jury temporarily excused, Major Stearns denied that one of his men had bayonetted Roy Wright, 12-year-old defendant, or knocked out his front teeth. Nor had he asked Patterson or the other Negroes "where they wanted their bodies sent," he testified.

He admitted that he had not warned the Negroes when he took an Associated Press reporter to their cells that anything they said might be used against them. Although the alleged confession was kept from the jury's ears, the testimony which Patterson gave at his first trial at Scottsboro, accusing all but three of the nine Negroes under arrest, was allowed to remain in the record.

The defense did not fare so well in the morning session when Lester Carter, a white hobo, who was thrown from the train after a battle with the Negroes, took the stand. He was the star witness for the defense at Patterson's trial before Judge James E. Horton here last Spring.

Judge Rules Out Evidence.

This morning, however, Carter left the witness stand without having contributed much more than some expert testimony about the proper way to board and alight from a moving freight train.

Not a word of the graphic description he gave last Spring, of the romantic night he and Orville Gilley spent with the two girls in the hobo jungle near the freight yards in Chattanooga was permitted to creep onto the record of this trial.

Judge Callahan held it was immaterial where the girls spent the night before the alleged attack, or with whom they had been.

The defense merely asked the stenographer to add a few more exceptions to the court's ruling and proceeded in an attempt to show that the farmers who described the fight aboard the freight train as it rolled through Northern Alabama could not have seen as much as they declared.

Judge Callahan at one point in Carter's examination by Mr. Leibowitz remarked that it appeared to him like a "vicious attempt to put improper evidence before the jury."

Mr. Leibowitz immediately asked for a mistrial but was overruled.

Judge Callahan refused to wait for the promised appearance of a medical expert called by the defense and ordered the lawyers to proceed with their arguments, allotting two hours to each side.

Oversteps the Evidence.

Wade Wright, who urged last Spring's jury to show that Alabama justice was beyond the reach of "Jew money from New York," kept sectionalism out this time, but in his enthusiasm overstepped the evidence and had to apologize for saying that the Negroes tried "to choke Gilley to death."

In a voice that was heard in the halls of the Court House and on the lawn outside, Mr. Wright asked for the death penalty and ridiculed the central point of the defense.

"You can figger for yourself," he said, "how much Gilley and Victoria Price, that illiterate girl, knew about the Mann Act. I'd hate to say how old I was or how big I was before I ever heard of it. I'd hate to say how long I'd practiced law before I was familiar with the substance of that there law."

The State had provided corroboration for the Price woman's story, he said. It was contained in the testimony of "old brother Hill," the station agent at Paint Rock, who helped round up the Negroes, and in the testimony of white farmers along the railway who saw the girls "a'fixin to get out and being drug back."

Mr. Bailey, while urging the jury to "make the punishment fit the crime," said that Carter had "been breathing the atmosphere of that great metropolis" (New York) before he appeared to tell his story in court.

State Witnesses Attacked.

Mr. Leibowitz attacked the character of Victoria Price. She had lied about the reason why she went to Chattanooga, he asserted, and her story that she and Ruby Bates had started back to their homes in Huntsville without male escorts had been proved false by the State's own witness, Gilley.

The two girls, Gilley and even Carter who had appeared for the defense, Mr. Leibowitz said to the jury, were "bums," "loafers," "scum," upon whose word neither side could rely.

"Victoria Price," he said, "had told one story on one occasion and another whenever it suited her convenience. Even now, after it had been told seven times, it was so fantastic that if you came upon it in fiction you would toss the book away."

He attacked the State for failing to call Dr. Bridges, the physician who examined the girls less than two hours after they were taken from the train.

"What do you think of a prosecution which hides evidence like that?" he demanded, declaring that the State's case was "rotten from start to finish."

JUSTICE DENIED.

CONVICTION of one of the Scottsboro defendants in the third trial yesterday would seem even more terrible but for the hope that the United States Supreme Court will set aside the verdict as it did in the first trial. In the second trial the trial Judge himself threw out the verdict.

It is unthinkable that these Negro boys shall be executed on contradictory and discredited evidence. There was never anything but the flimsiest case against them. Since one of the two girls confessed that her earlier testimony was a lie, there has been no real case.

Judge Callahan's charge to this jury was so unfair that he even failed to tell the jurors how they might acquit until the defense counsel protested. The State's Attorney confessed that his own speech to the jury was "an appeal to passion."

It was a partisan trial drawn on the color line. Justice was denied by race [illegible]

Borough Workers' Unit Wires Judge To Free Negroes

Telegraphic protests to Judge W. W. Callahan and President Roosevelt demanding freedom for the Scottsboro defendants were forwarded last night by members of the Engdahl-Scottsboro branch of the International Labor Defense who met at 777 Gates Ave.

Both telegrams declared the opinion of "100 workers" for the immediate release of the defendants and the message to President Roosevelt urged him to "take immediate action against the Decatur lynch verdict."

Charge Class Rule

Robert Campbell, organizer of the branch, reviewed the action taken by the recent Baltimore Anti-Lynch Conference, in which a demand was made for the right of Negroes to carry arms for self-defense in terrorized districts.

Referring to the Scottsboro case, Campbell said, "This case is a direct outcome of imperialist class rule intending to terrorize into submission the oppressed Negro nation We as a workers' organization can expect no justice from the capitalists and their courts. Governor Rolph's statement in regard to the California lynching is an open sanction of lynch rule by State authorities."

$5,000 DAMAGE SUIT IS OUTGROWTH OF CAPT. WM. F. "RED" HYNES' RAID ON JOHN REED CLUB AND BLOC OF PAINTERS STUDIO FEB. 11

Witness to Raid Testifies That White Legionnaires Assisted Hynes Squad in Deliberate Destruction of Valuable Works of Art

LOS ANGELES, Calif., July 27.—(By Loren Miller for ANP)—Echoes of the world famous Scottsboro case were heard in a Los Angeles court room last week as Superior Judge J. A. Smith heard testimony in a law suit purporting to show that the notorious Los Angeles Red Squad, led by its captain, Wm. F. (Red) Hynes, destroyed paintings of the boys valued by the plaintiffs, the John Reed club and the Bloc of Painters, at more than $5000. The city is a co-defendant with Hynes.

The suit grew out of a raid staged last February 11 by Hynes and his men, assisted by white American Legionaires, of the John Reed club house, 1743 North New Hampshire avenue, where the paintings were on exhibition. A playlet, "Dawn in Manchuria," was being given at the time. The audience was driven out of the hall after which the plaintiffs charge the pictures were damaged.

Supporting their charge of police vandalism the plaintiffs exhibited pictures of the frescoes showing that some person or persons had deliberately poged holes thru each of the figures on a picture representing the nine boys and Mrs. Ada Wright. Another picture depicting a Negro boy with his head in a noose also drew the wrath of the vandals while still others depicting unity of whites and Negroes were badly damaged.

Connecting Capt. Hynes and his men with this amazing destruction, Harry Buchanan, attendant at the club house, testified that he was hidden in a closet through fear of the officers and saw them deliberately and systematically destroy the works of art.

Called to testify on behalf of the defendants, Capt. Paul Hoffman, white Legionaire, who betrayed his southern antecedents in a saft accented drawl, called the pictures portraying Negro exploitation and oppression "coarse, destructive, anti-social and uncouth," but insisted that he did not see the police destroy the pictures although he was present on the night in question. Hoffman also branded the John Reed club, of which Langston Hughes and other famous Negro writers are members, as a "bunch of renegades."

The pictures in question were painted by the Bloc of Painters, a group that works by using natural paints on wet plaster. After the work thus executed has dried it is very hard and well nigh imperishable.

Witnesses for the plaintiff gave it as their opinion that the work was of great artistic value and supported the contention that $5,000 damages was not an unusual sum.

SPECIAL TERM NOT LIKELY, JUDGE SAYS

Scottsboro Cases Probably Will Be Heard In Regular Fall Session

Advertiser

Montgomery Ala.

ATHENS, ALA., July 24.—(Special)—Judge James E. Horton said today that unless a special term of Morgan Circuit Court is called, an October date will be set for further trials in the Scottsboro case.

Returning from his vacation, Judge Horton said he would be occupied the next five or six weeks with other cases and that he had not had time to consider a special term for the trial of the nine negroes charged with attacking two white women.

Judge Horton said he had an open date on his calendar in September when the trials could be held on the docket of the regular Fall session.

Unless Chief Justice John C. Anderson, at Montgomery, designates another judge to sit in on the trials, Judge Horton said he would preside.

The jurist presided at the trial of Heywood Patterson, first of the defendants to be retried at Decatur last April under order of the United States Supreme Court.

Patterson was convicted a second time and again sentenced to death but last month Judge Horton set aside the jury's verdict and granted his motion for a new trial, holding in a lengthy opinion that "evidence in the case greatly preponderates in favor of the defendants."

The nine negroes are charged with attacking Mrs. Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, cotton mill workers, aboard a Southern Railway freight train in Jackson County, March 25, 1931, as the girls were hoboing their way to their home at Huntsville, Ala., from Chattanooga.

Seven of the negroes originally were convicted and sentenced to death at Scottsboor, while two were held to be juveniles.

Attorney General Silent On Judge Horton's Action

Advised yesterday of a press dispatch to the effect Judge James E. Horton of the Morgan Circuit Court has announced he will sit at retrial of the seven negro defendants in the "Scottsboro case," unless another judge is designated to preside by Chief Justice John C. Anderson, of the Alabama Supreme Court, Atty. Gen. Knight stated he had "no comment to make at this time."

Reports emanating from a reliable source were widely current some weeks ago that Judge Horton would very likely recuse himself in retrial of these cases, and that under all the circumstances he probably would do so. These reports persisted and were neither denied nor confirmed by Judge Horton, whose first expression on the subject was made public yesterday.

Although Atty. Gen. Knight has said nothing that would indicate his plans, it is believed he will move to have the trials of the negroes held some time in August or early in September, as official business will require his presence in Washington, D. C., in October.

During that month, action brought by the State of Alabama challenging the validity of the Hawes-Cooper Act of Congress giving to the States authority to prohibit shipment interstate of convict made goods, will be submitted to the U. S. Supreme Court. The Attorney General will represent the State in the case before that tribunal.

NEGROES' RELEASE SOUGHT

A move to raise $40,000 in bond pledges to obtain the release from jail of the nine Negroes held in the Scottsboro attack case, was launched here Tuesday by George W. Chamlee International Labor Defense League lawyer.

Chamlee exhibited a copy of a petition which he expects to place in circulation to secure the names of bondsmen.

All of the Negroes, two of them from Chattanooga, were under death sentences for alleged attack on two white girls in a freight car near Scottsboro, Ala., until previous convictions were reversed by the United States Supreme Court. They have beenconfined for more than two years and are at present in theBirmingham jail.

Chamlee said the court had fixed no bond for the negroes and that he does not know if it would be accepted if it is raised.

Cordele, Ga. Dispatch

A plan to raise a $40,000 bond for the Scottsboro negroes is foolish. The negroes do not know enough to care much what happens in that regard and they have no idea at all what the fuss is all about or who is running the campaign.

A SECOND CHANCE FOR ALABAMA

Alabama, restive under the criticisms of its justice in the famous Scottsboro cases, yesterday in another case involving the deepest emotions of the white race in criminal justice took steps to see to it that the Negroes involved shall have no complaint nor any others just cause for criticism in the conduct of the trial.

In this case a very real and ugly crime has unquestionably been committed. A white woman was clubbed to death in a wooded section after, it is charged, she had been assaulted. Two Negroes and a Negro boy, who is being tried separately in juvenile court, are charged with the crime.

To the credit of Alabama, the court has appointed a well-known criminal lawyer and former president of the State bar association to defend the Negroes. Negroes have joined white men in opposing the entry into this case of attorneys of the International Labor Defense, radical organization which provided the defense in the Scottsboro cases. Both races seem to feel that however useful that organization may have been in securing justice in the earlier case that its usefulness has ended in Alabama.

It will be easier to determine how well Alabama has learned its lesson as this trial proceeds but certain an excellent beginning has been made by providing the best Southern attorneys to defend the Negroes. Outsiders may serve to point Southern injustice but Southern justice can only be truly created by Southerners themselves. It is to be hoped that the present case will be as important in establishing a new justice, freed of prejudice, as the earlier case was important in making raw prejudice apparent for the evil that it is.

Brunswick, Ga. News

DILLY-DALLING WITH JUSTICE

The elasticity of the laws of this country are, in a great measure, responsible for the loss of proper respect for the courts. It is a common occurrence, not only in this state, but in other states, for violent cases of crime to be delayed and bickered with until, worn out in court or the main witnesses die or become removed so far from the reach of the law, criminals succeed in escaping from penalties of justice.

In the cases of a dozen young negroes, who committed a most henious crime, at Scottsboro, Alabama; perpetrated upon two helpless white girls, the avenues of the courts have been so stretched as to enable the lawyers in these cases to secure new trials from court to court. In each instance, these negroes were convicted of the crime with which they were charged and death sentences were imposed by the court. However, their cases were carried to the Supreme Court of the United States for review and on technical grounds, new trials were ordered to be held by the courts of Alabama. One of the principals in the case disappeared when one of the trials was held, but later she returned and turned former evidence, declaring that she and her ally had framed the negro boys; but on cross examination it was clearly shown that the girl was testifying for financial consideration, and her evidence failed to impress the jury or the court. One or more of the boys have been convicted for the third time and are now being held in jail pending the trial of the whole number. A new feature in the case has developed on the part of interested parties, who are making an effort to raise $40,000 for bonds in order that these negroes may be released from jail with the hopes that they may escape and be kept in hiding to avoid trial. Such dilatory methods on the part of the courts is bound to bring on a resentment from the people that may result in a serious crime of enforcing the lynch law.

Not only these assault cases, but other criminal cases, in various states, are allowed to be dallied with in the courts that will sooner or later cause an uprising of sentiment of resentment that will bring on an outbreak against the laws and the courts of the country.—Athens Banner-Herald.

SCOTTSBORO CASE IS YEAR'S IMPORTANT ONE

Civil Liberties Union, in Report, Says It Is Biggest Legal Win.

SOUTH IN AREA OF SUPPRESSION

Mass., Mich., and Ill. Are Cited.

NEW YORK.—The most important legal victory of the year relating to civil liberties, according to the [illegible] Civil Liberties Union, was the Supreme Court reversal of the convictions of the Scottsboro boys on the grounds that the trial court had not permitted them adequate counsel.

8-12-33

"The case," says the report, "has become a symbol throughout the world of [illegible] justice [illegible] the South legally, it has [illegible] effectively for the first time the exclusion of Negroes from juries." Noted as significant, also, was the decision of Federal District Judge James Lowell at Boston refusing extradition to Virginia of George Crawford with murder, on the ground of exclusion of colored persons from juries.

Suppression Areas

The worst areas of suppression in the United States are designated by the union as the Illinois coal fields where warfare between two rival unions has produced "the most threatening state of violence in the country"; the Los Angeles district; the South wherever issues of race conflict or radicalism arise; the unorganized coal fields; Pennsylvania industrial towns; Chicago and a few suburbs; industrial centers like Dearborn, Mich., Lawrence, Mass., and a score more, chiefly in the textile and needle trades.

Chief among the campaigns for civil liberties undertaken by the union were: for free speech public meeting places in leading cities; against illegal raids on aliens and deportations for opinion; against censorship of the radio, movies and by the post office; for state anti-injunction laws; for the release of political prisoners; against restrictions on academic freedom in schools and colleges; against the police third degree; and for civil rights for American Indians and in American colonies. Special committees of the union promote each of these activities. Local civil liberties committees are organized in fourteen states or cities where issues arise most frequently.

Among notable cases listed by the union during the year are:

Decision of the U.S. Supreme Court reversing the conviction of the Scottsboro, Alabama boys; the refusal of the Governor of New Jersey to extradite to Georgia Robert Elliott Burns, fugitive from a chain gang, and the refusal of the Governor of Kentucky to oust a jailer from whose custody a white man had been taken and lynched.

Officers

The officers of the Civil Liberties Union are: Dr. Harry F. Ward of New York, chairman; Helen Phelps Stokes of Vermont, James H. Maurer of Pennsylvania, Fremont Older of California, vice-chairmen; B. W. Huebsch, treasurer; Roger N. Baldwin, director; Arthur Garfield Hays and Morris L. Ernest, counsel; Lucille B. Miller, secretary, and Edmund D. Campbell, Washington counsel.

Heywood Patterson Granted New Trial

The granting of a new trial to Heywood Patterson by Judge Horton at Athens, Thursday, June 22, did not come as a surprise to the hundreds of citizens throughout the Tennessee Valley, when following the conviction of Patterson at Decatur back in April, the same trial judge wiltered under fire and granted an indefinite continuance of the trials of the seven additional negroes, involved in the attack alleged to have been made on a one Victoria Price and a one Ruby Bates, approximately two years ago near Scottsboro. Almost immediately following the incident that happened near Scottsboro, Patterson along with other negroes was tried before a jury of 12 reputable citizens of Scottsboro and sentenced to death. The same negro Patterson was again tried before 12 reputable citizens in Morgan County in April and sentenced to death.

Now we do not know where or when the negroes involved in the Scottsboro tragedy will be tried. Following such decisions as made by Judge Horton in the Patterson case, what happens? Three negroes are indicted by a grand jury at Tuscaloosa for murder, they being charged wit[illegible] criminal assualting and then murdering a young white girl. The same grand jury that found indictments against the negroes at Tuscaloosa, also indicted three young white boys for an unlawful assembly riot and conspiracy to commit a felony, it being said such boys were leaders of a mob who stormed the Tuscaloosa jail with the view of hanging the negroes involved. However, it developed the negroes alleged to have been involved in first criminally assaulting and then murdering the young Tuscaloosa girl had been transferred to the Jefferson County jail for safe keeping.

It is well that the International Labor Defense did nit send to Athens last week a one "Leibowitz" known as a leader of the council representing the negroes involved in the Scottsboro tragedy, and we do not know of any suggestion that could be any better taken than for the said Leibowitz to never make his appearance on soil in North Alabama again, defending the Scottsboro negroes or otherwise, and here is why we offer such suggestion.

Following the second conviction of Patterson at Decatur, who was tried before 12 capable and worthy citizens of Morgan county, here is what Leibowitz had to say shortly thereafterwards in New York, regarding the verdict rendered by said jury:

"If you ever saw trose bigots whose mouths are slits in their faces, whose eyes pop out at you like frogs, whose chins drip tobacco juice, bewhiskered and filthy, you would not ask how they could do it."

THE "SCOTTSBORO CASE"

The decision of the Alabama trial judge who sentenced to death one of the negroes in the famous "Scottsboro case," to give the defendant a new trial will be very generally received as strong confirmation of the judgment regarding this case which has been formed and widely expressed by citizens of other states.

The Alabama judge has now held that the testimony of the prosecutrix in recent trial was not corroborated and "bears on its face indications of improbability and is contradicted by other evidence." It will be recalled that at this second trial of this case one of the two chief state's witnesses repudiated her former testimony insofar as it concerned the crime with which these negroes were charged.

This case, in which nine negro youths were tried and all but one sentenced to death for the alleged rape of two young white girls, has aroused an unusual amount of interest outside of Alabama, and various written comments concerning it by persons who had apparently made a careful study of all the circumstances have created in the minds of most impartial citizens a grave degree of doubt as to the seriousness of the crime, if any, that was committed. Judge Horton's recent decision will therefore be received with a genuine feeling of relief by most citizens of the country. For it seems to make it almost impossible for these defendants to be forced to suffer the death penalty for this affair.

Scottsboro Case Again.

Setting aside the second conviction of the colored boy, Howard Patterson, at Scottsboro, Ala., by Judge James F. Horton who tried the case, is a sign that the light of reason is beginning to break on the Southern legal system, as applied to cases in which whites and Negroes are involved. The Patterson boy was convicted and sentenced to death with eight other colored youths. The charge was assault on two white women. One of the alleged victims denied the assault, and repudiated the story told by her companion. A conviction of this character and for such a crime, on the unsupported testimony of an alleged victim, and with her testimony repudiated by the woman who accompanied her, offends the spirit and letter of the law and is repugnant to human reason. So Judge Horton, who tried the case, reversed the jury's action and Alabama will re-try the youths.

But before the Alabama judge acted, the United States Supreme Court had quashed the Patterson conviction, and given the colored youth another chance for his life. The defense was in the hands of Lawyer Samuel Leibowitz, of this borough, who contemplated another appeal to the Supreme Court at Washington, on the ground that the Alabama discrimination against Negroes on a jury was unconstitutional and void. The action taken by Judge Horton, however, makes the appeal to Washington unnecessary, and the issue raised by Mr. Leibowitz is not likely to be determined for the present.

NEGROES IN SCOTTSBORO CASE FARE WELL IN JAIL

Inspection By Newspaper Men Shows No Basis For Charges From New York Of Mistreatment; Food Good; Quarters Comfortable

Three newspaper men, after personal interviews with each of the nine Negroes in the Scottsboro case and personal inspection of their cells and sampling of their food, agreed Monday there was no basis for a statement carried in an Associated Press dispatch from New York last Friday quoting the National Committee for Defense of Political Prisoners, who charged it had information that the prisoners were being flogged daily in Jefferson County Jail and otherwise mistreated.

The investigators included members of the staffs of The Birmingham Age-Herald, The Birmingham News and an official of the Alabama Association of the Associated Press.

So far as could be determined in Birmingham no effort had been made to verify or disprove the charge before the dispatch was sent out from New York.

Conditions Described

Six of the Negroes were in a day cell, and they explained they also were permitted to exercise in an open air court.

Three were in individual cells, each containing four cots, where they were placed last Friday after they had staged a disorderly scene in a large day cell, trying to persuade the warden to whip them.

The standing rule at the jail is "lay no hand on the Scottsboro Negroes." This is verified by trusties questioned without knowledge of jail authorities.

All of the Negroes who would talk to the investigators denied loudly that they had been beaten up by wardens.

In reply to similar questions asked the other Negroes, Andy Wright, who was in an cell alone, said that he was feeling all right, that he got plenty of food but had lost about 20 pounds, having weighed, he said, 190 pounds when arrested. Officials said he had not been weighed at all. The food he received, he said, was all right. When asked if any of the wardens had ever beaten him up, he said he had nothing more to say on that subject.

Charlie Weems, in an adjoining cell, said he was feeling well, and had been treated alright.

Roy Wright, in the next cell, said he did not want to talk.

The cells in which the Negroes sleep were measured and found to be 10 feet 11¾ inches by seven feet 6½ inches.

The exercise court, to which the prisoners are given access from the day cell, is a large room, measuring 54 feet long and about 20 feet wide, affording light and air. The six Scottsboro Negroes placed together had taken advantage of the facilities of this room Monday, playing a form of ball.

The food menu for Sunday which jail officials said was served to the Scottsboro Negroes and all other prisoners at the jail, included the following items: For breakfast, bread made of flour, lard and other ingredients, white meat, rice, sugar, coffee, cream, milk, syrup and eggs; for dinner, meal bread, white meat, sugar, Irish potatoes, roast beef and dressing, milk, peas, cabbage, onions and vinegar; for supper, flour bread, white meat, sugar, cream, evaporated apples, butter milk, sweet milk, grits and salmon. This menu was picked at random from the daily record.

The Monday menu varied slightly, but was wholesome and tasty to the investigators who sampled it.

Sanitary conditions in the jail are the most modern.

The only times any of the nine Negroes have been injured have been when they have fought among themselves.

An Honest Judge.

The opinion of Judge HORTON in setting aside the verdict of guilty against one of the Negroes in the Scottsboro case should do much to increase public confidence in the courts. His analysis of the evidence makes it clear that it was not sufficient to warrant the finding of the jury. No man's life should be taken away on the uncorroborated testimony of a woman of loose life who is reputed to be unchaste. As the Judge truly said, "History, sacred and profane, and the common experience of mankind teaches that women of the character shown in this case are prone for selfish reasons to make false accusations both of rape and of insult upon the slightest provocation, or even without provocation, for ulterior purposes." If the defendant in this prosecution had been a white man, if no racial animosity or prejudice had been involved, it is unlikely that the jury would have found as it did.

The original conviction of the accused Negroes was on testimony superficially more persuasive. Since then, however, one of the most important witnesses for the prosecution has recanted. If the defendants had had adequate counsel the flimsiness of the State's case might even then have become apparent. The United States Supreme Court ordered a new trial on the ground that the defendants had been substantially denied their constitutional right to adequate counsel. The trial Judge now sets aside the verdict in the first of the retrials on the ground that the conviction violates elementary principles of justice. Against the background of prejudice, demagogy and recrimination provoked by this affair, the sanity and courage of Judge HORTON stand out in bold relief.

WHEN the famous Scottsboro cases were before the court at Decatur a few weeks ago there was much talk, in newspapers and elsewhere, because an attorney from New York criticized the method of selecting juries in Alabama. This was regarded as an intrusion upon and interference with states' rights, held sacred by all southerners, and all true Alabamians, native or adopted, resented it. Now bear in mind that New Yorkers have as much right to tell Alabama how to select a jury as Alabamians have to tell New Yorkers what they can or can not drink. What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. If we believe in states' rights for ourselves we should be willing to grant it to others.

THE SCOTTSBORO CASE

The Scottsboro, Alabama, case which has filled many columns of newspaper space and has attracted the sympthetic attention of millions of readers has entered ,upon another phase. The verdict of guilty against Haywood Patterson, one of the Negroes, who were accused of attacking white women, has been set aside by Circuit Judge James E. Horton, who has ordered a new trial. Last Palm Sunday Judge Horton sentenced Patterson to death in the electric chair, in accordance with the mandate of the jury. He has now held that the verdict of the jury was against the weight of evidence.

Judge Horton holds that the unsupported word of Mrs. Victoria Price, victim of an attack which it was alleged took place on March 25, 1931, aboard a Southern Railway freight train, was insufficient evidence on which to condemn a man to death. The Price woman's story, his Honor says, not only contains contradictions itself but was flatly contradicted by the testimony of Ruby Bates, the other victim of the assault, who testified for the defense at Decatur that the whole case was "a frame-up." The Judge pointed out also that at the first trial in Scottsboro Orville Gilley, a white hobo, who it was claimed was an eye-witness on the freight train, was not called by the State, although he was then in custody.

Patterson, who is in jail in Birmingham, Ala., with his eight co-defendants, has twice been convicted and sentenced to death. The court's action now calls for a third trial. Of the nine Negroes originally arrested eight were convicted at the first trial. In the case of Roy Wright, the ninth, a juvenile, the jury disagreed. The Supreme Court of Alabama later set aside the verdict against Eugene Williams on the ground that he, too, was a juvenile. Appeals were taken in the cases of the other seven defndants to th United States Supreme Court, which last November ordered new trials.

There is grave doubt in the heart of every honest man whether the defendants to the United States Su- charged, and as they were tried and convicted by a jury of white men, without having any of their own race in the body which convicted them, every opportunity should be given them to prove their innocense before a fair and impartial tribunal.

Confidence in American courts is renewed by the decision of Judge Horton of Alabama in granting a new trial, his third ordeal to Haywood Patterson, one of the Scottsboro defendants.

In the second trial negroes were excluded from the panel and prosecuting officers behaved in a manner to prejudice the jury. Judge Horton in granting a third trial maintains the second which resulted in Patterson's conviction was unfair. The defendant was convicted on unsupported testimony of a woman witness that she had been attacked.

Intervention by the United States Supreme Court, which decided that the first trial had been held under m o b psychology, brought about the second trial which apparently was conducted under equally disgraceful conditions. Americans have reason to be thankful for preservation of their most cherished ideals by rulings like those of Judge Horton. Legalized lynching is what the Alabama mob wants.

Scottsboro In Reverse.

In addition to lynchings there have been in the state in the past several gruesome executions of negroes falsely accused of the capital crime against white women.

In these cases the evidence may be nothing but a scintilla, but if the prisoner be identified by the prosecutrix, his defense goes out the window and once the jury gets together the death sentence is voted in a jiffy. Such is the horror of this crime in the south generally that every such case needs the most careful watch lest it run into judicial murder.

Such watchfulness in one case has resulted in the parole of one Jeff Morrow, who was convicted and sentenced to the electric chair on what Judge Grady, who presided at his trial, called evidence so weak that he made an almost direct appeal to the jury for an acquittal, but without effect. He intervened with Governor Gardner, who commuted the death sentence, and now Governor Ehringhaus has set an innocent man at liberty after he has served some two years in prison.

Pardon, commutation, or parole is logically a slight recompense for the injustice of an unfair trial, but at any rate it is good to know that even in such a case it is possible to avoid the major penalties.

In the matter of Jeff Morrow we see Scottsboro in reverse.—Raleigh Times.

SCOTTSBORO NEGRO SEEKS NEW TRIAL

Judge Horton Hears Arguments For Patterson In Athens Court Today

Advertiser
6-22-33

ATHENS, ALA., June 21.—(AP)—The scene in the "Scottsboro case" shifts to this little North Alabama town tomorrow as Judge James E. Horton hears arguments for a new trial for Heywood Patterson, first of the nine negro defendants to face retrial.

Patterson was convicted and his punishment fixed at death in a trial at Decatur under a change of venue from Jackson County in April.

Montgomery, Ala.

His attorneys, headed by George W. Chamlee, Sr., of Chattanooga, have filed a petition for a new trial, alleging "mob sentiment" prevented a fair trial, absence of negroes from the jury panel was a violation of his constitutional rights and that statements of one of the prosecutors of "Jew money from New York" was prejudicial.

The petition also holds that the refusal of Atty. Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., to address a negro with "Mister" constituted grounds for a new trial.

The hearing on the motion was set for Athens because the other division of Circuit Court was in session at Decatur at this time.

Patterson was the first of the nine negroes to be tried in Jackson Circuit Court in April, 1931, and the first to be convicted of an alleged attack on two white girl hoboes aboard a Southern Railway freight train, March 25, 1931.

Seven of the others were subsequently sentenced to death and the sentences of Patterson and six others were confirmed by the Alabama Supreme Court on March 24, 1932. The seventh death sentence was reversed on the grounds that the defendant, Eugene Williams, was a juvenile. The United States Supreme Court reversed the other sentences.

Attorneys for the negroes have laid a predicate for a new appeal to the United States Supreme Court for Patterson, in event a new trial is denied and the Alabama Supreme Court affirms the judgment of the lower court. Trials of the others have not been set.

NEW TRIAL FOR SCOTTSBORO BOY

In granting a new trial for Haywood Patterson and the language used by the court at the time very clearly showed that the State has no case against the nine Scottsboro boys who have been languishing in jail and in the death cell for more than two years.

St Louis Argus

What ought to be done now is for the prosecutor of Morgan county to forthwith enter a nolle prosse in the case of the nine boys. If, however, the cases are not disposed of in this manner, then, of course, the defense attorneys will file habeas corpus proceedings demanding the immediate release of the boys, because if the evidence is no stronger than what was introduced in the Haywood Patterson case by the State, then all the boys should be free. Since everybody now knows that Haywood Patterson was convicted on flimsy and contradictory evidence, which has been admitted by an officer of the State, sitting in the capacity of a judge in the person of Judge James E. Horton, any further pushing of the case on the part of the State can't but be regarded as "persecution" rather than an honest endeavor to prosecute for violation of the law.

St Louis Mo.

We are told that Atty.-Gen'l. Thos. E. Knight, Jr., is determined to push the cases against the boys, evidence or no evidence of their guilt. In fact, we understand that he is mad about Judge Horton's decision and is ranting like a hyena. When a fellow in the Attorney-General's position gets mad in handling a case, it's a pretty good sign that he's most likely to do the wrong thing; like the old saying. "Whom the gods destroy, they first make mad." If the Attorney-General is mad, it means more expense to the State for nothing, except the continued unfavorable publicity. It further means additional expense to the defense. It means that the case will go to the State Supreme Court and finally to the United States Supreme Court where the death knell will be sounded on the whole farcical trial of the nine Scottsboro boys, including the expose of the Alabama nefarious system of excluding Negroes from the jury panel.

6-30-33

There is no doubt as to what the United States Supreme Court will do in the cases should they reach that tribunal and as Judge Lowell said in the Crawford case, "Eventually—why not now?" In other words if these cases are to be eventually thrown out of court, why not nolle prosse the cases now and be through with it, thereby saving expense to the State and to the defendants.

THE SCOTTSBORO MESS

Indianapolis Recorder

Recent press dispatches to this newspaper contained the totally unexpected information that a new trial for Haywood Patterson, one of the Scottsboro youths, has been granted by the trial judge.

Patterson, it will be recalled, was indicted in 1931 with eight other boys on charges of criminally attacking two white women of allegedly loose character.

7-1-33

Unlike his unfortunate associates in the famous case, Patterson was twice convicted on the charges filed against him.

But for the rugged honesty of purpose and fighting qualities brought into play in his behalf by defense attorneys, this boy, together with the other youths, would perhaps have been disposed of via the electric chair in rapid Alabama fashion many months ago.

It is fortunate for the nine ignorant Scottsboro youths that the the treacherous tactics being whole civilized world is watching brought to hear by enemies of justice and fairplay to rob them of their human rights.

Intelligent Americans of both races in every walk of life are aroused of the necessity of protesting against any plan that might for its purpose an intentional miscarriage of justice in the Scottsnot ignor this tremendous expression of widespread public sentiment by sacrificing these helpless youths of the race on its altar of iniquitons race prejudice and one-sided system of administering its laws.

To antagonize this rapidly crystalizing demand for a better and squarer deal for our people in the courts and elsewhere, would be to develop a world contempt for the judicial system of that state that even Alabama could ill afford.

Granting of the new trial to the Patterson youth therefore, was to have been expected.

It was a result of the strong pressure brought to bear by the American public for more of justice and less of hypocrisy and debased politics in Alabama.

It remains now to be seen what disposition will be made of this boy's case with not a single citizen of the race on the trial jury.

ASK NEW TRIAL FOR PATTERSON

Petition Claims, Among Other Things, Race Prejudice Blocked Fair Trial

Contentions that mob sentiment and prejudice prevented a fair trial, form the basis of the petition for a new trial for Heywood Patterson, one of nine negro defendants in the "Scottsboro case" which will be argued at Athens, Ala., Thursday.

Copies of the petition have been filed with Atty. Gen. Thomas E Knight, Jr., chief of the prosecution staff, by defense counsel, and were made public Tuesday.

The petition sets forth that negroes were barred from the jury rolls, that Solicitor Wade Wright injected religious prejudice in his argument to the jury by referring to "Jew money from New York," and that mob sentiment prevailed. Another ground was that Knight refused to call a negro witness "mister" in addressing him.

Patterson was convicted a second time on April 9, palm Sunday, and by coincidence the second anniversary of his first death sentence, after a trial that lasted a week.

The negro with eight others was indicted in Jackson circuit court in March, 1931, on charges of attacking two white girl hoboes aboard a Southern railway freight train.

Trials of six of the others under United States supreme court reversal of previous convictions, were indefinitely postponed by Judge James E. Horton, after a statement attributed to Samuel Leibowitz, chief of defense counsel, published in a Decatur paper.

THE SCOTTSBORO REVERSAL

The verdict of guilty returned in April against Haywood Patterson, first of the Scottsboro Negroes to be tried after the Supreme Court had ordered new trials for them all on the ground that they had been inadequately represented by counsel, bore on the face of it every mark of a miscarriage of justice. It was evident that the members of the Decatur jury had allowed their judgment to be swayed by the racial prejudice in which this case has been tragically enmeshed. Circuit Judge James E. Horton's action in setting aside this verdict and ordering a new trial will consequently be everywhere greeted with relief. During the Decatur trial he gave every evidence of his determination to maintain the highest standards of judicial procedure regardless of the local feeling against the accused; in his present decision that the jury's verdict was against the weight of evidence he has given an even more striking demonstration of his single-minded devotion to justice. At the same time it was an act demanding courage of the highest order. Judge Horton has proved himself a judge of which any State would be proud. Alabama should be deeply grateful to him.

The Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America said:

"The issues involved in the Scottsboro case are neither local nor sectional . . . The whole nation is concerned. Race prejudice is not limited to any section or state. The treatment of Negro citizens almost anywhere in America brings us all to shame."

No! The question is not local or sectional. It is not even limited to the nation. The question is racial. Nor will that question ever be solved by babying the negro race. That race must work out its problems in fear and trembling just as the white race has done in thousands of years of travail.

It is manifestly impossible to elevate the negro race to the standard of the white. Our best people wish that it might be possible for mankind to find a short cut to the will-to-be-above. Unfortunately—or perhaps fortunately—each individual, whether white or black, must evolve slowly by patient, individual effort.

Thus must the negro race rise. The problem then harks back to the lowly black man. The white race can not be vitally concerned. That dominant race may make it easier for the black man, but the long, the hard, the desperate struggle is for the negro race itself; nor can we benefit an alien blood by ill-timed sentimental sophistry in which unfortunately many people at the North indulge.

The problem that confronts the black race, begun with the writing of "Uncle Tom's Cabin,'' was not in reality solved there. That problem is now in its beginnings.

Thousands of years of struggle are behind the white race.

The black race must go through that struggle ere it may overcome in even the slightest degree so-called sectional prejudice.

It is struggle that make a great people—not sentiment; not easy paths; not flowery beds of roses; crutches.

All that can be done is being done for the negro. They must work out their own problems — fulfill their own destinies. This they may eventually do; but not without struggle; not without time.

The fact is that the negro race in the South is treated with far more sympathetic consideration than the so-called "white trash." If northern races call the negro "mister," they do not always feed them; they do not always feel down deep in their hearts for them in their lowly estate. And they sometimes turn against them with deeper resentment than the South race has ever done.

The South is giving the negro race its chance. That race must take advantage of it by wise cooperation and lowly mien.

For life is a struggle—a struggle for existence. A struggle in which the white race is engaged. It is a tremendous task for the dominant race. And only the most fit shall survive.

U. S. Rabbis Term Trial At Scottsboro 'Injustice'

Hitler Regime 'Peace Threat,' Convention Is Told

MILWAUKEE, June 23 (AP).—Citing the Scottsboro Negro trial as an example of "social and racial injustice" and the rule of Chancellor Adolf Hitler in Germany as a "threat to world peace," commission reports offered at the convention of the Central Conference of American Rabbis today urged Jews to give their best thought to these problems.

Rabbi Edward L. Israel, of Baltimore, read the report of the Conference Committee on Social Justice. It condemned "conditions existing in several sections of our land which seem to offer evidence of the inability of the Negro to secure economic or civil justice."

The subject was the outgrowth of a rift between a congregation in Montgomery, Ala., and its rabbi over the rabbi's expressions and acthivities in the Scottsboro case.

Rabbi Morris Newfield, of Birmingham, Ala., president of the conference, deplored a lack of unity of American Jewry in meeting the problems created by Hitler's anti-Semitic activities.

JUSTICE.

JUDGE HORTON, of Athens, Ala., has granted a new and third trial to Haywood Patterson, the first of the Scottsboro defendants.

The second trial was obtained through intervention by the United States Supreme Court, which found the first mob-dominated trial unfair and in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution preventing States from depriving "any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

In the second trial the jury law was administered to exclude Negroes from the panel, and the State Attorneys conducted themselves in such a way as to prevent impartial consideration of evidence by the jury.

Despite the testimony of two of the three major witnesses that the criminal assault case was a frame-up, and despite repudiation of her testimony by one of the alleged victims, Patterson was sentenced to death on the questionable testimony of a woman witness.

In granting a third trial Judge Horton held that the second conviction was on "insufficient evidence."

The Judge Horton and the Supreme Court rulings and others of that type go far in restoring confidence in American courts.

Judge Horton's Opinion In The Scottsboro Case

Judge James E. Horton commanded the nation's respect for himself and for the courts of Alabama by his irreproachable conduct of the trial of the so-called Scottsboro case at Decatur. Whatever the opinions of people anywhere on other aspects of the Heywood Patterson trial, there was nothing but praise for Judge Horton's own part in it, and deservedly so.

Now Judge Horton, in his act of granting the motion for a new trial for Patterson and in his accompanying opinion, has given cause for still greater respect for himself, if that were possible, and for the courts of this state, in the eyes of the nation and of the world.

In this highly important opinion, Judge Horton exemplifies the courage, the wisdom and the conscientious devotion to duty, truth and justice which are so essential to the proper performance of judicial duties. His opinion is important in many respects; but probably its greatest value lies in the fact that his discussion of the law and the evidence in the case, the forthright manner in which he cuts through the maze of confusions, is calculated to clear the public mind as to the fundamental and essential points to be kept in view in trying these cases and doing simple justice by the defendants.

Noble And Fearless

Judge Horton's decision granting a new trial to Haywood Patterson, recently convicted as one of the "Scottsboro Boys," will serve a useful purpose. It will clarify the situation for the benefit of thoughtful persons at home and abroad.

Also, it will add to the reputation Judge Horton already enjoys for unflinching courage. Whatever may have been the opinion of Alabamians touching the guilt of these Negroes, the fact remains that the only feeling which can now be reasonably manifested in this state is that of heightened respect for a judge who recognizes no let or hindrance to the fulfillment of the demands of his conscience as the dispenser of justice under the forms of law.

We should be happy that this noble and fearless judge has taken a step which gives the Scottsboro cases a new aspect. Outside Alabama, well-balanced people are given indisputable proof that our courts are not engines of ruthless injustice to the Negro. Judge Horton has made it impossible for any fair-minded observer anywhere to lend a credulous ear to the malignant lies which have been broadcast on this score.

The good opinion of mankind is not to be sneezed at, as Thomas Jefferson made clear in the Declaration of Independence. Alabama's judicial system of justice is entitled to that good opinion in the light of Judge Horton's action, in the light, particularly, of the grounds upon which he based that action. And citizens of Alabama have every reason to felicitate themselves that what they have known all along has now been given such striking exemplification.

CLEARING A MYSTERY

Editor The Advertiser:

In your editorial entitled, "Was It All In Fun?" you do me an injustice. I have never been more serious. I am a 100 per cent Southerner, having lived in Alabama all my life, and am descended from a long line of illustrious Southerners. My ancestor, John Beastly, came to Georgia with General Oglethorpe's distinguished company, preferring America to Newgate. Beastly was a great man, and by the approved method of gouging out the Indians' eyes in order to obtain their land, and by sagacious trading among his fellows, soon rose to wealth and power. His son, Col. I. L. D. Beastly, distinguished himself on the American side in the Revolution. Being actuated solely by patriotic motives, and a desire to punish America's enemies he ruthlessly plundered the Tories, thereby increasing the Beastly fortune and adding luster to the great name of Beastly. The fortune was lost by a later Beastly, but he was in no wise an inferior person, but the victim of circumstance. He borrowed his neighbor's horse, and came to Alabama, where by dint of hard labor (on the part of his slaves) he established himself as a substantial citizen. With this heritage of greatness behind me, how could I be otherwise than serious in the denunciation of the belled buzzards, who must have been attracted to Alabama by some decomposed matter—could it have been the putrid odor of Scottsboro?

I do not think that the 12 jurors at Scottsboro or Decatur thought they were sentencing innocent men to burn. It seems to me that they did not think at all—and I heartily agree with them. I do not presume to know more about the case than the jury or The Advertiser, only more than Judge Horton and the Supreme Court.

THE "SCOTTSBORO CASE"

The decision of the Alabama trial judge who sentenced to death one of the negroes in the famous "Scottsboro case," to give the defendant a new trial will be very generally received as strong confirmation of the judgment regarding this case which has been formed and widely expressed by citizens of other states.

The Alabama judge has now held that the testimony of the prosecutrix in recent trial was not corroborated and "bears on its face indications of improbability and is contradicted by other evidence." It will be recalled that at this second trial of this case one of the two chief state's witnesses repudiated her former testimony insofar as it concerned the crime with which these negroes were charged.

This case, in which nine negro youths were tried and all but one sentenced to death for the alleged rape of two young white girls, has aroused an unusual amount of interest outside of Alabama and various written comments concerning it by persons who had apparently made a careful study of all the circumstances have created in the minds of most impartial citizens a grave degree of doubt as to the seriousness of the crime if any, that was committed. Judge Horton's recent decision will therefore be received with a genuine feeling of relief by most citizens of the country. For it seems to make it almost impossible for these defendants to be forced to suffer the death penalty for this affair.

Justified

(Somerset Messenger-Gazette)

To a layman it is somewhat confusing that Circuit Court Judge James E. Horton of Alabama should set aside the findings of a jury in a lower court. It is a common belief that the law of a case may be reviewed by a higher court, but that a jury is the final judge of fact. The jury in the Scottsboro case found the negro Patterson guilty of attack from the evidence submitted to it. Judge Horton, in reviewing the case, found this evidence insufficient. In fact he declared the evidence to be worthless.

To many who do not feel the passions of the rural South, Judge Horton's way out of what seemed an embarrassing situation will be welcome, however, whether it is justified by law or not. It was somewhat ironic that at the time we were holding protest meetings in behalf of Jews in Germany, who were being denied their constitutional rights, a ~~negro in~~ Alabama should be convicted of attack on evidence which we could not believe would imprison any white man.

The case simmered down to a point where Patterson was sentenced to death on the bare story of one white woman, and part of her story was frightfully weak. Her companion in the misadventure denied the truth of the story in the second trial. All other evidence, including that of a physician, seemed to favor Patterson. The state's witness was, according to testimony, of doubtful character.

In voiding the conviction Judge Horton does what many believe is the right and just thing. Possibly it goes to show that there is a higher court than any we have set up by law.

Trail of the Lyncher, 1906---1933

By LOUIS COLMAN

Daily Worker
8-31-33
New York

JOHN TEMPLE GRAVES, II, is an editorial writer for the Birmingham (Ala.) Age-Herald. He is the Alabama editorial correspondent for the New York Times.

In this capacity, he has been one of the most zealous of the representatives of the Southern white landlords and industrialists in screaming for the lynching of the Scottsboro boys. He has been a staunch defender of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. He has screamed, like the N.A.A.C.P., that the International Labor Defense must get out of Alabama, and leave the courts to carry out their lynchings and frame-ups assisted by Southern lawyers and the N.A.A.C.P., undisturbed.

Mr. Graves' latest comment on lynching appears in the New York ...es, August 20, in connection with ...ynching in Tuscaloosa of Dan ...n, Jr., and A. T. Harden. Mr ...es deprecates this lynching but ...nces interesting reasons.

...nasmuch as the Negroes at ...aloosa had refused to accept ...D. lawyers for their counsel," he says, "the crime was as stupid and impolitic as it was vicious."

In other words, had the court and militia and gangsters not bodily ejected the I.L.D. lawyers from Tuscaloosa, had they still had sincere defenders, the lynching, in Mr. Graves' opinion, would have been sensible, politically expedient for the white Southern ruling class, and justifiable, Mr. Graves, of course, is lying about the refusal of the I. L. D counsel. The I. L. D. counsel was rejected under the gun, and only under the most extreme terror conditions aimed directly at such a refusal.

Praised Darrow Steal

On the Scottsboro case, Mr. Graves II has had much to say. He devoted a column in the New York Times, once, to praise of Clarence Darrow for his refusal to defend the Scottsboro boys after taking $2,000 contributed by thousands of workers to the N.A.A.C.P. on the understanding it would be used for Scottsboro defense.

Only three weeks ago, in his column called "This Morning," in the Birmingham Age-Herald, he quoted with approval an article by Elmer Davis, fascist ideologist, who argued that the N.A.A.C.P. alone had "a legitimate interest in the case" because "the Negro hoboes . . . had never heard of the dictatorship of the proletariat; they had never heard of Marx or Lenin."

On another occasion, in the Times again, he said: "The accused men were subjected to regular process of law and found guilty. Local opinion has considered the trial a fair one." And he quoted, approvingly again of course, from the Montgomery Advertiser, a leading lynch organ which has called repeatedly for the blood of the Scottsboro boys, and of I.L.D lawyers and representatives: "There was no intimidation of the court and the jury," in the original Scottsboro trial.

"An Inherited Thing"

John Temple Graves cherishes that "II" after his name. It indicates he is proud of his father, also a Southern newspaper man.

"The Southern objection to having Negroes on the jury is an inherited thing," Graves said in the Age-Herald.

The Tuscaloosa News, in "justification" of the Tuscaloosa lynchings, says: "Social equality never has been, is not now and never will be recognized in the South."

And this brings us to the inheritance of Mr. Graves, of which he is so proud.

John Temple Graves, I

In a book called "Liberalism in the South," by Virginius Dabney of the Richmond (Va.) Times Dispatch, there is an illuminating passage about John Temple Graves "I". Incidentally, the book is a true picture of upper-class liberalism in the South—a picture of the blackest terror and reaction. And it was Dabney himself who suggested that "one or two" Negroes be put on Virginia juries, to avoid reversal of lynch-verdicts.

Dabney, by this and other tokens, belongs to the lynchers' clan himself, of course, and his ideology reflects itself in his phrases even in such a demagogic attack on lynching as the following. But about Graves the First:

"John Temple Graves, an upper-class Southerner," Dabney writes, "is generally regarded as having been largely responsible for the famous Atlanta race-riot of 1906. The Atlanta Evening News, of which he was editor, broadcast several extras in one day proclaiming four successive 'assaults' on white women by Negro men in the city, whereas no assault had been committed. . . . The result of these news articles, coupled with an incendiary editorial, was that feeling was raised to a tremendous pitch. . . . A lame bootblack who was shining a man's shoes was dragged to the sidewalk and beaten to death. Another young Negro was fatally stabbed with jackknives. Several colored barbers who were peacefully shaving white customers in their shops were killed on the spot. In all, ten Negroes were massacred in cold blood, and not one of them was guilty of any crime other than that of having a black skin. Sixty others were wounded.

Vicious Attack on Negroes

"Despite his substantial share of responsibility for the riot, Graves continued his editorial policy of cold brutality toward the Negro. Several months after the clash, the Evening News said concerning the black man who attacks a white woman:

"'No law of God or man can hold back the vengeance of our white men upon such a criminal. If necessary we will double and treble the law of Moses, and hang off-hand the criminal, or failing to find that a remedy, we will hang two, three, or four of the Negroes nearest to the crime until the crime is no longer done or feared in all this Southern land we inhabit and love.'"

This is the ruling class tradition of the South that is in the veins of the editorial writer of the Birmingham Age-Herald and the Alabama editorial correspondent of the New York Times.

He lives up to it.

NEGROES EXECUTED SINGING SPIRITUALS

Wilcoxen, Bevins Pay Penalty for Attacking Girl.

One Confesses Fully, but Other Only Partially, Prison Official Reports.

NASHVILLE, Sept. 7 (AP).—Andrew Wilcoxen and Oscar Bevins, Negroes, convicted of attacking a young white woman in Chattanooga last year, were electrocuted at the state penitentiary early today. The Negroes, both about 26 years old, spent their last minutes singing spirituals.

Ed. D. Connors, deputy warden, said that Wilcoxen confessed late last night. Bevins, he said, "partially confessed" at that time, but went to his death denying guilt.

Wilcoxen went to the chair first and continued to sing while awaiting the throwing of the switch. Bevins joined in the singing from his death cell, and continued the spirituals while sitting in the electric chair.

The shock was applied to Wilcoxen at 5:13 a.m., and he was pronounced dead two minutes later. Bevins went to the chair at 5:35, and was pronounced dead in about five minutes.

While any food they desired was available, the Negroes ate sparingly last night. Several times during the night they were asked if they desired food, but declined except for coffee, which they drank freely.

Bevins and Wilcoxen were convicted at Chattanooga shortly after their arrest. Their death sentences were affirmed later by the supreme court, and Gov. McAlister, after interviewing the Negroes personally, declined to intervene.

Warden A. W. Neety said the executions constituted the first double electrocution here in "three or four" years. John Thomas Shaw, Negro, was put to death recently for the murder of a Negro girl who died after being criminally attacked.

Troops On Guard At Trial Of Negro

DECATUR, ALA., Sept. 4.—(AP)—While national guardsmen kept a watchful eye on the crowded courtroom, testimony was completed today in the trial of Tom Brown, negro, charged with attacking a white woman.

The jury received the case at 6 p.m., and was sent to bed at 10:20 p.m., without having reached a verdict. Deliberations will be resumed tomorrow.

Contrasting with the excitement which followed the arrest and two attempts to mob the negro, there was no sign of disorder today as the trial started. Both the State and defense lost little time in presenting witnesses and resting their cases.

The troops, numbering 100, were ordered on duty as a precautionary measure at the request of Judge James E. Horton, presiding. They were posted around the courthouse and at strategic points in the courtroom.

The victim of the alleged attack, Mrs. George Dugger, mother of seven children, took the stand to identify Brown, also a pocket knife which she said the negro held at her throat as he attacked her.

Brown called a number of alibi witnesses through whose testimony he attempted to establish that he was in another section of the city at the time the attack was reported to have been committed.

Shortly after Brown was arrested on Aug. 24, a crowd gathered at the Morgan County Jail here and he was hurried to Huntsville in the neighboring county for safekeeping. Sheriff Ben F. Giles, of Madison County, thwarted the two attempts to seize the negro at Huntsville.

A jury was seated shortly before noon today, and the presentation of evidence began at once.

DECATUR, ALA., Sept. 5.—(AP)—Death in the electric chair was ordered today for Tom Brown, negro, convicted on a charge of attacking a white woman, as National Guardsmen stood ready to prevent any demonstration against the prisoner twice saved from mob violence.

The packed courtroom received the jury's verdict quietly and, a few minutes later, the negro was en route to Birmingham, where he was carried by a detail of the troops for safekeeping.

Judge James E. Horton, presiding, sentenced Brown to be electrocuted on Friday, Oct. 13, but the action was suspended pending outcome of an appeal which attorneys for the negro served notice they would file.

Brown was identified by the mother of seven children, as the negro who attacked her Aug. 24.

Two attempts to seize Brown were made after he was arrested here and carried to Huntsville, in the adjoining county, for safety. The National Guardsmen, numbering 100, were requested by Judge Horton for patrol duty during the trial in view of the two previous attempts to mob the negro.

Court Officials Discuss Date For Negroes' Trial

DECATUR, Ala., Oct. 6. (AP)—Court officials and state's attorney conferred here today on setting a date for trial of the Scottsboro cases but on adjournment made no announcement other than some action would be taken soon.

Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr., who directed the state's case in the retrial and death sentence verdict against Heywood Patterson, first of nine Negroes to be re-tried, Judge James E. Horton who presided and Judge W. W. Callahan attended the conference.

All of the Negroes were tried in Jackson circuit court and eight were convicted and sentenced to death on charges of attacking two young Huntsville white girls, aboard a freight train on March 25, 1931.

The Alabama supreme court reversed the death sentence of one and the United States supreme court set aside the convictions of the others.

Patterson was the first to be brought to trial here in April of this year under a change of venue and was again convicted and sentenced to death.

Judge Horton then indefinitely postponed the other trials until excitement died down. On June 22, Judge Horton set aside the verdict on grounds of lack of sufficient corroborative evidence for the state's principal witness, one of the victims of the attack.

CONFER OVER TRIALS

Court Officials Discuss Scottsboro Cases In Decatur Conference

DECATUR—(AP)—Atty. Gen. Knight and Judges James E. Horton and W. W. Callahan of the Eighth Judicial Circuit, conferred Friday regarding setting trials of the Scottsboro cases.

After the conference was adjourned, no announcement was made, except some definite action will be taken soon.

Trial of the cases was postponed last April after Heywood Patterson, first of nine Negroes indicted for an attack on two white girls aboard a freight train March 25, 1930, had been retried and convicted.

Patterson's death sentence later was set aside by Judge Horton, who granted a new trial.

In postponing the trials, Judge Horton said the action was taken to permit conditions to quiet down.

The Negores at present are in the Jefferson County Jail at Birmingham.

JURORS FAIL TO INDICT LYNCHERS

Evidence Not Sufficient To Find True Bills, Report Asserts

TUSCALOOSA, Ala., Oct. 2—(AP)—A special Grand Jury that met four times in six weeks to investigate the lynching of two young Negroes Monday reported that it had not found sufficient evidence on which to base an indictment.

The Grand Jury was convened on Aug. 15 to investigate the lynching of Dan Pippen, Jr., and A. T. Harden, both Negroes, who were under indictment charging attack and murder of Miss Vaudine Maddox, 21-year-old white girl near the Hale County line.

In making its report, the Grand Jury expressed confidence in Sheriff R. L. Shamblin, adding that nothing in the investigation reflected on his integrity or ability as a law enforcement officer.

Support Of Law Urged

Support of all citizens of officers in the enforcement of the laws was urged by the Grand Jury in its report to Judge Henry L. Foster who empaneled the body on Aug. 15 and urged that every effort be made to bring the lynchers before the bar of the court.

Atty. Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., at the request of local officials, conducted the investigation which was spread over a long period to permit a thorough search for evidence.

The two Negroes, and Elmore Clark who was wounded by the mob, were taken from officers by a masked band just over the Jefferson County line early Sunday, Aug. 13.

After ordering the three deputies sheriff who were moving the Negroes to the Jefferson County Jail at Birmingham to prevent violence, to continue up the road, the masked band of 10 or 12 men took the Negroes to near Woodstock in Bibb County where they were shot to death.

One Escapes Death

Harden and Pippen fell pierced by a dozen bullets, but Clark was struck only three times and seriously wounded. After the mob had left him for dead, Clark freed himself from manacles and made his way to to the home of a friend. Medical aid was summoned and the Negro was surrendered to officers.

Clark appeared before the Grand Jury. He at present is in Kilby Prison where he has been under treatment for his wounds.

Officers blamed the unexpected development of violence against the Negroes on activity of the International Labor Defense in attempting to intercede in the case. Pippen and his parents denied that they had asked the I. L. D. to supply counsel and Judge Foster ruled the attorney retained by the organization out of the case.

The attorneys, Irvin Schwab, Allen Taub, both of New York, and Frank Irwin, of Birmingham, were given a military escort from the city after the jurist's decision.

Horton To Quit Patterson Case, Reliable Report

Heard In Unofficial Source He Will Not Preside In Other Scottsboro Trials

Knight Agreeable

Says Prosecution Will Not Object To Judge's Step; Will Seek Early Action

Advertiser 7-9-33 Montgomery Ala.

It was understood last night from unofficial but reliable sources that Judge James E. Horton, of the Morgan Circuit Court, would recuse himself from presiding at further trials at Decatur of the "Scottsboro cases"—and the opinion in official circles was that, under the circumstances, he would do so.

Communicated with by long distance telephone in Birmingham where he is attending the annual convention of the Alabama State Bar, Atty. Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., when queried concerning a report current that a movement was underway to ask Judge Horton to recuse himself, said: "Of course if Judge Horton recuses himself it will be perfectly agreeable to the prosecution."

He had no further comment to make except to state that he would press for an early trial of the case of Haywood Patterson, one of the seven negro defendants in the "Scottsboro cases," who has twice been convicted and sentenced to death, but whose motion for new trial Judge Horton recently granted.

Regarding another report of the probability of another change of venue in the cases from Morgan County where they were originally transferred from Jackson County, Atty. Gen. Knight said he had always maintained that Patterson received a fair trial in Morgan County, and that he had given no consideration to another change of venue.

Patterson, the first of the seven defendants to be retried, was convicted in the Morgan Circuit Court on April 9, and a second time sentenced to death in the electric chair. All seven are charged with criminally assaulting two white women on board a moving freight train, March 25, 1931, near Scottsboro Ala.

Advertiser

Judge Horton, who presided at the retrial of Patterson, granted the defense motion for a new trial, June [illegible], ruling that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the jury's verdict. The decision was based on the ground that the testimony of Mrs. Victoria Price, one of the two victims of the assault, that she was attacked by Patterson, was not corroborated, and that her credibility was not above question.

Tried, convicted, and sentenced to death at Scottsboro, Patterson and the other six negroes were granted new trials on appeal to the U. S. Supreme Court. Later a change of venue was obtained by their counsel, to Morgan County.

Of the nine negroes originally charged with the crime, two were subsequently held to be juveniles and their cases are now pending in juvenile courts.

The New Republic 7-5-33 New York, N.Y.

JUDGE Horton's action in voiding the conviction of Haywood Patterson, first of the Scottsboro defendants to be retried, and in ordering a new trial for him, is being variously interpreted among the groups interested in the case. To some it seems an act of simple justice by a judge who had already proved his fairness during the trial itself, an act which makes it impossible for any of the other defendants to be tried again, or at least destroys the fear that they will be convicted if they are. To others, it seems a device to prevent bringing the Scottsboro affair once more before the United States Supreme Court, and particularly to prevent having that Court consider the dangerous question of whether Negroes are habitually refused the right to serve on juries in the Southern states. Which of these interpretations is correct can, obviously, only be determined in the light of subsequent events. If the other indictments are now quashed, and the defendants all set free, Judge Horton's action will be seen in retrospect as one of the few honorable actions by any representative of Alabama justice in the whole history of the affair. If, on the other hand, an effort is now made to try Patterson for the third time, or to proceed with the trials of any of his fellow defendants, it will be safe to assume that Judge Horton's action is a device at least to postpone, and perhaps to avoid, letting the United States Supreme Court pass upon the important issues which have been raised by the case. Thus far, there is no indication that the prosecuting officials intend to let the matter drop. On the contrary, they are making much of having found the mysterious missing witness, Orville Gilley, the white boy who is supposed to have seen the alleged assault upon Ruby Bates and Victoria Price, and the one of whom the prosecution so mysteriously failed to make serious use during the origina trial.

ALABAMA BOSSES SPREAD NEW LIES AGAINST 9 BOYS

Daily Worker New York N.Y.

Say Examiners of Girls "Sold Selves to Jews"

BIRMINGHAM, Ala., July 14.—Spreading of reports that Dr. H. H. Bridges and Dr. M. H. Lynch, of Scottsboro, whose prosecution testimony in the Decatur trial of Haywood Patterson, turned out to be important defense testimony, have "sold themselves to the Jews from New York", is the latest method used by the landlords of Alabama to whip up lynch spirit against the nine innocent Scottsboro Negro boys, according to information received by the International Labor Defense here.

These reports, said to emanate in a whispering campaign from Attorney-General Thomas E. Knight and Tom Heflin, the Ku Klux Klan ex-senator, have been spread all over the state, and are repeated with especial viciousness in Scottsboro town itself, where the two doctors are threatened with professional ruin and economic destruction because they refused to lie on the witness stand.

The medical testimony of these two doctors, who examined Victoria Price and Ruby Bates immediately after they were taken off the freight-train at Stevenson, in March, 1931, showed that they had not been attacked.

Re-Trial For Haywood Patterson

All friends of justice, and in particular of the good name of the South, will applaud the decision of Judge James E. Horton in ordering a second retrial for Haywood Patterson, one of the negroes indicted in the notorious Scottsboro case. Two white women had testified at Patterson's first trial that he was one of a crowd of negroes who attacked them as they were hoboing on a freight train in Alabama in 1931. But at the second one of them changed her testimony and declared that the whole case was a "frame-up." The United States Supreme court last September had ordered new trials for the seven of the accused still in captivity.

All will recall the particularly exasperating conduct of Patterson's case by Samuel Leibowitz, of New York, who was apparently out to have his client convicted in the cause of radical movements throughout the world, rather than secure justice for a man he considered innocent. But Leibowitz was not on trial, and it is an excellent thing for the South's reputation in the world that Judge Horton, refusing to be put aside by the deep feeling which the case has aroused both for and against the negroes, considered the case entirely on its merits, entirely on the question whether the testimony of the woman who stuck to her original story could be believed. It was natural, as he pointed out, that a man should not be sent to his death on the unsupportred word of that woman. And the fact that the state at the original trial did not put up a white hobo, Orville Gilley, as an eye-witness, although he was then in custody, was a further damaging fact cited by the court.

It was indicated by Thomas E. Knight, Jr., the attorney general who prosecuted the case, that he would proceed with a new trial for Patterson. But we may hope that since the state had already made its best case, only to have the verdicts twice set aside, Alabama will put an end to so unseemly an affair by dropping prosecution not only of Patterson but the other defendants.

The Scottsboro Case

Jackson, Tennessee

First of all, a defense should be made against certain violent attacks on Alabama in connection with the trial of nine Negro boys. The tirade of the defense counsel, especially Leibowitz, proceeds on the assumption that there belongs to Alabama a peculiar enormity of injustice and wickedness. We are not going to make progress by an indiscriminate arraignment of a particular section. If you have something like the Scottsboro affair in any part of the South, or North, where races are mixed up to any large extent. Where racial issues are involved and racial enmities intensified, a similar reaction will take place. It has been demonstrated both in New York and Chicago that no section has a monopoly of race prejudice. It must be said, furthermore, that Alabama has protected these prisoners from mob violence, which must be considered along with the fact that lynching was a possibility.

I am persuaded that the fair-minded citizens of Alabama and the South will lay aside any false self-defense mechanism as they see that the question involved is not local, but that racial conflict is as wide as the contact of the races. It is no justifiable defense for one section to seek comfort in the racial discrimination in other parts of the world. It is far better, however, to face this general fact than to deny the fact as it pertains to a local situation.

The Federal Council of Churches gives due recognition of the widespread nature of the problem: "The issues involved in the Scottsboro case are neither local nor sectional. The whole nation is concerned. Race prejudice is not limited to any section or state. The treatment of Negro citizens almost everywhere in America brings all of us to shame."

"An Open Letter," with the signatures of prominent men and women from every part of the country, makes substantially the same declaration: "Exploitation and prejudice are not confined to any state or section. The treatment of Negro citizens generally in America brings all of us into court with unclean hands."

The conflict and criss-cross currents of various forces and factions have been so intense in the Scottsboro case as to make difficult a just estimate of the whole affair. A number of inflammatory factors have created a most unfortunate state of feeling. A cocksure declaration is made by the New Republic and other partisan periodicals that the Negro boys are innocent. Tens of thousands of workers in European countries demanded "the immediate, unconditional release of the innocent Scottsboro boys." Even if these assumptions are true, they are based on partisan feelings and not on any knowledge of the evidence.

The boys were hoboes and not workers. It is also possible that they were not innocent, even though the evidence of guilt is not sufficient to convict.

The activity of the Communists in the case has been most irritating. In the "Open Letter" referred to the statement is made: "The activities of Communists in the case complicated the issues and made an impartial trial more difficult."

A preacher, writing from a first-hand knowledge of the trial, in criticism of a brief Advocate editorial, makes a further confirmation of this irritating fact: "The International Labor Defense influence injected into this case is not for the release of the Negroes, it is generally thought here, so much as to foment trouble all over the country, particularly in the South, the idea in mind being to establish sooner or later a union in these states along the line of the Soviets in Russia. Any stone thrown in this case that will strengthen sentiment in any way back of the Russian influence emanating from New York against the law taking its course is but a move to break down liberty and establish license—break down law and order and set up a frenzied mob power in which might instead of right will rule."

Solicitor Wade Wright made before the jury an appeal to both racial and sectional prejudice in one sentence: "No Alabama jury would listen to witnesses bought with Jew money from New York."

In addition to all of this is the ever-present tension between the whites and Negroes. I am well aware that my words are not satisfactory to the partisans on either side of the question. I am not specially interested just now in pleasing my readers, but I am concerned about making what appears to me a fair statement of the situation. I will rate at face value the sincerity of the person who believes that the Negroes were guilty. But it would strain my confidence to the breaking point to accept the statement of the person who claims that the feeling and atmosphere surrounding the trial were conducive to a just and reasonable verdict. I simply cannot believe, with the various inflammatory factors present which have been described, that an average jury of twelve men could be found anywhere in the country who are so superior as to be able to rise above the enveloping atmosphere and see with clear vision. I am hopeful that good citizens everywhere will look at the facts as they are, avoid mass psychology belonging to either group of partisans, and steadfastly refuse to be parrots of popular passion or "tin amplifiers of the voice of the mass mind."

Now to come to the crux of the issue. My objection is to the severity of the sentence, aside from the question of guilt or innocence. It carries with it beyond all question racial discrimination. If there is any record of white men receiving a death sentence for an attack on acknowledged strumpets, I wish it would be brought to light. The case is cited of a white man who was convicted of raping a Negro woman, but there was no death sentence. Again the evidence of guilt is not sufficient. It is true that the law protects a disreputable character from attack, but no law can give the same value to the testimony of a disreputable woman as belongs to the testimony of a woman of high type. In this case you have the conflicting testimony of two disreputable women.

The statement of Judge Horton, in granting a new trial to one of the boys, should have the widest publicity, and it would doubtless serve the purpose of protecting the people and even preachers from a sort of wild hysteria: "History, sacred and profane, and the common experience of mankind, teaches that women of the character shown in this case are prone for selfish reasons to make false accusations both of rape and of insult, upon the slighest provocation or even without provocation for ulterior motives. . . . No defendant should be convicted in a prosecution for assault when the evidence of the prosecutrix bears evidence of unreliability. Under the circumstances it was necessary to have corroboration of Victoria Price's testimony, and there was no such corroboration."

As further evidence of racial enmity and discrimination take the original verdict of the jury in pronouncing a death sentence on two Negro boys only thirteen years of age. How long do the defenders of the verdict of the jury think that it would take a white jury to sentence to death two white boys thirteen years of age for an alleged attack on two prostitutes?

I do not see that it will be of any profit for any of my readers to get angry. It would certainly manifest a better spirit to write me a correction if I have made any declaration which is not sustained by reason and facts, and such corrections will be published in the Advocate.

With some reiteration it may be said in conclusion that no aspersions should be cast upon the State of Alabama by other sections of the country. The affair is not yet concluded. Alabama has produced a judge of the high quality of James Horton, calm and dispassionate amid the rage and confusion of passion and hate.

Defense Lawyers Cheered on Return from Trial

NEW YORK.—For fifteen minutes before the Chattanooga train bearing Samuel Leibowitz and Joseph D. Brodsky, I.L.D. attorneys, arrived in the Pennsylvania Station [illegible] yesterday afternoon, the terminal resounded with the cries of "The Scottsboro Boys Shall Not Die! The Scottsboro Boys Shall Not Die!"

Daily Worker

New York

Nearly 500 Negro and white workers—a large number of them from Harlem—cheered the Scottsboro lawyers as they came into sight of the crowd. Brodsky and Leibowitz left Decatur Wednesday afternoon after Judge Callahan had sentenced Heywood Patterson and Clarence Norris to die in the electric chair on Feb. 2. Elias Schwartzbard and Sol Cohn, assistants to Brodsky during the Decatur trials, arrived at the same time.

A large number of uniformed cops and plainclothesmen held the cheering crowd back as it continued the chant, "The Scottsboro Boys Shall Not Die! The Scottsboro Bays Shall Not Die."

As soon as Leibowitz and Brodsky came into sight, they were lifted upon the shoulders of the crowd who carried them outside the terminal.

Pushed backwards by the advancing crowd eager to catch a glimpse of the Scottsboro defense attorneys, a score of news photographers were forced to dash forward ahead of the procession and awkwardly striving to get "shots" of the attorneys as the latter were surrounded by the surge of the welcoming crowd.

A half a dozen cops, arms linked, marched Leibowitz out of the terminal. Close to Leibowitz was the towering figure of Harold Fox, his 250-pound personal bodyguard from the Brooklyn homicide squad.

Cheering, "Long Live the International Labor Defense!" and "The Scottsboro Boys Shall Not Die!" the crowd poured out of the terminal, close at the heels of the Scottsboro attorneys. Traffic was momentarily halted at 34th St. and Seventh Ave., and thousands of workers leaving shops and offices were attracted to the demonstration.

All the Scottsboro boys are now back in the Jefferson County Prison in Birmingham, Leibowitz reported. Asked whether Patterson and Norris would be sent to the Alabama State Prison in Kilby, Leibowitz said that "it was not likely." Announcement of appeal by the defense had automatically halted execution of sentence, and transfer of the boys to Kilby, where they had been beaten by guards, would be vigorously fought by the defense, the lawyer declared.

Newark Police Ban Meeting

NEWARK, N. J., Dec. 10.—Police Chief McRell denied a permit for a Scottsboro protest meeting called in this city at the corner of Somerset and Spruce Streets. "What do you want to hold a Scottsboro meeting for? Newark isn't interested in Alabama," the police chief told the worker who applied for the permit.

In protest against this support to the Alabama lynchers, a delegation of a dozen workers, representing 6,000 organized workers, went to City Hall yesterday. Their demand to see the mayor and the police commissioner was three times refused. On the insistence of the workers, an aid of the mayor called in McRell to "handle" the situation. The workers told him they would hold the protest demonstration with or without a permit, whereup on the chief in an apoplectic rage told them. "Go ahead, but watch out that we don't get after you."

3,000 Brave Bitter Cold to Hit Frameup Trials at Decatur

N. Y. Workers Also Protest Reichstag Fire Frame-up

12-11-33

NEW YORK.—For nearly two hours more than 3,000 men, women and children—many of them without coats and rubbers—stood in the bitter cold at a demonstration in Union Square on Saturday, called by the League of Struggle for Negro Rights and the N. Y. District of the International Labor Defense to protest the murderous Scottsboro convictions and the Leipzig frame-up trial.

The demonstration was one of scores held simultaneously in various parts of the United States.

Assail Lynchers

Passionate denunciation of the Decatur verdicts and the furious lynch wave sweeping the country characterized the [illegible] of [illegible] B. Moore, national secretary of the League of Struggle for Negro Rights; William [illegible] Patterson, national secretary of the I. L. D.; [illegible] Bedacht, representing the Central Committee of the Communist Party and other speakers.

A policeman on duty at the square had apparently learned something of the spirit of the workers. "Why don't they postpone this demonstration, it's cold as hell!" a reporter asked a cop whose job consisted of telling workers to get off the sidewalk and into the gutters on the principle of "keeping things moving."

The cop, whose shield number was 11703, replied sadly:

"They never postpone anything. When they start something they go through with it, rain or shine!'

Contingents from various trade union and fraternal organizations began moving into the square about noon. About 400 members of the downtown section of the I. L. D. and the Young Pioneers of America gathered at a rally at Seventh St. and Avenue "A" marched in just before the demonstration began. Preceding the marchers, was a truck on which was erected an improvised gallows and rope, bearing a sign, "Lynchings Must Stop!" Nine young Negroes, symbolizing the Scottsboro boys, stood on the truck, and facing them was a character labeled "Speed" Callahan.

Snowflakes covered the banners and placards carried by the demonstrators. One declared, "Down With Wall Street Imperialism in Cuba," another, "Down with the Gomez Terror in Venezuela."

Besides Moore and Bedacht, other speakers at the Union Sq. demonstration were Moissaye J. Olgin, editor of the "Morning Freiheit"; Mrs. Patience [illegible] of the Universal Negro Improvement Association; Winifred [illegible] of the Methodist Federation for Social Service; William Fitzgerald of the Harlem Section of the I.L.D.

Denounce Leipzig Trial

Resolutions were unanimously adopted by the workers at the demonstration against the infamous Decatur verdicts; against the frame-up trial of Torgler, Dimitroff, Popoff and Tanev; against the wave of lynchings throughout the country which has received the sanction of leading public officials, including Governor Rolph, of California, the jailor of Tom Mooney.

A resolution was also adopted against the arrest and jailing of four young workers at Times Sq. last Saturday while speaking on behalf of the Scottsboro boys.

Workers Free Jailed Negroes

NEW YORK.—Quick and aggressive action on the part of workers in a Scottsboro demonstration at Dean St. and Howard Ave. in the Crown Heights section of Brooklyn on Friday night forced police to free two Negro workers being framed on charges of "suspicion of homicide."

The workers, Henry McGregor and A. Pilgrin, are both active in the fight to free the nine Scottsboro boys. They were standing on the corner of Dean St. and Ralph Ave., distributing the Daily Worker and telling the workers of the neighborhood of the demonstration to be held, when a police car pulled over to the curb and one of the cops in the car called them over. When they refused to go one of the policemen jumped out of the car, pulled a gun and shoved the workers against the wall. The police threatened the Negroes with his gun, saying: "If you don't get over to the wall I'll let you have it." The workers were searched and then taken in the police radio car to the 77th Precinct station house.

Committee Demands Release

One block away, at Dean St. and Howard Ave., the "Free the Scottsboro Boys" demonstration called by the Young Communist League of Crown Heights was already under way. When the workers were told of the arrest, a committee composed of Charles Alexander of the League of Struggle for Negro Rights, J. Blank, an International Labor Defense member, and Attorney Trupin of the I. L. D., was elected to go to the police station and demand the release of the two Negro workers.

When the committee reached the police station and demanded the release of McGregor and Pilgrim they were ejected. Outside the station the committee continued to demand the release of the workers, and when—a short time later—the demonstration neared the police station, the police released the two Negroes.

Pledge Continued Fight

At the close of the march, at 1777 Atlantic Ave., a large open-air meeting was held. Speakers of the Communist Party, Young Communist League, and the I. L. D. urged the need for keeping up the fight for the freedom of the Scosstboro boys. The workers, who had braved the cold during the march and at the meeting, pledge to fight against lynchings, Jim-Crowism, and to fight to free the nine Scottsboro boys.

,500 Hear Leibowitz On Scottsboro Case At Protest Meeting

Age

12-23-33

New York, N.Y.

A crowd estimated at between 1,800 and 2,000 people, both white and colored, heard vigorous denunciations of Judge Callahan and Attorney General Knight for their handling of the Scottsboro case, at a mass meeting held at Arcadia Hall, Brooklyn, Monday evening, December 11, under auspices of the National Afro Protective League, Rev. Thomas S. Harten, president.

Dr. Harten, the presiding officer, introduced the various speakers all of whom condemned the decisions thus far handed down in the Scottsboro case and criticized the judge, prosecutor an jurors for showing racial bias.

Among the speakers were Rev. George Frazier Miller, rector of St. Augustine P. E. Church; Harry Wolkoff, chief clerk of the Gates Avenue Court; Judge Jacob S. Strahl and Rabbi Alexander Lyons.

Attorney Samuel S. Leibowits, defense attorney for the boys, was the principal speaker and when introduced by Dr. Harten started his address with praise and condemnation for the Negro and white press for their reportorial and editorial work in the case. He also thanked all those whom had sent letters, telegrams, and messages to him while in Decatur.

Mr. Leibowitz said that he had just received a message frim Atlanta, Ga., stating that a Scottsboro protest meeting was held there Sunday evening under auspices of the I. L. D., at a Negro Baptist Church and at the most interesting point a band of hooded members of the Ku Klux Klan entered and broke up the meeting.

After praising Judge Horton for his previous handling of the case, Mr. Liebowitz then launched an attack on Judge Callahan, Attorney General Knight and the jurors in the present case. He said that racial feeling was so high that in Jackson County, where the present jurors live, large signs are posted reading: "Niggers, Don't let the sun shine on your head!" In Calhoun County, adjacent to Decatur, Mr. Liebowitz said that the white citizenry had made the railroad company discharge summarily all Negro firemen.

In Decatur, said the defense attorney, just before he left for New York, four Negro youths who were interested in the outcome of the trials, volunteered to sing spirituals for him and he invited them to his home. After the youths left, Liebowitz said that a mob of white men attacked them on the street, fired shots at them and one of the youths sustained severe injuries of his hand.

The meeting ended with adoption of resolutions, all criticizing the Alabamas for their "contemptible frame-up" of the youths.

JUDGE CALLAHAN AND MR. KNIGHT

Defender

12-16-33

Chicago, Ill.

The people of Alabama must feel proud of their two favorite sons, Judge W. W. Callahan and their gallant young attorney general, Mr. Knight. The thought is accentuated by the fact that in Judge Callahan they have imposed the confidence of declaring the "due process of law". and of discharging the responsibilities incident thereto.

To their young prosecutor, who holds the important position of attorney general of the state, delegated, we assume, by an untrammeled voice of the electorate, they have imposed the further responsibilities of the vigorous and impartial prosecution of those charged with violation of the law.

It is highly probable—since the nearness to a mountain destroys its real beauty—that those who are far beyond the border lines of Alabama are unable to see the virtues which may be observable to our fellow citizens in Alabama; in that respect we may be benefited by the advantage of distance from the mountain giving us the advantage from the brightness of the elements to view it in all of its deformity.

This nearness of which we speak manifests itself in the unfairness of both judge and prosecutor throughout the entire trial of the Scottsboro cases thus far heard with the characteristic indication that the orderly processes of judicial procedure will have no counterpart in the activities of the officers of the court.

A review of previous trials conducted at different times in different states and under different conditions, fails to disclose that a more consistent effort was ever made to improperly influence a verdict contrary to the law and evidence than was made in this court by the presiding judge. Judge Callahan even refused to tell the jury in the trial of the first defendant convicted how they might acquit if the evidence so warranted, until defense counsel vigorously protested against the prejudicial conduct of the judge. When President Franklin D. Roosevelt addressed himself to the suppression of mob violence in which he referred to the courts falling into disrepair, he must have had in mind the manifest disrepair of Judge W. W. Callahan.

Disrepair is the proper and fit word when conniving appears to be the objective of both judge and prosecutor. Such evidence as has been presented and accepted and occasioned the sentence of two human beings to be executed could have no precedent or tradition unless it be found in the archives of a barbaric nation. To the honor of Judge Horton, who previously heard the same cases which were sustained by the same evidence at the hands of a jury, he refused to permit his hands to be stained with innocent blood and very promptly set the guilty verdict aside.

Mr. Knight, the gallant young attorney general, who is seeking to enhance his political fortunes at the expense of corruption, frand and perjury, readily admitted to the press that his speech to the jury was "an appeal to passion." The man who made this confession is a candidate for governor of his state.

Think of it; the man who admits prostituting the power and influence of his office to maliciously take the lives of nine innocent human beings, now hopes to cash in on his pernicious activities by being elevated to the governorship of his state. Mr. Knight may win, but Alabama and civilization will lose.

Scottsboro Again

Planet

12-16-33

Richmond, Va.

The third conviction of Heywood Patterson by an Alabama jury in the now internationally famous "Scottsboro case" is no more convincing than either of his other two convictions. If anything, it is less so.

Following his second conviction, Judge Horton set the verdict aside as contrary to the evidence and ordered a new trial. The new trial has just been held, and it has resulted in another conviction, although the length of time it took the jury to reach an agreement indicates that there was at least one dissenter when the jurymen retired for their deliberations.

Judge Callahan, who sat in place of Judge Horton at the recent hearing, refused permission to the defense to present any evidence as to the bad character of Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, the two white women alleged to have been attacked by the Negroes.

More important still was the fact that Ruby Bates, who now denies that either she or Victoria Price was attacked by anybody, was in a New York hospital and unable to appear as a defense witness. At the second trial she did appear, but at the trial which was recently concluded, she was not permitted even to submit a written statement that neither she nor Victoria Price was molested in any way by the accused Negroes.

Without pretending to pass on the legal questions involved, one is inclined to the view that whatever the rules of evidence are, it is extraordinary that a man should be tried on a capita charge and sentenced to death when one of the two persons he is charged with attacking is no permitted to present her denial to the jury.

Thus it seems a safe conclusion that the verdict in the case of Heywood Patterson will not mark the final act in the Scottsboro drama, in so far as this particular defendant is concerned.

Judge Horton reversed the verdict of guilty in his second trial. It seems incredible that one of he higher courts will do less with regard to this hird conviction.—Richmond Times-Dispatch

Chamlee's Appeal to Hell Fire and Brimstone has No Effect on Bible Belt Jury

Assistant Counsel Told Decatur Jurors They Would be Haunted by Scottsboro Boys on Death Bed.

By CLARENCE MITCHELL

DECATUR, Ala.—The assistant attorney for the defense in the Scottsboro trial in Decatur, Alabama, is George W. Chamlee, a native of Tennessee, who moves about like he is ready to fall forward and usually wears a dark suit and a string tie.

He told me that the AFRO-AMERICAN was the greatest paper in the country.

He likes to tell stories of "ol' culled men and mammies." His kit of humor is full of jokes like, "That mule ain't blind he just don't give a d——"

Mr. Chamlee made a biblical appeal to the jury and most likely they were taken in by it. He threatened them with eternal fire and damnation if they brought in the wrong verdict. He warned them about meeting their maker and lying on death beds with visions of innocent men in electric chairs dancing before their eyes.

He was sincere from the point of view of a southern man interested in getting people free for whom he had some personal regard. He was not an epic of legal speech making while talking but all in all he was well meaning and seemed much upset over the verdict of guilty which he called "A gross miscarriage of justice."

Dixie Daily Hits Scottsboro Verdict

FEATURE—THE THIRD "SCOTTSBORO" VERDICT—Box
(Virginian Pilot and Norfolk Landmark)

The third trial of the Alabama Negro, Heywood Patterson in the Scottsboro case (now technically the Decatur case) was different in important respects from the second trial which Judge Horton threw out after a jury had returned a verdict of guilty. On the one hand, the story of Victoria Price was corroborated in part—but only in part—by two young white men who said they were on the train with her.

They did not attempt to identify any Negroes on the train, but they did testify that a fight occurred. On the other hand, and more importantly, as it seems to us—the defense was severely handicapped in two respects: First, it was not allowed to present to the jury the fact, admitted by all parties at the second trial, that the two women, Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, and the above two white men spent the previous night together in a hobo camp, of any other evidence showing the character of the women; and, second, the defense was unable to present the statement of Ruby Bates that neither she nor Victoria Price had been attacked on the train by anybody. Ruby Bates has just undergone a major operation in New York and is still in a hospital there. No evidence from her reached the jury.

The result was that the jury had to choose between Victoria Price's story of the now familiar incidents on the freight train, partly corroborated by the two white men, and the story of Heywood Patterson, who denied the attack and denied even seeing any white women on the train. His chief witness was a local physician who, examining the woman two hours after the alleged attack, found virtually no physical evidence to substantiate her story. Between these two stories the jury chose to believe the woman. Thus, for the third time, the Negro has been found guilty and his punishment fixed as death."

In view of the history of this case, however, it is difficult to believe that the jury weighed the evidence with that discriminating judgment which theoretically marks a jury verdict. In its extensive background, in its growing notoriety, in its racial implications, the case has long since become far more in Alabama than a mere sifting of evidence. As to the latter, Judge Horton, who presided at the second trial, flatly refused to swallow the woman's story, announcing on the contrary that it "bears on its face indications of improbability and is contradicted by other evidence." So it has always seemed to the great majority of those who felt themselves under no obligations to uphold either Alabama justice or to sustain the primacy of the white race in the black belt of the South by any such method as the execution of a gang of Negro boys.

To the Virginian-Pilot there has never been any doubt that, regardless of the exact details of the train incident, if the whole freight car company had been of one racial group, or even if the men had been white and the women Negroes, the entire affair would have been washed out in a magistrate's court with a minor fine and a warning to the defendants to get out of town and stay out, or a short chain gang sentence. That is the standard punishment in the South for the kind of fracas that occurred, even when it is taken at its worst. Because the racial issue became involved, because the maintenance of Alabama justice became a point of "honor"—the more so when radical elements seized the occasion to score a point for themselves—the improbability of a jury's considering the case in the calm light of reason has long since been demonstrated. Even so, it may be doubted whether the supreme court of the United States will allow such a verdict to stand.

"Collective Murder"

For the third time the State of Alabama has condemned two Negroes to die for an alleged crime which millions of American citizens, regardless of race do not believe was ever committed. White people of America should forget for a moment the Negro youths whose lives have been put upon the altar of prejudice and visualize the more horrible view, where government itself has been reduced to a terrible Frankenstein which destroys its own.

In the Scottsboro case can be found the factors which white America would do well to study. Here we have the picture which exposes the embryo where festers the seeds of all that is destroying the moral fiber in our social and political institutions. At Decatur one sees stalking in supposed halls of justice the ugly, gaunt form of hypocrisy.

Attorney General Knight, of the State of Alabama, and the presiding judge who sat on the bench during this third farcial prosecution, knew, and have known for many months that the Scottsboro victims of southern hate are innocent. It is only for the purpose of boltsering up a lie long since exposed to the world that these useless gestures are made at justice.

Can the jury which sat in this case say truthfully that beyond a reasonable doubt they believe that these seven boys are guilty of raping Victoria Price? Forget the fact that the jury was not constitutionally drawn and direct your attention solely to some of the testimony presented in the last two trials.

Does not the testimony of Ruby Bates, who says that she was not raped, have weight? Does not the testimony of Lester Carter, white youth, have bearing on this case? Does the testimony of a reputable physician who examined the girls immediately following the alleged crime, and who declared that they had not been raped, lend suspicion to the idea that a frame-up existed?

To compound prejudice following two trials the State of Alabama now seeks to say that Ruby Bates was bought off with "Jew money." Apparently these senseless creatures of hate and fury forget that Ruby Bates while in jail, and before the world knew of the Scottsboro boys, had written the now famous letter to her white sweetheart, in which she said, "The niggers never j—d me." That record was made in Alabama and Ruby's letter is today impounded by the court which still says seven defenseless Negroes must die.

Before me now lies a newspaper release of the International Labor Defense. The defenders of white womanhood, we are told, refuse to permit a jury to hear of what Victoria Price was doing down in the jungle and underbrush around Chattanooga the night before she was raped. The judge refuses to allow Lester Carter to tell of the illicit relationship he had with her. The crowd laughs every few minutes when they find that the judge has refused to allow the scarlet record of Victoria Price to be told.

Just how white America can appease its conscience with the rotten, putrid verdict rendered at Decatur is hard to imagine. The white women of America should rise en masse to declare that white womanhood needs no such cowardly defense to maintain its integrity and purity.

The fine words of President Roosevelt delivered before the Federal Council of Churches fall lifeless before us when we recall that the pardoning power is in his hands. The President has an opportunity to set a high and exalted example in a lynch-torn nation by immediately pardoning Heywood Patterson and Clarence Norris. We like the President's definition of lynching, "collective murder." If ever there was a deliberate and defiant attempt to legally and collectively murder citizens in any country, that attempt is being made in the state of Alabama.

NO DEATH PENALTY YET.

Evidence is so overwhelming that it is no libel against the South to say that the black man is not only treated with coarse unfairness but, in a trial, hasn't a chance at all. What can be expected to happen to Judge James E. Horton who set aside the verdict in the Scottsboro case that spelled death for one of the negroes involved? Judge Horton has disregarded a principle that seems to have held sway, particularly in the deep South, and which might be stated about like this: The word of one white woman, however ignorant or illiterate and without regard to the dissolute life she may have led, must be taken and upon it even a death penalty meted out against a black man however blameless his previous life may have been or however strongly facts and circumstances may have corroborated the defense.

That was the general impression as the testimony at this now celebrated trial was taken and printed day by day and that idea was stamped with approval by the jury's verdict.

In setting this conclusion aside Judge Horton, after speaking of the fact that women of the complainant's proven character have been known on many occasions to make wild accusations of attack, continued:

> "Her manner of testifying and demeanor on the stand militate against her. Her testimony was contradictory, often evasive and time and again she refused to answer pertinent questions. The gravity of the offense and the importance of her testimony demanded candor and sincerity."

The Judge has merely ruled that the verdict of the jury is so far against the weight of the evidence that he cannot permit it to stand, a ruling that is tantamount to the declaration that the judicial conscience was shocked at the verdict because of its gross, its flagrant, injustice.

Judge Horton has added himself to that long list of splendid men in American judicial history who have not feared to brave popular wrath and personal defeat and insult in order to do the right.

A WISE JUDGE POINTS THE WAY

In Athens, Alabama, yesterday a Southern white man indicated to the world that in the South, not unlike the rest of the world, if many men are moved by prejudice other men are also moved by consideration of justice. There in the person of Judge James E. Horton, as much a Southerner as any other man in the South, the South moved to give to a Negro justice in its courts.

It would be an injustice to Judge Horton to minimize the prejudice which resulted in the outrageous verdict in the trial of Haywood Patterson, one of the eight Negroes charged with rape in the famous Scottsboro case. Judge Horton's act, however, in setting aside the verdict in that case and ordering a new trial for Patterson showed how unjust have been the attacks which peopled the South only with ignorant, prejudiced and sadistic white people.

Nowhere else in the world are there more intelligent white people who wish with the deepest concern for justice for the Negroes than in the South. Generally they are not such people as would appear at a riotous mass meeting of whites and blacks screaming as much vituperation as demand for justice. In the South they are not present when mobs of men, careless of the law and the reputation of their section, move cruelly against the Negro. In the South as elsewhere justice is not guarded and cherished by those who scream the loudest in one camp of prejudice or the other.

Judge Horton in recent months has become by his fair and judicial conduct of the case, in which he delivered a magnificent charge which was disregarded by the jury, and by his act of yesterday the foremost representative in the South of the great mass of justice-loving, honorable and intelligent Southerners who wish every protection of justice for their Negro neighbors. As such a leader in such a cause he has shown the way to justice in the Scottsboro case.

That way lies not at all along the path of violence either in speech or act but rather in the dignified following of legal procedure by men who love justice. His act of yesterday was a judicial act. He set aside the outrageous verdict upon the obviously sound grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence in the case. Not once did he turn aside to consider the more violent charges and counter-charges which have come from the attorneys on both sides. He took deliberate and sound legal ground and moved upon it.

It is to be hoped that the example of Judge Horton will be followed by others in the State of Alabama and that the district attorney and the attorney general of the State will, following the course of Judge Horton and viewing the evidence dispassionately, take a nol pros in the cases of all the defendants. Judge Horton has done his duty. Now the procedure lies with others. They have a choice to make which is important not only to the good name of Alabama but to the good name of the entire South.

Nothing is more obvious today than that the sense of fairness of the people of America will never allow the Scotsboro defendants to die for the capital crime with which they are charged. If Alabama determines to continue the trial of these cases and the demand for a capital verdict in them the agitation will continue, the villification of the South will continue, and Southern justice everywhere will remain suspect. But the Negroes will never be legally executed. The practical as well as the just course should dictate that Alabama, moving with dignity as Judge Horton has moved, drop the cases and reassure the nation and the world that justice and reason are still the guides of an advancing South.

APPROVABLE COURSE.

The Scottsboro case in Alabama that has widened to international interest, largely because of studied publicity given it by the defense for the negroes charged with criminal offenses against white girls, is to be re-opened, and the negro who was sentenced to die when convicted by a jury some weeks ago, will receive a new trial.

This turn in the famous case ought to meet with widespread approval throughout the South, where justice is thought of just as highly as in any other section of the country and where racial prejudices are no more ingrained than elsewhere.

Columbia, S. C. Record

SCOTTSBORO DEFLATED.

The Scottsboro case involving the lives of seven Alabama negroes who made the mistake of bumming their way on the same freight train with two white girls, had been laboriously built up into one of those causes celebres that the agitators feed upon.

It was to be the perfect demonstration of Southern injustice, the proof of the failure of the Southern jury system in the face of race prejudice. And like the Sacco-Vanzetti case in Massachusetts, it would be grade A propaganda. Resolutions could be passed and there could be May day parades in which "Remember Scottsboro" banners could be flaunted in the face of a capitalistic civilization.

The seven negroes, again like Sacco and Vanzetti, possibly if not probably would have gone to their deaths in the process. The defendants in these propaganda cases have way of getting lost in the shuffle. If they escape what is there to protest about? When there is obviously no injustice there can be little heat and passion, and there is no cause celebre without heat and passion.

And the Scottsboro cases in their earlier phases served the propagandists' purposes well enough, following the procedure established in such causes celebres. Nine negroes were arrested and eight of them were convicted; seven of them—the supreme court of Alabama freed one—were to die for assaulting the two white girls, whose story an Alabama jury, impanneled immediately, chose to believe, there being no particular reason perhaps then to doubt it.

Before the sentence was carried out however doubts had grown and the cases were appealed. Eventually the controversy reached the supreme court of the United States which reversed the Alabama conviction on the ground that the defendants had not been adequately represented by counsel and had not therefore received the fair trial to which they were entitled. The cases were remanded to Alabama for retrial.

And the second trials, with Haywood Patterson's case as the first to be called, were begun. There had been a lot of loose talk between the two rials, a lot of useless agitation and foolish recriminations. The trial, though a change of venue had been allowed, was conducted in an atmosphere of heat and passion, generated largely by ill-judged interference from the outside.

A second conviction was probably inevitable—Alabama jurors, like New York and Massachusetts jurors, are human and susceptible to influences that ought not perhaps to affect them. There were mistakes made by attorneys for both sides. The prosecution resorted to appeals to prejudice; the defense, having laid the groundwork for an attack before the United States supreme court on the Alabama jury system which permits no negroes to serve as jurors, conducted its case so as to incite prejudices. Patterson was convicted and Samuel S. Leibowitz, the distinguished New York attorney, who had conducted the defense, lost his sense of balance and turned loose from New York a tirade of personal abuse against the jurors who had decided the case against him. Whatever its purpose—and The Record refrains from sitting in judgment on Mr. Leibowitz's purposes and intentions—it made a fair trial for the six other defendants impossible; they had to be tried, if tried at all, by such men as the twelve subjects of Mr. Leibowitz's abuse, men who would resent, as they had a right to resent, the defense attorney's words.

Judge James E. Horton, presiding for the trial, continued the other cases to protect the defendants from the result of their attorney's foolish error and then a few days ago, to the surprise af defense counsel, he handed down an order setting aside the verdict of conviction in Patterson's case and ordering a new trial. The jury's verdict, he held, was against the weight of evidence. The unsupported word of one of the negroes' supposed victims, contradicted by the word of the other, was insufficient testimony upon which to condemn a man to death.

And all persons interested in seeing justice done and especially those concerned about the maintenance of local responsibility and authority in law enforcement will applaud Judge Horton's decision. It is evidence that Alabama courts, in accord with Alabama law, can safeguard themselves against error; it is a demonstration that Alabama can rise not only above prejudice but beyond provocation to see to it that it works no injustice. And it leaves the propagandists frustrate and defeated. Judge Horton has done what seemed impossible; he has deflated the Scottsboro case. The agitators will have to look elsewhere for other victims.

"Drive" Would Have Proceeded.

A tremendous diapason of praise is going up from the American press about Judge Horton's wisdom, his courage, his sense of justice, in granting a new trial to the negro Patterson convicted in the Scottsboro case, and if this same Judge Horton had refused the man a new trial he would have been set down by this same press as a prejudiced, ignorant, sorry and timid fellow.

From which the inference is that in the trial of a criminal case the voice of the American people speaking through the press is sometimes more powerful than the jury system.

Had Judge Horton refused the prisoner a new trial the American "drive" on Alabama and its courts would have proceeded without interruption.

"The Third Crusade"

Frank Lawrence Owsley, professor of history at Vanderbilt University, has written for The American Review an article which he calls "Scottsboro, the Third Crusade." Dr. Owsley is perhaps the leading authority on the North-and-South issue in the history of this country. He draws liberally on his mastery of this field to drive home the contention that the Scottsboro and Dadeville cases prove beyond doubt that, just as abolitionism was the first crusade, and reconstruction the second, in the hell-bent resolve of Eastern industrialism to emasculate Southern agrarianism, so the more recent effort to interfere with the relationship between whites and blacks in this section must be put down as a renewal of that century-old hostility.

The fact that Dr. Owsley is a Black Belt Alabamian gives what he says on this subject a warmth and directness which a more objective method could not have had. Marshaling his evidence with all the skill of a veteran historian, he argues with the immediacy of one who has a deeper knowledge of his material than he could have gotten from mere research. The result is that the historian speaks with much of the power and impressiveness of a prophet. No open-minded reader of this article can fail to obtain a fresh set of values for the testing of the question with which it deals.

The long struggle for abolition was generated by the desire of the Northeast for control of the federal government. This movement was given an idealistic cloak, of course, with the result that the intelligentsia flung itself into the fight as though only the noblest motives were at work to put an end to slavery. That was the first phase of the conflict, ending with Appomattox. Then came reconstruction, when the ignorance and greed of the Negro were played upon in order that the white South might be destroyed, and this also that industrialism might be master in the American household. Now we have the latest phase, when Southern courts are being attacked and the Negro's credulity is being exploited, to the end that the Communist cause may be advanced.

If industrialism was the active antagonist in the first two crusades, it is no less so in the third, because Communism is only another kind of industrialism, the proletarian industrialism, such as we see in power in Soviet Russia. The place which the machine and all that the machine stands for has in Russian life today indicates that the same old enemy, wearing a different face, is malignantly headed for the same goal when Communists undertake to make the Scottsboro cases the spearhead of their propaganda. And the sentimentality with which our modern intelligentsia has taken up and pressed this agitation only accentuates Dr. Owsley's belief that today's "Garrisons, Emersons, Sumners and Phillipses—moralists and intellectual leaders—ignorant of the South and of much of human nature," are engaged in repeating the misguidance of the past.

Dr. Owsley is making his appeal not to Southerners but to intelligent minds elsewhere, and he is basing it on the assumption that what is happening now has happened before, bringing disaster and agony in its train. Abundantly aware of the tragic miscarriage of abolition and reconstruction, he is "exceedingly anxious and seriously alarmed over the present agitation" for "justice to the Negro." He sees that "a poisoned apple is being thrown, once again, for the two races to fight over; that direr consequences than those of the abolition crusade or reconstruction may be in store for the South and for the nation; and that the relationship between the two races will be more greatly strained than ever by the conflict that is being prepared by outsiders for them."

It is not a provincial apologist who is issuing this warning. It is a scholar who views life and civilization broadly and as a whole, and whose grasp of the so-called Negro problem is unexcelled with respect to all that it has meant to the nation in the past. If he bids discerning and thoughtful Americans to "focus this experience upon the present," for the sake of avoiding the blunders of the past, his is a summons which should be heeded if this generation is not to indulge in the typically American tendency of "ignorantly plunging over the same precipices where its fathers and grandfathers plunged." The South has its grievous faults, but so has the North, of a different kind but no less ugly, and so it should proceed to clean its own stables, instead of seeking to unleash ghastly woes and terrors by harassing a people it has bedeviled enough.

CHAMLEE SEEKS BONDS FOR THE 'SCOTTSBORO NEGROES'

George W. Chamlee, International Labor Defense attorney, and member of the staff of counsel for the nine accused negroes in the "Scottsboro case" announced in Chattanooga that he is seeking pledges for a $40,000 bond in an endeavor to get the accused negroes out of jail.

Chamlee stated he planned to circulate a petition in an effort to obtain the names of bondsmen. No bond has been fixed by the court for the defendants and Chamlee stated he did not know whether or not bond would be accepted if he is successful in raising it.

The negroes, now confined in the Jefferson county jail in Birmingham, have been in custody for two years since their arrest in Scottsboro on charges of attacking Mrs. Victoria Price and Ruby Bates. Seven originally were sentenced to death but were granted new trials by the United States supreme court.

Heywood Patterson was re-tried and convicted again in the Morgan circuit court here on a change of venue. The verdict, however, was set aside later by Judge James E. Horton in circuit court at a hearing held in Athens.

New dates for trials of Patterson and the other negroes have not been set.

Re-Trial For Haywood Patterson

All friends of justice, and in particular of the good name of the South, will applaud the decision of Judge James E. Horton in ordering a second re-trial for Haywood Patterson, one of the negroes indicted in the notorious Scottsboro case. Two white women had testified at Patterson's first trial that he was one of a crowd of negroes who attacked them as they were hoboing on a freight train in Alabama in 1931. But at the second one of them changed her testimony and declared that the whole case was a "frame-up." The United States Supreme court last September had ordered new trials for the seven of the accused still in captivity.

All will recall the particularly exasperating conduct of Patterson's case by Samuel Leibowitz, of New York, who was apparently out to have his client convicted in the cause of radical movements throughout the world, rather than secure justice for a man he considered innocent. But Leibowitz was not on trial, and it is an excellent thing for the South's reputation in the world that Judge Horton, refusing to be put aside by the deep feeling which the case has aroused both for and against the negroes, considered the case entirely on its merits, entirely on the question whether the testimony of the woman who stuck to her original story could be believed. It was natural, as he pointed out, that a man should not be sent to his death on the unsupportred word of that woman. And the fact that the state at the original trial did not put up a white hobo, Orville Gilley, as an eye-witness, although he was then in custody, was a further damaging fact cited by the court.

It was indicated by Thomas E. Knight, Jr., the attorney general who prosecuted the case, that he would proceed with a new trial for Patterson. But we may hope that since the state had already made its best case, only to have the verdicts twice set aside, Alabama will put an end to so unseemly an affair by dropping prosecution not only of Patterson but the other defendants.

A TORCH FOR SOUTHERN JUSTICE

Southern justice—for long under a shadow in the eyes of enlightened public opinion—has taken a notable step forward.

Judge James E. Horton has done what few Southern jurists would dare to do; he has taken issue with the race prejudice which has made it so difficult for a Negro to obtain a fair trial in the South.

Judge Horton has granted a new trial to Russell Patterson, the Negro convicted and sentenced to death in the famous Scottsboro case. He has done so, he says, on the ground that the jury verdict was not in accord with the evidence.

The evidence, observes the Judge, "greatly preponderates in favor of the defendant." As to the women who charged the youths with attacking them, he comments:

> "The tendency on the part of the women shows they are predisposed to make false accusations upon any occasion whereby their selfish ends may be gained."

The recent trial of Patterson was admittedly a farce.

But the youth's chances of winning out over racial prejudice were not helped by the efforts of Communists to make capital of the case.

Judge Horton's decision now cleans the slate, and starts the case over again.

That decision is not only a victory for the defense; it is a victory for justice in Alabama.

[illegible] Trial For Patterson.

[illegible] James Horton of Athens, Alabama, has granted a motion for a new trial for Heywood Patterson, one of the nine Negroes indicted in the now famous "Scottsboro case," setting aside the conviction with its death penalty recently imposed in the Morgan County Circuit Court. That was the second time Patterson had been tried and sentenced to death. The eight other Negroes alleged to have attacked two white women in a box car of a freight train between Chattanooga and Scottsboro have also been convicted and given the death penalty, and now await another trial.

Pointing out that the law declares a defendant should not be convicted without corroboration where the testimony of the prosecutrix bears on its face indications of unreliability or improbability, and particularly when it is contradicted by other evidence, Judge Horton said "the testimony of the prosecutrix in this case is not only uncorroborated but it also bears on its face indications of improbability and is contradicted by other evidence, and in addition thereto the evidence greatly preponderates in favor of the defendant." Therefore he granted the motion for a new trial.

Whether Patterson and the Negroes accused with him can be assured a fair trial in Alabama may be questioned. And this not so much because of race prejudice in that State as because of the actions and outgivings of some members of counsel for the defense. Reference is particularly to Samuel Leibowitz of New York, engaged by one or two radical organizations in that city. If these organizations are to continue to employ lawyers to defend the Negroes they should realize the wisdom of dispensing with the services of Leibowitz.

Twilight of the Scottsboro Case

Judge Horton's setting aside of the conviction of Haywood Patterson, one of the Negro defendants in the Scottsboro case, marks the beginning of the end of this notorious prosecution. He was convicted mainly on the testimony of one of the two white girl hoboes who figured in the episode in the freight car, the other one having abjured her original concurrence in the accusation and told the jury in the Haywood trial that the accused Negroes were not guilty of the crime charged. Judge Horton, allowing the motion of the defense that the conviction of Haywood be set aside, holds that the testimony of the prosecutrix was not corroborated and that it "bears on its face indications of improbability and is contradicted by other evidence."

Since it is certain that the testimony of the prosecutrix will be no better corroborated at any future trial than it was in the trial of last April, Judge Horton's present condemnation of this evidence as untrustworthy practically insures the collapse of any further efforts to procure a conviction. The opinion is that of a judge who presided over a tempestuous case with such conspicuous fairness that he earned the praise of counsel for both sides and the commendation of the entire American press, Alabama's included. His appraisal of Victoria Price's trustworthiness as a prosecuting witness is not one that can be ignored by any judge who may be assigned to the case in the future, and will assuredly play an important part in any consideration an appellate court may have occasion to give the case should a retrial of Haywood Patterson result in another conviction and appeal. Practically speaking, the Scottsboro case is now in a state of collapse. A few scenes remain still to be enacted, but the curtain is not far off. When it falls all the defendants will be free.

In so far as the Virginian-Pilot has been able to discern the truth about the freight car episode from the testimony adduced during the Scottsboro and Decatur trials, such a termination will be in accord with justice. Whether the accused be white or black, the judicial process can have no other objective. Courts are not instituted for the purpose of keeping any racial elements "in their place." Neither is it their mission to preserve ruling castes in their fancied prerogatives. Their reason for being, in the South as elsewhere, is to apply to all persons within their jurisdiction the equal protection and penalties of the law with that complete disregard of racial or social prejudice that is prescribed by the Constitution. That, we are satisfied, is what Judge Horton, as one of the instrumentalities of Alabama's judicial system, has done. It should be a matter of deep satisfaction to Alabama that justice is about to be done in this highly disturbing and highly unpleasant case through its own courts, even though it is true that if the Supreme Court of the United States had not intervened, that satisfaction would have been denied it.

The "Scottsboro Case."

Haywood Patterson and possibly others of the nine young Negroes involved in the "Scottsboro case" are expected to be placed on trial again at an early day. All of the defendants have been tried and convicted and sentenced to death, and Patterson has been tried and convicted a second time since the cases were remanded for a new trial.

At the first trial Mrs. Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, two young white women, testified that they were criminally assaulted by the Negroes while returning from Chattanoooga to Scottsboro in a box car of a freight train. It was on this testimony that all of the defendants were convicted. At the second trial of Patterson, Mrs. Price stuck to her first story, but the Bates girl, who had been mysteriously absent from the community for some time, appeared as the trial was closing and repudiated the testimony she gave at the first hearing. Reports stated that she had been in New York City, where the Civil Liberties Union and the International Labor defense have their headquarters, and returned to Scottsboro or Decatur "very much dressed up."

Judge James E. Horton of Athens, who presided at Patterson's second trial, set aside the death sentence imposed by the jury, holding that the "evidence greatly preponderates in favor of the defendant." That, presumably, was because the Bates girl changed her story. Judge Horton in his written opinion called attention to the fact that while Orville Gilley, a young Negro of Guntersville, Alabama, was supposed to have been an eyewitness to the alleged attacks, the State had not placed him on the stand. It appears that the prosecution was unable to locate Gilley during the Patterson trial. A recent report from Montgomery stated that he had returned to Alabama and reiterated his statement that he witnessed the attacks and had given Attorney-General Knight an affidavit purported to corroborate the story of Victoria Price.

The Civil Liberties Union or the International Labor Defense, or both, will continue to employ council to defend the accused Negroes. Former United States Senator Heflin of Alabama has offered his services to the Attorney-General in having Judge Horton removed from jurisdiction in the case. The outlook for a fair and an orderly trial of the Negroes, and for an early ending of the "Scottsboro case," is not encouraging.

ALABAMA'S CURSE

THAT trouble making body—The International Labor Defense League, with headquarters in New York City—has invaded Alabama again and as a result trouble has arisen in the execution of justice in the courts of that state.

This organized body from up north is remembered for its repeated interference in the famous Scottsboro, Ala., case of nine negroes held for attacking two white girls and the repeated attempts of the courts to dispose of these charges.

Now comes the I. L. D. again and at Tuscaloosa their lawyers attempted to interfere in defending a negro boy held for the murder of a young white girl.

The presiding judge in this case postponed the trial after ruling that the I. L. D. barristers could not appear as defense attorneys as the defendant did not desire them and in order to protect them from any mob violence they were given a military escort to Birmingham from which point, it is hoped, they will catch a train north for their home and stay up there.

Alabama has shown itself for years as capable of rendering justice in its court. No mob violence has appeared in the Tuscaloosa case against the negro boy and the citizens of that town were content to let the courts decide the fate of this accused murderer.

It is high time that some action be taken to keep the I. L. D. bunch out of our southern courts for they only tend to stir up trouble and thwart the execution of justice.

Alabama's curse has become the South's problem and this inter-sectional legal interference will only tend to make matters worse unless the practice is halted immediately.

The patience of a people will last only so long and after that the I. L. D. had better look for a cooler climate.

Montgomery County was at its best in its conduct with regard to George Meadows and Frank Jackson, indicted for highway robbery and assault upon a young woman, and tried on the indictment for highway robbery.

Here was a situation that appealed powerfully to the mob spirit. Men and women were stirred deeply by what had occurred.

Yet our Montgomery people restrained themselves. They believed that the law could be trusted to do its full duty, and so they did not attempt to take the law into their own hands.

Promptly and swiftly, but not too swiftly, a Montgomery grand jury brought indictments against the offenders.

With equal promptness and swiftness, a Montgomery County petit jury put these offenders to trial, and convicted them, and a Montgomery County judge pronounced the death penalty upon them.

There was no disorder at the trial. There were no threats of mob violence. The Sheriff of Montgomery County and the Chief of Police of the City of Montgomery, put enough men on guard against the possibility of mob violence to insure order, and there was no difficulty.

It was not necessary for the Governor of Alabama to call out the National Guard. The people of Montgomery County are plainly disposed to be orderly and law-abiding.

There does not seem to be any ground for reasonable doubt of the guilt of these men. The fact that they were indicted quickly and tried quickly is no evidence that they were railroaded.

The fact that Montgomery County did not attempt to organize a mob is creditable to this county. Montgomery is accustomed to acting creditably in such circumstances.

HULL HOUSE SETTLES THE SCOTTSBORO CASE

HULL HOUSE in Chicago has become famous throughout the world because of the fact that it is the nucleus for one of the finest adventures in social settlement work undertaken in this generation. It is inseparably connected with the name of Jane Addams, conceded to be one of the foremost of American women, and has become a center of attraction for visitors to the fair during the celebration of the Century of Progress.

But all who have visited Hull House have not come away in a pleasant frame of mind. A case in point is furnished by a well-known Annistonian who was there recently and found that this noted institution was being used for the purpose of stirring up race prejudice and casting aspersions on the courts of this state. The gentleman in question brought back a prospectus of a meeting that was held on September 5 under the auspices of the Chicago Scottsboro Action Committee, reading as follows:

"The purpose of the meeting is to acquaint professional people in Chicago with the facts concerning the conviction of the Scottsboro boys of a crime which no unprejudiced person believes they committed. There is wide-spread feeling that these boys have been convicted not because of the alleged crime of rape but because of the color of their skin.

"Professor Robert Morss Lovett is chairman of the Chicago Scottsboro Action Committee. Speakers for the meetings include Ruby Bates, the principal witness for the prosecution, who at the second trial exposed the frame-up and declared the boys innocent; Mrs. Ada Wright, the mother of the youngest of the boys; Llewellyn Jones, well-known journalist; Thyra Edwards and A. G. Falls, M. D."

It is to be regretted that Miss Addams and her backers should allow the famous Hull House to be used for so partisan a purpose as this meeting probably proved to be. She probably is suffering from the same ignorance of Southern conditions that characterized Lady Perkins, Secretary of Labor, in her famous intimation that the people of this section do not wear shoes. If Miss Addams would come down to Alabama and sit in on one of the hearings of the Scottsboro case, she might conclude, as does Elmer Davis in the August Harper's, that there was no more of racial prejudice in the trial of this case than there was in the notorious Sacco-Vanzetti case in the East, or in the unpardonable race riots of a few years ago in Chicago.

The people of Alabama have an open mind as to the guilt and innocence of the Scottsboro boys, but they resent the exploitation of Ruby Bates and others who were involved in the case by the pink Socialists of the North, and Miss Addams should have studiously avoided becoming involved with this class of our citizenry.

Star Scottsboro Witness Comes Back To Testify

Orville Gilley, Who Looked On At Crime In Gondola Returns From California

Says Ruby Lied

Volunteers Affidavit That Negroes Held Attacked Two White Girls On Car

Advertiser 6-24-33

By GEORGE L. DAVIS

Orville Gilley, missing star witness in the Scottsboro case and designated as the only white man to witness the alleged attacks by 12 negroes on Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, has returned to Alabama to testify for the State, it was learned yesterday.

The Attorney General's office yesterday confirmed reports from Athens, Ala., that Gilley appeared there Thursday and conferred with Atty. Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., and Thomas L. Lawson, assistant attorney general.

Gilley, it was learned, submitted an affidavit in which he declared that he was aboard the gondola on the freight train with the girls and negroes; that he witnessed the attacks on both Victoria Price and Ruby Bates and declared that the nine defendants subsequently arrested at Paint Rock, Ala., committed the assaults.

The Attorney General's office declined to reveal the full details of Gilley's sworn statement but declared that in virtually every detail his affidavit corroborated the testimony of Victoria Price.

Gilley explained his absence by declaring that when the first trials were concluded that he thought the case was closed, and that only upon his recent return to Alabama did he learn of the subsequent developments, including the testimony of Ruby Bates in the second trial, to the effect that neither she nor Victoria Price was attacked. Gilley said he had been in California and in other parts of the country and would be present to tell the truth when the next trial is called.

Failure of the State to produce Gilley in the second trial of Heywood Patterson, alleged ringleader in the case, drew criticism from the press of the country, and on Thursday from Judge James E. Horton, of the Morgan Circuit Court, in granting Patterson a new trial.

Atty. Gen. Knight was out of the city yesterday and could not be reached for a statement. At his office, however, it was stated that "The prosecution of the Scottsboro cases would not be abated," and hope was expressed for an early new trial of Patterson.

Patterson's next trial probably will be called in August or September, it was said.

Important Testimony

The importance of Gilley as a witness was emphasized by the testimony of Ruby Bates in the second trial, who repudiated her testimony in the first trial, the State being forced to rely principally upon the testimony of Victoria Price and the defendant Patterson's testimony in the first trial, to obtain a conviction.

In the first trial the defendant Patterson testified that he did not attack the girls but that he was on top of a boxcar that overlooked the gondola in which the girls and negroes were riding. He testified in his first trial that he witnessed from the top of the boxcar the fight between the negroes and the white men, in which all white men, except Gilley, were thrown from the gondola and that he saw the negroes attack the girls.

This testimony of Patterson's in his first trial, and a part of the record before the Alabama Supreme Court and the United States Supreme Court, was introduced in evidence in Patterson's second trial and Patterson, in his second trial, made a sweeping denial of his testimony in the first trial.

Adv. 6-24-33

In the first trial Gilley was used as a witness but was only questioned regarding the fight that took place between the negroes and the white men aboard the car. The Attorney Generals department did not participate in the first trial which was at Scottsboro and was conducted by the solicitor of the Jackson Circuit Court.

Montgomery Ala.

Since the time Atty. Gen. Knight has endeavored to locate Gilley who because of his wanderings was as elusive as an eel. Gilley is a true "knight of the road" who profoundly abhors work and who since March, 19[illegible], has been "bumming" his way over the county. Much of his time since then, it was said, has been spent in California.

Judge Horton, who presided at Patterson's second trial, in granting Patterson another new trial Thursday questioned the credibility of Victoria Price's testimony. He declared her testimony was "contradictory, often evasive" and lack corroboration by the other girl in the case, Ruby Bates, who has repudiated her first story of the attack.

"Evidence," he said, "greatly preponderated in favor of the defendant."

Heflin Scores Judge.

From Lafayette, Ala., yesterday J. Thomas Heflin, former United States Senator, forwarded a copy of a telegram sent Attorney General Knight in which he offered his aid "in having Judge Horton relieved from further consideration of these cases."

His telegram to Atty. Gen. Knight follows:

"I share with you the keen disappointment and resentment that you feel over the strange and amazing action of Judge Horton in the Scottsboro rape cases, and I will be glad to assist you free of charge in having Judge Horton relieved from further consideration of these cases and in having another judge appointed to try the Scottsboro negroes. This dallying with the Scottsboro rapists is a humiliating insult to the white race in Alabama and the very worst thing that could happen to the law abiding negroes of this state. It is putting wicked thoughts in the minds of lawless negro men and greatly increasing the danger to the white women of Alabama.

"Let justice be done and done speedily so there will be no more bribing of witnesses and brazen interferences with court trials for rape in Alabama."

RABBIS ON SCOTTSBORO

MILWAUKEE, June 23.—(AP)—Citing the Scottsboro negro trial as an example of "social and racial injustice," and the rule of Chancellor Hitler in Germany as a "threat to world peace," commission reports offered at the convention of the central conference of American Rabbis, today urged Jews to give their best thought to these problems.

Rabbi Edward L. Israel, of Baltimore, Md., read the report of the conference committee on social justice. It condemned "conditions existing in several sections of our land which seem to offer evidence of the inability of the negro to secure economic or civil justice.

The subject was the outgrowth of a rift between the congregation Beth-Or, of Montgomery, Ala., and its rabbi over the rabbi's expressions and activities in the Scottsboro case.

Rabbi Morris Newfield, of Birmingham, Ala., president of the conference, deplored a lack of unity of American Jewry in meeting the problems created by Hitler's anti-Semetic activities.

THE POOR WHITE.

The poor white, as well as the Negro, is a victim of social injustice in the Southland. This fact is not generally known in the North where the impression prevails that the only economic serfs are of dusky hue. In last Sunday's issue of the Mirror, Ruby Bates, one of the principals in the Scottsboro case, gave a true picture of the lowly life lead by a class of white Americans looked down upon by both educated and illiterate Negroes.

Ruby Bates says she was a slave in Alabama, as were her mother and grandmother. To quote her word for word:

> My mother has often repeated to me how her mother had often said to her: "I have been a slave all my life ever since I can remember." And my mother has often told me that she had been nothing but a slave all her life. She didn't know what pleasure was and she never got anywhere. She had to stay home and all the time work. She was not let to play with other children. My mother has often told me that her life wasn't any different from her mother's life. And my life hasn't been much different from my mother's life. I have been nothing but a slave for other people.

The mother of Ruby Bates did not go to school until 11 years old, and then for a short time under the most adverse conditions. The daughter saw very little of the class room. When five years old she had to take a 24-pound flour sack, throw it across her shoulders, go into the cotton field and pick cotton. She had to fill the sack seven times a day. From place to place her father would move to eke out a miserable existence as a sharecropper.

At 8 years old Ruby Bates relates that she had to do the washing when her mother was sick. After cleaning up she would work in the fields until ten o'clock. Then she would return to the house and cook dinner. Following the scanty meal she returned to the field and labored until it was time to get something together for supper.

Describing her father as a drunkard who fought with his brother, whipped his son and was jailed, Ruby Bates tells of the family fleeing to another town to get away from him. Her mother took in washing and ironing and the children at times did not have a change of clothing. After getting out of jail, Bates followed them, took what little clothes they had which he gave to some other woman he had taken up with, and her children.

The Bates family represents a type of citizenry that abounds in the Southland which does more to keep back the wheels of progress than any other factor. It is responsible for lynchings and an easy prey for unscrupulous politicians seeking to arouse racial ill-feeling by raising the "race equality" issue. Ignorance is rampant among these people. Their outlook on life is so sordid and twisted that they are sore and bitter with the world. They are the South's biggest problem; not the Negro.

'Scottsboro' Negro's Retrial Ordered by Alabama Court

ATHENS, Ala., June 22.—(AP)—Twice convicted and sentenced to death, Heywood Patterson, one of the nine negro defendants in the Scottsboro case, today was granted a third trial by Judge James E. Horton.

In a lengthy opinion the jurist who presided at Patterson's second trial when he was convicted in Morgan circuit court at Decatur, April 9, on a charge of attacking Mrs. Victoria Price, held "that evidence greatly preponderated in favor of the defendant."

The decision was on an application for a new trial filed by defense counsel and Judge Horton permitted no arguments, launching immediately into reading his 26-page opinion. After he finished the judge said trial of Patterson and the other defendants would not be set before late August or in September.

Attorney-General Thomas E. Knight Jr., directing the prosecution, previously had asked that the trials be set for an early date, saying "the state is ready at any time to begin a new trial."

Patterson originally was convicted in Jackson circuit court at Scottsboro in April, 1931, and was the first of the negroes to be retried after the United States supreme court set aside verdicts returned there on grounds the defendants were not properly represented by attorneys.

Reading from the long opinion, Judge Horton said "as heretofore stated, the law declares that a defendant should not be convicted without corroboration where the testimony of the prosecutrix bears on its face indications of unreliability, or improbability and particularly when it is contradicted by other evidence."

Repudiated Testimony.

Ruby Bates, second victim of the alleged attack aboard a Southern Railway freight train as it rumbled through the hills of north Alabama, appeared dramatically at the second trial of Patterson in Decatur and repudiated testimony she gave at the first trial in Scottsboro. The alleged attack occurred as the girls, clad in overalls, were hoboing from Chattanooga to their home at Huntsville, Alabama.

"As human life is at stake," Judge Horton said in his opinion, "not only this defendant but of eight others, the court does and should approach consideration of this motion with a feeling of deep responsibility and shall endeavor to give it that thought and study it deserves. . . . Deliberate injustice is more fatal to the one who imposes than the one on whom it is imposed."

Explaining he had studied law and evidence in the case for many days the judge cited decisions of both the Alabama supreme court and the court of appeals in similar cases where reversals had been obtained because of uncorroborated evidence given by the prosecutrix and holding doubt as to the credibility

Considers Evidence.

"The court of necessity will consider in detail the evidence of the prosecutrix, Victoria Price," the opinion continued, "to determine if her evidence is reliable or whether it is corroborated, or contradicted by the other evidence in the case.

"History, sacred and profane, and the common experience of mankind, teach that women of the character shown in this case are prone for selfish reasons to make false accusations both of rape and of insult, upon the slightest provocation or even without provocation for ulterior motives.

"These women are shown by a great weight of evidence, on this very day before leaving Chattanooga, to have falsely accused two negroes of insulting them, and of almost precipitating a fight between one of the white boys they were in company with and two negroes. This tendency on the part of the women shows they are predisposed to make false accusations upon any occasion whereby their selfish ends may be gained."

Cites Doctor's Testimony.

Judge Horton went into the testimony of Dr. Bridges, who examined the women at Scottsboro, which he said failed to show that Mrs. Price had been attacked.

Judge Horton said that of the seven white boys on the train and in the fight none was put on the stand "except Lester Carter and he contradicted her."

The witness, the judge said, had testified to seeing Victoria Price commit acts of adultery with Jack Tiller and that the prosecutrix had admitted knowing Tiller, whom Carter identified in court.

"Lester Carter stated that he was one of the seven boys engaged in the fight and that he did not see a single knife or pistol in the hands of the negroes," said Judge Horton. "And although these seven white boys were kept in jail at Scottsboro, no one testified to any knife or pistol wounds on any of them." Victoria Price had testified in both trials that the negroes were armed with knives and a pistol and during the alleged attack one of them held a knife at her throat."

WELL-WRITTEN BUT ENTIRELY BEYOND US IN ALL ITS IMPLICATIONS

To the Editor of the Evening Post:

Sir—A judge in the Southern State of Alabama has granted a new trial to a young Negro, twice convicted of an attack upon a white girl. Proceeding on the theory that a great human action is always simple and unclouded by motives, it is obvious to any one but an inquisitive and pestiferous being that such a gesture is beyond examination. Yet it was not too much to expect of your editorial writer the impudence of observing that if the judge had not done what he did, the Supreme Court would have been called upon to inject legal adrenalin in the dying body of the Civil War amendments; that, if the Supreme Court performed that delicate operation, the South would be as pleased as an heir watching an ancestor recover from an illness; that the South, like all civilized communities, knows and cherishes "face"; that Judge Horton be sent as delegate to the sacred Japanese universities of "face"—he may teach them a thing or two about the subject.

ANOTHER SCOTTSBORO DECISION

Judge James E. Horton, in the Alabama court in which the first of the Scottsboro negro defendants had a second trial and second conviction with death sentence, has set aside the verdict. In his decision he says that the jury came to a conclusion at variance with the evidence, the preponderance of which was in favor of the convicted defendant. In the second trial of these young ~~negroes,~~ removed from the scene of their first trial to remove it from prejudices and passions, only one witness, one of the white hobo girls, stuck to the story which brought conviction in the first instance. The other woman repudiated her story and the prosecution declared that she had been tampered with by the New York radical organizations which had undertaken the defense.

It has been a tradition in parts of the south that the story of a white woman is proof against any denials or even any evidence to the contrary in such a case. The methods used by the New York defense attorney and committee were ill calculated to permit justice to keep the upper hand in a trial necessarily confronted with the deepest racial prejudice and preconceptions. It was observed at the time that the defense by indicting the people themselves was preventing a free exercise of justice, troubled as its course would have been at best.

Judge Horton's decision granting a new trial indicates that the legal purpose of the south is to prevail not only against the passions of the easily aroused people of a community but in spite of the provocations afforded by violent criticism. Criticism is hard to stop when any section of the country permits violence to pay little heed to humanities and rights, and it is sometimes the case that this criticism only stiffens the purposes of the people at fault. But the bar and the judiciary in the south show a determination to make law the rule, even when community sentiment is deeply stirred and impatient to punish, regardless of evidence and lawful proceeding. The administration of justice in the control of such men will prevail. The south is developing a sensitiveness on that subject and Judge Horton expressed it.—Chicago Tribune.

Leibowitz's Misplaced Praise

Daily Worker 6-26-33

New York, N.Y.

SAMUEL S. LEIBOWITZ, trial lawyer in the Patterson trial, in commenting on Judge Horton's decision, is reported in the New York Times as having said that "the South is to be congratulated in having as one of its jurists that courageous, brilliant lawyer, James E. Horton. From the very start I felt that the courts of Alabama would never uphold the verdict of guilty returned by the jury in the Decatur courtroom."

This statement by Leibowitz at the present time will no better serve the defense fight than the statement he made immediately after the Patterson verdict, in which he characterized virtually the entire South as "lantern-jawed morons."

Mr. Leibowitz, who—in pursuing the line of the I.L.D.—so skillfully bared the whole system of lynch justice in the South, should know that Judge Horton received his orders at the time he renied the defense motion to set aside the Patterson verdict and that he received his orders once more when he decided yesterday to order a new trial for Haywood Patterson.

Let there be no illusions on the subject: Judge Horton's decision does not automatically free the nine innocent Scottsboro boys. Although by his own words regarding Victoria Price, Judge Horton practically is forced to admit that the frame-up against the Scottsboro boys rests on the flimsiest of foundations, nevertheless the bosses of Alabama will not so easily relinquish their victims. To talk otherwise only strengthens the hands of the lynchers.

Says White Christian God Must Be Southerner and Capitalist

Davis Lee Thinks Decatur Trial Proves Breakdown of Christianity As It Is Practiced by the White South. "White Heaven and Hell Hokum" Used to Exploit People Further, He Says.

By DAVIS LEE

The outrageous verdict in the trial of Haywood Patterson at Decatur, Alabama, has caused every intelligent [illegible] blood to curdle with anger.

But let us pause a moment. Where is that god of the white Christians that our people rave and froth at the mouth about? That God that we in the United States built 52,000 churches to serve, that one for whom we make every sacrifice? The old Bible-backs will have to give us young men more evidence of a true God, a just One, or our church and its white Christianity is doomed as far as we are concerned.

Young people have listened with extreme fortitude to their absurd and asinine ravings about their white God, but from the treatment accorded us, the way that innocent members are lynched and crucified on the cross of prejudice and white supremacy, we are forced to the conclusion that Christianity is a huge joke, and only serves to further the unjust oppression and exploitation of us, and that this god is a myth.

No people on earth are persecuted, abused and shamefully, ruthlessly exploited as we are. And there are no people on earth so deeply religious. Surely if the white Christian god is any god he ity would offer some protection to his little black lambs, as an incentive to further obedience if nothing else, and save them from the mobocrats.

Just how long are the people going to remain blindfolded to the obvious? How long are they going to embrace so tenaciously a doctrine that is an insult to intelligence, that has enslaved them for thousands of centuries and today is used by others to exploit them?

Decatur a Blow to White Christianity

The Decatur fiasco is one of the greatest blows that Christianity has ever received. It has not only caused us to think, but has demonstrated conclusively that if there is a god he must be a southerner and a capitalist.

We are discriminated against segregated, oppressed and exploited by the white man because of our religious and superstitious susceptibilities. Our religious credulity helps him to impose such injustices. Ignorance and superstition are the parents of religion and Christianity. They are carbuncles on the neck of human progress. Religion is the tool used by the Heflins and Bleases to keep the Negro in servile subjection, and the Negro minister and other religious disseminators are innocent and ignorant conspirators to this end.

A Little Evidence

If the white Christian leaders hope to keep the Negro youth shackled to the cross of their fallacious doctrines, they will have to first produce a little evidence of a god, instead of wasting valuable time in the indulgence of hagiological orgies.

People say believe in the white god because they do not understand the laws of nature. The mystery of creation and other equally as confusing and perplexing phenomena forces the average person to the conclusion that there must be a God. The mind is insusceptible to scientific knowledge. The person who believes in such hokum lacks the power of reason and shuns logic because it brings him face to face with reality. I have met folk who would rather believe in a white god because such belief, no matter how absurd, took the bitterness out of life. The life-after-death belief removes the drudgery and monotony of one's existence which is supplanted with false hope and faith.

Youthof Today

This false hope and faith have been the prop upon which our black people have leaned for three centuries. But the youth of today is not going to kid his way through life with the prop of false hope and faith. Only a fool wants to go through life propelled by false hope and faith. The intelligent person wants to learn as much about these mysteries as he can, and he will not accept the beliefs of others and be content. He will exhaust every bit of available information and then use his own power of reason to decide what he shall believe and what he shall not believe.

This writer has sat and listened to religious morons shouting "you can take all dis ole world, but gimme Jesus!" and that is why they cannot obtain a fair trial for those nine innocent boys.

Righteousness or Knowledge

We "thirst" too much after righteousness and not enough after knowledge, and in this lies the source of all our troubles. Ignorant but well meaning black mothers and fathers preach and inculcate the white heaven-and-hell hokum into their progeny, and the children naturally accept such teaching as true without investigation or thought. Filial respect faith and confidence prevent them from delving below the surface for the truth. They appear content to have others do their thinking and chart their future modes of living.

Few More Trials

But a few more trials like that of Patterson of Decatur, will contribute much to the collapse of white Christianity and usher many new recruits into the ranks of the antis; and even if the nine boys do pay the supreme penalty for an offense they did not perpetrate, they will not have lived in vain.

The newspaper has contributed much to the enlightenment of a grossly ignorant and backward group, but it will not be able to do what it should until we young people of the craft purge journalism of those old narrow-minded, intolerant and bigoted Bible-backs that grace the editorial tripods of 90 per cent of our papers.

Out and in Dates

If we had a few more Eugene Gordons, Langston Hugheses, George S. Schuylers, Arnold DeMilles, L. F. Coleses, Willian N. Joneses, Frank Marshall Davises and "fewer" Kelly Millers, Gordon Hancocks, DuBoises, William Pickenses and the rest of that outdated clan, we could probably, in a decade or so, eradicate much of the ignorance and superstition now extant, and be able to obtain fair and impartial trials for members of our group even in Alabama.

NEW LITERARY LUMINARY

Miss Ruby Bates, formerly of Huntsville, Ala., and other points but now nobly of New York City, has become a writer.

Her first and latest contribution is not without literary merit. It is a colorful account of her life, and times, touched here and there with comment on the celebrated Class Strife in the South.

The New York Daily Mirror, in which her touching story is printed, has illustrated the article with elaborately-colored photographs of Miss Bates, cabins and cotton blooms.

On the front page of The Mirror appears a caption under a picture of the author, which announces: "Miss Bates, as many other women of the South, occasionally dips snuff." Just when the announcement was made, we do not know. However, the photograph was not examined closely.

Miss Bates says she does not like the South and does not expect to return to Alabama. Somehow she seems to think that Alabamians failed to "understand" her pilgrimages to the North.

Judged without bias it must be said that under the circumstances, her work is nearly perfect so far as literary merit is concerned.

The language is simple and direct. And unlike too many personal essays on the South it does not suffer from over-use of finely-polished phrases.

The young authoress, however, is more an artist than a factual reporter. She perhaps would do better with pure fiction, if you know what we mean.

One thing we can say for the male sob sister who ghosted the story for the girl is that not once is the phrase "You-all" used, although the "quaint Elizabethan English as it is spoken in the South" was more or less abused, we think.

For those who have a strong stomach and a heavy sense of humor, the article is recommended.

What The South Does With White "Scottsboro" Boys

THE most depressing thing about the Warrenton, Va., trial of four white men on charges of attempting to rape a 14-year-old colored girl was the openly asserted theory that the violation of the person of a colored female by white men does not constitute rape.

Throughout the trial, Mr. Flynn, white Virginia defense attorney, using insulting epithets to refer to Negroes, argued that the assaulting of colored girls by white men is no crime, and that he had never heard of such sexual relations being termed rape.

If Mr. Flynn had read this law he would have seen nothing in it saying that rape was a crime depending on the color of the victim. But Mr. Flynn did not want to deal with justice and law. He wanted to appeal to the prejudices of the jury in order to have his clients benefit by a miscarriage of justice. Proof of this intention on his part is seen in his questioning each juror if he had been born and reared in Virginia.

Having asked this question, the defense attorney said in his argument:

"I ask you, gentlemen, if you were born in Virginia, because if you were you would know now the d—— stretch their imaginations and you could realize how this tale has spread until it engulfs these four white men.

"I was born in Virginia and I have never heard of a WHITE man raping a d—— girl in this state. If we put all the good white boys in the pen who have fooled with d—— girls we would have some GOOD white men in the penitentiary."

The impunity with which white men can violate colored women in the South must be based on some unwritten law such as this. It is not often that it is so openly used as a defense for white men accused of the heinous crime.

Perhaps it is such an unwritten law which won fredom for Mark Robinson, white, on a charge of criminally assaulting a 17-year-old Greensboro, N. C., girl recently, after luring her away from her home on the cruel pretxt of having a job for her in his parents' home.

There were, unfortunately, no eyewitnesses to the crime. Against the straightforward testimony of the young victim, against her positive identification in court of Robinson as her attacker, despite the introduction of no evidence to show the girl was not telling the truth, the accused man set up the alibi that he was at his parents' home at the time of the crime, and officers added that when Robinson was first brought before her at her home she did not then identify him.

Innocence does not seem to have been clear-cut enough to warrant Judge Thomas J. Shaw to direct a verdict of acquittal as he did. The evidence against Robinson was a hundred times more damaging than that against many colored men who have been sentenced to die on rape charges. Certainly there was a thousand times more reasonable doubt of the guilt of the Scottsboro boys than there was of Robinson's guilt.

Had the victims in these two cases been white girls and the suspects colored boys or men, would such flimsy defense arguments have won the suspects their acquittal? Not a chance. As long as the South holds the crime of rape lightly in one set of circumstances because of the color or race of the victim, just so long will it undermine the firmness of the public opinion which makes our laws effective.

The judge at Warrenton is not reported as having rebuked the defense attorney in that case for introducing his outrageous line of argument—colored women can't be raped by white men—but he was derelict in the extreme in his duty if he did not. It is encouraging that even this unwarranted argument and appeal to race prejudices did not wholly blind the jury in the Warrenton case to the real question, the guilt or innocence of the accused four men. They found them guilty, fixing their sentences at three years each in prison. The judge ruled against a defense motion to set the verdicts aside.

At least then, this Virginia judge and jury were not totally poisoned by a vicious and prejudiced argument on the part of an unprincipled attorney defending men guilty of raping a mere girl.

Heywood Patterson's Conviction Is Set Aside by Trial Judge James E. Horton

6-23-33

ATHENS, Ala., June 22 (AP)—Heywood Patterson, one of nine Negro defendants in the Scottsboro case, was granted a new trial today by an Alabama trial court—the same one that sentenced him to death April 9 when he was convicted of assaulting a white girl hobo.

Judge James E. Horton set aside Patterson's conviction on contention the testimony of the prosecutrix was not corroborated and "bears on its face indications of improbability and is contradicted by other evidence."

Macon Ga.

"Constitutional law still prevails in Alabama," said George Chamlee, Sr., of Chattanooga, when the decision was announced.

Attorney General Thomas E. Knight, Jr., who prosecuted Patterson, asked the court to set an early date for a new trial.

"The state is ready at any time to begin a new trial and will do so if it pleases the court," Knight said.

Judge Horton said after the hearing that trial of the cases would not be set before late August or in September.

No Arguments Permitted

Knight was visibly disappointed at the decision.

"It is a great victory," said Osmond W. Fraenkel, of New York, another defense attorney. "There are still just judges in Alabama."

Judge Horton allowed no arguments. Chamlee asked Horton if he would consider a motion to dismiss indictments against all the defendants.

The jurist replied: "Such a procedure would be improper."

Patterson, defended by Samuel Leibowitz, of New York, was convicted last April of assaulting one of the two women. He previously had been convicted in Scottsboro, but the supreme court of the United States reversed the decision.

Women's Evidence Dubious

Judge Horton held today that the evidence in the case "greatly preponderates in favor of the defendant."

"History, sacred and profane," said the judge in a slow voice, "and the common experience teaches that women of the character shown in this case are prone for selfish reasons to make false accusations both of rape and of insult upon the slightest provocation, or even without provocation for ulterior purposes.

"These women are shown, by the great weight of evidence, on this very day before leaving Chattanooga, to have falsely accused two Negroes of insulting them . . . The tendency on the part of the women shows they are predisposed to make false accusations upon any occasion whereby their selfish ends may be gained."

The decision throws the celebrated cases back where they were two years ago when nine Negroes were arrested and charged with assaulting the women on a freight train in north Alabama.

Seven Convicted Originally

Seven were convicted. The case of the eighth resulted in a hung jury. The ninth was a juvenile. The supreme court of Alabama upheld the convictions and a cry of "lynch law" echoed around the world and many organizations took up defense of the Negroes.

The supreme court of the United States reversed the decisions, and last April Patterson's case came back to trial. One of the principals came home from New York with a new dress and new story and denied that she was bothered by the Negroes, although she testified at the first trial that she was assaulted.

The jury found Patterson guilty. Leibowitz said the decision was disgraceful. He issued a statement in New York attacking jury systems in Alabama. Knight replied. Judge Horton held Leibowitz had prejudiced his own case by the statement and postponed indefinitely the trials of the other Negroes.

There was no demonstration as Judge Horton made his ruling.

Later he gave juvenile court authority to review the cases of two of the Negroes.

Retrial Granted Negro Attacker

Scottsboro Defendant Gets Third Hearing Because Of Testimony For State

Advertiser 6-23-33 Montgomery Ala

ATHENS, ALA., June 22.—(AP)—Twice convicted and sentenced to death, Heywood Patterson, one of the nine negro defendants in the Scottsboro case, today was granted a third trial by Judge James E. Horton.

In a lengthy opinion the jurist who presided at Patterson's second trial when he was convicted in Morgan County Circuit Court at Decatur, April 9, on a charge of attacking Mrs. Victoria Price, held "that evidence greatly preponderated in favor of the defendant."

The decision was on an application for a new trial asked by defense counsel and Judge Horton permitted no arguments, launching immediately into reading his [illegible] opinion. After he finished, the Judge said the trial of Patterson and the other defendants would not be set before late August or in September.

Atty. Gen. Thomas E. Knight, Jr., directing the prosecution, previously had asked that the trials be set for an early date, saying the "State is ready any time to begin a new trial."

Patterson originally was convicted in Jackson Circuit Court at Scottsboro in April, 1931, and was the first of the negroes to be retried after the U. S. Supreme Court set aside verdicts returned there on grounds the defendants were not properly represented by attorneys.

Reading from the long opinion, Judge Horton said "as heretofore stated, the law declares that a defendant should not be convicted without corroboration where testimony of the prosecutrix bears on its face indications of unreliability or improbability, and particularly when it is contradicted by other evidence."

Ruby Bates, second victim of the alleged attack aboard a Southern Railway freight train as it rumbled through the hills of North Alabama, appeared dramatically at the second trial of Patterson in Decatur, and repudiated testimony she gave at the first trial in Scottsboro. The alleged attack occurred as the girls, clad in overalls, were hoboing from Chattanooga to their home at Huntsville.

"As human life is at stake," Judge Horton said in his opinion, "not only the life of this defendant but of eight others, the court desires to, and should, approach consideration of this motion with a feeling of deep responsibility, and shall endeavor to give it the thought and study it deserves. x x x Deliberate injustice is more fatal to the one who imposes than the one upon whom it is imposed."

Advertiser 6-23-33 Montgomery Ala

Explaining [illegible] studied law and evidence in the case for many days, the Judge cited decisions of both the Alabama Supreme Court and the Court of Appeals in similar cases where reversals had been obtained because of uncorroborated evidence given by the prosecutrix and holding doubt as to the credibility.

"The court, of necessity, will consider in detail the evidence of the prosecutrix, Victoria Price," the opinion continued, "to determine if her evidence is reliable or whether it is corroborated or contradicted by the other evidence in the case.

"History, sacred and profane, and the common experience of mankind teaches that women of the character shown in this case are prone for selfish reasons to make false accusations both of criminal assault, and of insult, upon the slightest provocation, or even without provocation, for ulterior motives.

"These women are shown, by a great weight of evidence, on the very day before leaving Chattanooga to have falsely accused two negroes of insulting them, and of almost precipitating a fight between one of the white boys they were in company with and two negroes. This tendency on the part of the women shows they are predisposed to make false accusations upon any occasion whereby their selfish ends may be gained."

Reviewing circumstances of the arrest of the negroes in Paint Rock, Ala., Judge Horton pointed to the large crowd present and said "while they differed in many details as to the makeup of the train, and the exact car from which the defendant persons were taken, all of which is apparently unimportant, all agreed upon the main fact, that the nine negroes, two white women, and a white boy were taken from the train.

"This undisputed fact constitutes the whole extent of their (the prosecution) evidence, except a statement by Ruby Bates that she had been criminally assaulted, which experience Ruby Bates now repudiates."

Referring to testimony of Orey Dobbins, farmer, of near Stevenson, who testified he saw a fight aboard the train and a woman dragged back into a car, Judge Horton said:

"It corroborates Victoria Price slightly, if at all, and her evidence is so contradictory to the evidence of the doctors who examined her, that it has been impossible for the court to reconcile this evidence with her's." The physician who examined the women when they left the train testified his examination failed to show that Mrs. Price had been attacked.

"Her manner of testifying and her demeanor on the stand militate against her," Judge Horton said. "Her testimony was contradictory often evasive, and time and time again she refused to answer pertinent questions. The gravity of the offense and the importance of her testimony demand candor and sincerity."

Turning to Lester Carter, the hobo who testified he and Jack Tiller spent the night in a wood with Ruby Bates and Victoria Price before the journey to Chattanooga, Judge Horton commented:

"Whether he is entitled to entire credit is certainly a question of doubt, but where facts and circumstances corroborate him, and where the failure of the State to disprove his testimony with witnesses at hand to disprove it, the court sees no reason capriciously to reject all he said."

The jurist also reviewed the testimony of Carter that he, Gilley, and the two women spent the night before the alleged attack in a "hobo jungle" in Chattanooga, contradicting testimony of Mrs. Price that she and Ruby Bates spent the night with Mrs. Callie Brochi, a friend, in Chattanooga.

"The Chattanooga directory was introduced—book evidence—; residents of Chattanooga, both white and negro, took the stand stating that no such woman as Callie Brochi lived in Chattanooga, and had not lived there so far as they knew," said the Judge, adding that no attempt had been made to produce the woman in court to corroborate Mrs. Price's testimony.

Of seven white youths on the train, none said to have participated in an alleged fight with the negroes was put on the stand, Judge Horton said, "except Lester Carter, and he contradicted her (Mrs. Price.)"

"Lester Carter stated that he was one of the seven boys engaged in the fight and that he did not see a single knife or pistol in the hands of the negroes," Judge Horton said, "and, although the seven white boys were kept in jail at Scottsboro, no one testified to any knife or pistol wounds on any of them." Victoria Price testified in both trials the negroes were armed with knives and a pistol and during the alleged attack one of them held a knife at her throat.

The crowd in the courtroom remained quiet and attentive as Judge Horton read slowly from the opinion, and there was no demonstration when he finished.

George W. Chamlee, of Chattanooga, defense attorney, asked the court if he woul dentertain a motion to dismiss "indictments against all these defendants in view of this decision," Judge Horton replied "such a procedure would be improper."

While Atty. Gen. Knight showed his disappointment, defense attorneys praised the action of Judge Horton.

"It is a great victory," Osmond W. Fraenkel, of New York, who recently entered the case, said. Chamlee declared "constitutional law still prevails in Alabama."

INTEREST NOT AT FEVER HEAT

The much heralded "Scottsboro case" brings Athens somewhat into the limelight today (Thursday), as the hearing for a new trial is being held in the Limestone courthouse. Notwithstanding the widely-publicized case little unusual interest has been manifested and the surface of the social and political waters of the county have not been ruffled.

Relations between the two races in Athens and Limestone have been notably harmonious for many years and the thinking element of each race are not willing for the status quo to be disturbed by a criminal case which should have been settled by the law and the evidence and without appeals to prejudice.

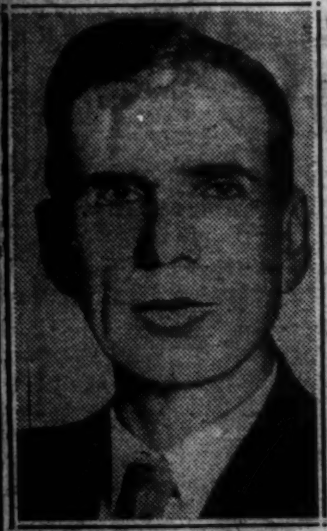
JUDGE HORTON'S WISE DECISION

Judge Horton has done the wisest thing he could have done, we believe, in setting aside the guilty verdict against Heywood Patterson, colored Scottsboro, Ala., assault case defendant.



Judge James E. Horton

There was and is a reasonable doubt in this case. Ruby Bates, one of the two white women alleged to have been attacked in the box-car by the nine colored boys, took back her entire story at Patterson's second trial. The judge finds the testimony of Victoria Price, the other white woman, to be uncorroborated, improbable on its face, and contradicted by other evidence. And there is still the fact that when a young lady goes riding in a box-car with hoboes she can hardly expect to be as safe as she would be in a Y. W. C. A. or on a Pullman car reading the Atlantic Monthly.

In view of all these things, there is at least a reasonable doubt whether nine colored boys or any colored boys should be electrocuted for whatever it was that happened or didn't happen to Ruby and Victoria in the box-car. Judge Horton feels the doubt is strong enough to grant Patterson a third trial, some time this Fall.

We think the judge is right. He is right not only from the point of view of justice, but from the point of view of the State of Alabama. Alabama may feel that it can stand all the criticism other States and nations can hurl against it. Maybe Alabama can. But it does no State any good to have its courts and its majority public sentiment held in universal scorn. Ask Mr. Hitler, about six months hence.

The Scottsboro case's developments up to this latest development weren't helping justice elsewhere, either. Their most alarming result was the refusal by Federal Judge Lowell of Massachusetts to allow extradition of a colored alleged murderer to Virginia, on the ground that Virginia's jury system would keep him from having a fair trial. This, though there were strong indications of the man's guilt. Start that kind of interstate legal warfare, and there is no telling where it will end.

An Alabama Decision

Those who hold that no state has the right to deprive a citizen of his life for a capital offense until all reasonable doubt of his guilt has been removed will find satisfaction in the ruling of an Alabama trial judge that the Negro youth convicted for the second time for a criminal assault on a white woman is to have a new trial. In making his decision Judge James E. Horton, who presided over the second trial of the Negro, said that the preponderance of the evidence was in the favor of Heywood Patterson, the accused, and that the testimony of the prosecutrix, at best of a doubtful nature, had been contradicted.

The case is familar to the reading public. Two white women, hoboing on a freight train, alleged they were attacked by a group of nine Negroes. Seven of the Negroes were tried, convicted and sentenced to die. The jury disagreed on the evidence offered against the eighth and the ninth was remanded to juvenile court for trial. After the Alabama Supreme Court upheld the conviction, the case was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States and a new trial was ordered.

In the second trial of Patterson the prosecutrix repeated the testimony offered in the first trial, but her companion, who first testified that she suffered humiliation at the hands of the Negroes, testified that she had not told the truth in the first instance and that the Negroes were not guilty. Sectional prejudice was aroused because of the statements and the tactics of defending counsel, volunteers to defend the group of eight.

In setting aside the conviction of Patterson on the grounds that his conviction was patently unfair to him, Judge Horton removes any doubt that a colored man in Alabama cannot, if he has a defense, obtain justice. Evidence in this case leaves a strong doubt of the guilt of the nine Negroes and where there is a strong doubt the accused is entitled to such benefits. But if there had been no sentiment against the wholesale execution of the group, they would have been put to death long ago in an Alabama prison. For two years now they have lain in prison. They are ignorant, defenseless against the processes of the courts. Another and a speedy trail should be granted them and some final decision made in the case.

ANOTHER SCOTTSBORO DECISION.

Judge James E. Horton, in the Alabama court in which the first of the Scottsboro Negro defendants had a second trial and second conviction with death sentence, has set aside the verdict. In his decision he says that the jury came to a conclusion at variance with the evidence, the preponderance of which was in favor of the convicted defendant. In the second trial of these young Negroes, removed from the scene of their first trial to remove it from prejudices and passions, only one witness, one of the white hobo girls, stuck to the story which brought conviction in the first instance. The other woman repudiated her story and the prosecution declared that she had been tampered with by the New York radical organizations which had undertaken the defense.

It has been a tradition in parts of the south that the story of a white woman is proof against any denials or even any evidence to the contrary in such a case. The methods used by the New York defense attorney and committee were ill calculated to permit justice to keep the upper hand in a trial necessarily confronted with the deepest racial prejudices and preconceptions. It was observed at the time that the defense by indicting the people themselves was preventing a free exercise of justice, troubled as its course would have been at best.

Judge Horton's decision granting a new trial indicates that the legal purpose of the south is to prevail not only against the passions of the easily aroused people of a community but in spite of the provocations afforded by violent criticism. Criticism is hard to stop when any section of the country permits violence to pay little heed to humanities and rights, and it is sometimes the case that this criticism only stiffens the purposes of the people at fault. But the bar and the judiciary in the south show a determination to make law the rule, even when community sentiment is deeply stirred and impatient to punish, regardless of evidence and lawful proceeding. The administration of justice in the control of such men will prevail. The south is developing a sensitiveness on that subject and Judge Horton expressed it.

STAR WITNESS FOUND IN SCOTTSBORO CASE

Gilley, Who Says He Saw Woman Attacked by Negroes, Will Testify for State.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., June 23.—Orville Gilley, missing star witness in the Scottsboro case and sole white man named as having witnessed the alleged attack upon Victoria Price and Ruby Bates by twelve Negroes, has returned to Alabama voluntarily to testify for the State.

This was confirmed by the Attorney General's office here today in making known that "prosecution of the Scottsboro defendants will not be abated."

Gilley has submitted an affidavit corroborating in virtually every detail the testimony of Victoria Price as to what occurred on the freight train, declaring that he witnessed the attacks. He will testify when the case of Haywood Patterson, the first of the nine defendants to be retried, is again called.

Gilley was used by the State in the first trial of the defendants, but he was questioned only regarding a fight that took place aboard a gondola, in which several white men were thrown from the train.

Failure of the State to produce Gilley in the second trial of Patterson drew criticism from Judge James E. Horton, who granted the motion of the defense for a new trial yesterday.

The State explained during the trial that it had been unable to locate Gilley. The itinerant witness is said to have explained to Attorney General Thomas E. Knight Jr. yesterday that he thought the case had been settled at the close of the first trial, and upon his return to the State only recently learned of the subsequent developments.

The Attorney General's office expressed the hope that Patterson's new trial would be called as soon as possible, probably in August or September.

Justice Triumphs in Alabama.

The growing idea all over this country that in the sovereign State of Alabama the scales of Justice must be indefinitely unbalanced by Caucasian prejudices; that the sword of Justice must be always misused against accused Negroes; that the blindfolding of Justice must always be mere camouflage; gets a body blow in the courageous, vital and far-reaching decision of Judge James E. Horton setting aside the jury verdict and the capital punishment sentence imposed by him in the case of Haywood Patterson of the Scottsboro group. Patterson is the one defendant who has been retried since the Supreme Court of the United States intervened.

Judge Horton declares the second verdict against Patterson to be utterly contrary to the weight of evidence. It was proposed to send this prisoner to the electric chair on the unsupported word of a train-jumping white woman, contradicted flatly by the other white woman alleged to have been a victim of the same assault. It is noted that the State deliberately refused to call a white man who was in custody and available, and had been an eye witness of what happened.

In the cases of two juveniles in the original Scottsboro group the death sentence has been set aside. The law authorizes their trial only in a juvenile court. Seven of the defendants are now in jail waiting to be retried.

Alabama has a right to be proud of Judge Horton. He is an honor to his State and a credit to the Bar of the United States. The scales of Justice have been upheld, the sword of Justice is free from misuse, Justice is efficient, and Alabama is vindicated.

A TORCH FOR SOUTHERN JUSTICE

Southern justice—for long under a shadow in the eyes of enlightened public opinioh—has taken a notable step forward.

Judge James E. Horton has done what few Southern jurists would dare to do; he has taken issue with the race prejudice which has made it so difficult for a Negro to obtain a fair trial in the South.

Judge Horton has granted a new trial to Russell Patterson, the Negro convicted and sentenced to death in the famous Scottsboro case. He has done so, he says, on the ground that the jury verdict was not in accord with the evidence.

The evidence, observes the Judge, "greatly preponderates in favor of the defendant." As to the women who charged the youths with attacking them, he comments:

> "The tendency on the part of the women shows they are predisposed to make false accusations upon any occasion whereby their selfish ends may be gained."

The recent trial of Patterson was admittedly a farce.

But the youth's chances of winning out over racial prejudice were not helped by the efforts of Communists to make capital of the case.

Judge Horton's decision now cleans the slate, and starts the case over again.

That decision is not only a victory for the defense; it is a victory for justice in Alabama.

VICTIMS OF PERSECUTION

New York

7-1-33

THE Scottsboro case has entered the movies! But don't get excited. It came in through the back door and in disguise. The producer, one William Goldburg, thought he would take a double advantage. The Jews are being persecuted in Germany. The papers are full of another persecution in the South. So he produces "Victims of Persecution," in which Hitler and Germany are not mentioned, but whose chief character a Jewish judge running for governor (an orchid for the Lehmans?), holds out against threats and bombs to see that justice is dealt a Negro charged with arson. The Negro, of course, has to be an "educated" Negro, of the "better class." Unfortunately, the Negro is never presented to us and we don't see the case fought. There's a lot of talk in the Judge's private dwelling, badly staged, acted, spoken. The only Negro the audience sees is the Judge's Negro butier, handled in the usual white man's manner, clown and loyal servitor, treated like a member of the household by everyone down to the Jewish cook. She, in turn, is like a daughter to the Judge's aged father-in-law, who has come from the persecutions of Europe to New York en route to Palestine. The Judge's friends seek to hold him from his conscience.

You see, it's the good heart of a Judge and not the mass-pressure of an I.L.D. that has fought for the Negroes in and out of the courts. The mass-pressure of the Judge's fat friend almost persuades the Judge to back out. But in steps grandpop, whose eyes have been burned by powder meant for the Judge, and tells them a story of olden Jewry to prove that it does not pay to sacrifice one's conscience to the welfare of one's people. An attractive fragment of an old film is inserted, only it really proves just the opposite. Who cares? It was a way to save money on production. And after all, a penny saved is a penny earned. Persecutions in Germany persecutions in America, what are they if not opportunities for the Goldburgs and the Paramounts and the Morgans and the Rockefellers to make a little money to keep their home fires burning. In 1929 a similar picture was made by an "independent" with a great many lamentations, hand-wringings and eyes on the box office.

A VERDICT UPSET.

Extracts published in yesterday's TIMES from Judge HORTON'S opinion, in Alabama, setting aside the verdict of guilty against HAYWOOD PATTERSON as being against the weight of evidence and ordering a new trial, can but heighten the great and general respect which he has won. Many temperate Southern critics of the verdict contented themselves with saying that PATTERSON'S guilt was not proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Judge HORTON, who presided at the trial, holds that the testimony of the prosecutrix was not only uncorroborated but inherently improbable; not merely contradicted but overborne by the evidence for the defendant.

At this distance, at least, from the place and time of the trial there should be no disposition to blame the jury or to doubt its honesty of intention. An atmosphere of heat and passion had been created by ill-judged and immoderate interference from the outside. Alabama is not ashamed but proud of her courts; and she has reason to be. Her people believe in justice. A rare denial of it there as anywhere finds its constitutional remedy. So far as race embroilment is concerned, the Scottsboro region, if we are not misinformed, has had a creditable record.

Whatever blunders have been committed, whatever unfortunate violences of expression have been uttered by counsel for either side in the Scottsboro cases, it seems clear that Alabama is determined that the Scottsboro Negroes shall have a fair trial. If there [illegible] been hasty or prejudiced criticism of her courts, the strong and quiet figure of Judge HORTON, painstaking, keen, impartial, coolly seeking to give just judgment, is a more than sufficient answer.

"My Son Was Convicted Because He Is Black," Writes Father of Haywood Patterson

Daily Worker
New York
7-1-33

(The following is an open letter written by Claude Patterson, father of Haywood Patterson, and published in a recent issue of the Chattanooga, Tenn., "News," a weekly newspaper).

I AM the father of Haywood Patterson, and quite naturally interested in his case down in Alabama and you have recently published editorials in which you expressed the wish that the International Labor Defense, should withdraw from all connection with this case.

I would appreciate giving you and the public through your valuable paper a short history of this case, with unpublished facts that will tend to clarify many things and to correct erroneous impressions about this case.

When this trouble started, and the nine boys were arrested and tried at Scottsboro, they had made no preparation for trial, no witnesses, no employed attorney, and were forced into trial unprepared; convicted by a combination of circumstances, and the public greatly misled by the false testimony introduced on that trial.

THE ARREST

At that time the trouble occurred, a crew of white boys attacked a number of colored boys, threw rocks at them, and provoked a fight in a flat car on a long train of about 50 cars, with nine flat cars in a row; this fight was in flat car number four counting from the rear end of the train and the two women were in flat five, one car ahead of the fight.

When the fight was over and the white boys jumped off except one man named Gilley, he was trying to swing off, but he was about to be killed under the car wheels and Haywood Patterson, Andy Wright and Charley Weems pulled him back up on the train and let him remain there.

When the train reached Paint Rock, Alabama, an order had been sent to arrest all the Negroes on that train, because of this fight.

After they were taken to Scottsboro, the report spread that they had been accused of assaulting the two white women, who were in the flat car in front of where this fight occurred. This report only needed to be started, and the Huntsville Times and the Jackson County Sentinel would do the rest as newspaper correspondents, and from there the news was carried that all the white boys saw the alleged crime, knew all about it, and witnessed it.

NO batch of lies was ever written or penned by the hand of man, than the batch of lies sent out from Scottsboro about these innocent boys and if you will bear with me, I will tell you about it.

In order to make the women swear lies and stick to it they were both locked up in the same jail with the white boys and Colored boys, in separate cells, but why put the women in jail? Put in there to hold them in line and make them tell lies, so Ruby Bates has said.

Why put those seven white boys in jail? Put them in jail to make them swear lies, so Lester Carter says, but not one of the white boys ever testified against my son, Haywood Patterson. Orville Gilley was put in jail but he refused to testify against Haywood Patterson, in Scottsboro, and all the white boys were released and not one of them ever testified in any case against Haywood Patterson. Did they see a crime committed? No, sir. Well, why were they kept in jail at Scottsboro?

They told my son and these other boys that was a frame-up lie and they were not going to testify to such a batch of lies as that was, and they did not testify to it. Not one of the white boys ever took the witness stand against my boy.

When the trial came on, two witnesses, Victoria Price and Ruby Bates, testified against all these nine boys and they were convicts, and while that mock trial was going on, the International Labor Defense had a man from New York sitting in the audience who reported that it was the greatest mock trial ever held in the State of Alabama. This case was held when I was afraid to go to Scottsboro, for fear of mob violence, and I employed George W. Chamlee, attorney, of Chattanooga, Tenn., to represent my son, as he had been my lawyer before that time. Just at that time Mr. Brodsky of the International Labor Defense, and its chief counsel, from New York, came to Chattanooga, and said he would help me pay the expenses of this case on an appeal, and the appeal was taken, and a new trial granted in the Supreme Court at Washington and the expenses of printing that record was about $1,500 alone.

IF it had not been for the International Labor Defense coming to our assistance, quickly, in time to file a motion for a new trial and set up a real defense, the boys would all have been killed, although they were all innocent.

In one of your editorials, you suggested that all we needed was some good Southern attorneys, like Mr. Roddy and Mr. Moody and the boys would have a chance to be acquitted.

Well, Judge Hawkins had them, while the trial in his court was on, and when the State's Attorney got up and shook his finger in the faces of these boys, denounced them, demanded the death penalty for them, no attorney got up and offered one word of argument, or any summation, on behalf of these nine boys, and then a second attorney for the state demanded the death penalty, and Mr. Roddy and Mr. Moody declined to argue the cases.

"WE HAD A TRIAL RECENTLY"

We had a trial at Decatur recently, and the State had one star witness, Victoria Price, an underworld character, who had been convicted in the courts of Huntsville for vagrancy, lewdness and violating the prohibition law; she had broken up the family of Jack Tiller, and Tiller's wife had to take her children and leave him; this woman swore she spent the night at Mrs. Callie Broochie's boarding house on 7th St. in Chattanooga, while Ruby Bates, Lester Carter and E. L. Lewis and Dallas Ramsay all swore she spent the night in the woods on the bank of Chattanooga creek. On her testimony, practically alone with no witness to the facts, and her evidence contradicted by five Colored boys, in addition to other impeaching items against her, a death penalty was pronounced upon my son.

The big lie that Ruby Bates had been bribed. Who bribed her? When and where was she bribed? She has been trying to join the defendants from the first day she was put in jail in Scottsboro. Who bribed Lester Carter? Where did he get this bribe? Why was Carter and Gilley not used on the trial in Scottsboro, if they knew anything material?

"MY BOY SAVED GILLEY"

My boy pulled Gilley up on the train to keep him from being killed, while attempting to jump off. Was Gilley afraid of him then? Sure not.

Dr. Bridges testified that two hours after Victoria Price was arrested and put in jail he examined her, that she was not even nervous, hysterical, or that there were any serious hurts, only a few scratches, and no injury, and his testimony did not help her case. Other medical testimony proved no crime was committed.

Why did the jury convict Haywood Patterson in Alabama when he is absolutely innocent? Because it was a white woman accusing a Negro boy. If it had been a Negro woman accusing a white boy, he would never have been indicted, or if it had been two Negro girls accusing seven white boys and one Negro woman came up confessing her lies, as Ruby Bates has done, that would have been the end of this litigation.

Haywood Patterson was convicted because he is black. No other reason, no other excuse, no other cause, none wanted, entirely innocent.

Yours truly,
CLAUDE PATTERSON.

Say This For Alabama

When Judge James E. Horton, of the Alabama bench, yesterday set aside the verdict of guilty rendered against one of the Scottsboro Negroes, he may have been right, or he may have been wrong. But whether he was right or wrong, he exhibited courage enough to disregard local opinion; and when it is known that the judge has courage, the world is much more likely to believe that justice will be served.

It is peculiarly gratifying that it was an Alabama judge, applying Alabama law, who entered a decision not in accord with local feeling. As a matter of fact, Alabama officialdom, throughout this case, has acted a great deal more decently than it has ever been given credit for acting. Some of the prosecuting attorneys conducted themselves disgracefully at certain points in the trials; but throughout, beginning with the original trial in Scottsboro, and continuously since, the judges and the officers of the court, including the commanders of the troops called out, have evinced a disposition to conduct the cases in a lawful and orderly manner.

There may have been a miscarriage of justice. Judge Horton's decision adds weight to the belief that there was one. But there was no lynching with the connivance of the judges and the officers of the law. In view of the records of some other Scuthern States, this fact is one in which Alabama may take just pride.

Even if Judge Horton's decision is right, this remains true; for a miscarriage of justice is possible, even when courts are making a sincere effort to be fair.

New Trial For Patterson

A higher Alabama court has granted a new trial to Heywood Patterson, the young Negro who was recently convicted for the second time as one of the defendants in the famous "Scotsboro case" involving the conduct of several Negroes toward two white women.

Patterson's case had been once to the Supreme Court of the United States and sent back for a new trial, over the rulings of the state courts. Now we have the second verdict overthrown by a state tribunal.

"Constitutional law still prevails in Alabama," exclaims one of the counsel for the defense. Better than that, one might think, the state of Alabama is coming to a new view as to the rights of Negroes under that constitution. It stilll remains to be seen, however, what will be the ultimate outcome of the Scotsboro case as a whole.

Another Chapter

Another short but vivid chapter has been written in the famous Scottsboro case in which nine Negroes were accused of criminal assault upon two white women. Judge James E. Horton, who presided at the second trial of Heywood Patterson, which resulted as did the first in a verdict of guilty, granted this Negro youth a new trial, declaring that the evidence submitted by the State was wholly inadequate.

Judge Horton wins universal approbation for this action the effect of which is to save the Negroes involved from paying the death penalty for offenses they did not commit. This case brought a great deal of criticism upon Alabama in particular and the South generally. Had it not attracted wide attention, it is obvious that these innocent Negroes would have been executed for a crime they did not commit.

Judge Horton says that "women of the character shown in this case are prone for selfish reasons to make false accusations, both of rape and of insult, upon the slightest provocation, for ulterior purposes." But, had it not been for the wide publicity this case was given, the false charges made by these women would have terminated tragically.

The lesson the South should learn from this case is that in every instance when a man, white or black, is charged with an offense against women the closest investigation should be made. The womanhood of the South can be protected best through orderly court procedure that insures justice. Prejudice can never take the place of justice.

JUSTICE FOR ALABAMA NEGROES

The grant of a new trial to Heywood Patterson, one of the nine negroes in the Scottsboro, Ala., case, is an incident of wide public interest because of the circumstances involved. In April Patterson was tried on the charge of assaulting a white woman hobo, was found guilty and sentenced to death. Judge Horton, who presided at the trial, now sets aside the verdict on the ground that the story of the chief prosecuting witness "bears on its face indications of improbability and is contradicted by other evidence."

It will be recalled that seven of the negroes were tried, convicted and sentenced to death. Their fate attracted outside help and the case was carried to the United States Supreme Court which ordered a new trial. Patterson was the first to be retried under the Supreme Court order. It appeared that a large degree of race prejudice enteed into the case. The prosecution took full advantage of this phase and the jury responded to the appeal. The judge apparently permitted no such feeling to enter. His conduct of the case received commendation. The grant of a new trial implies his unwillingness to condemn a man to death largely on the ground that he is black, not on evidence of crime.

The public interest in the case is predicated on the desire that men should have a fair trial regardless of their color. There is a belief that guilt has been presumed when a charge was made against a negro in Alabama, and in other Southern states. It has fallen to the negro to establish his innocence rather than that the state should prove his guilt. Therefore, the action of Judge Horton becomes of importance in that it provides a precedent for giving the advantage of the doubt to the negro. The accused should not escape just punishment for any crime he may have committed, but he should not be "railroaded" to death for an offense of which there is not conclusive proof of guilt. That is the ground of the public interest.

Judge Horton has taken a step which should achieve much toward securing justice for negroes in Alabama.

AN EPOCHAL DECISION.

Circuit Judge James E. Horton, who distinguished himself by his impartial rulings and insistence that law and evidence, not hysteria, dominate the Decatur legal proceedings, has voided the verdict of guilty brought in by a jury of Morgan County, Alabama, against Haywood Patterson, one of the Scottsboro defendants, and ordered a new trial.

In an opinion declaring that the conviction was not supported by the weight of evidence Judge Horton attacked the credibility of witnesses for the prosecution. Victoria Price's manner of testifying and demeanor on the stand militated against her, her testimony was contradictory, often evasive, and time and again she refused to answer pertinent questions, the jurist points out, further stating:

> The testimony of the prosecutrix (Victoria Price) in this case is not only uncorroborated but it also bears on its face indications of improbability and is contradicted by other evidence, and in addition thereto the evidence greatly preponderated in favor of the defendant.

Even the story told by Victoria Price does not coincide with the testimony given by Dr. R. R. Bridges, Scottsboro physician, who examined the girls after the alleged attack, the court holds, commenting that "her evidence is so contradictory to the evidence of the doctors who examined her it has been impossible for the court to reconcile this evidence with her."

Judge Horton is inclined to believe the story told by Lester Carter, white hobo, that he and a friend spent a night in the backwoods with Ruby Bates and Victoria Price before the Chattanooga trip on freight cars. The court finds it difficult to believe that such a crime was committed by the Negro defendants in broad daylight, in on open gondola car passing through half a dozen small towns.

This decision, so courageously rendered by Judge James E. Horton is one of the greatest pronouncements on behalf of social justice and fair play that has come out of the South. It is epochal in that it marks a turning point in the South's traditional attitude, which has been to condemn, convict and punish any Negro at whom a white woman, no matter how lewd or lawless she might be, saw fit to point her finger of accusation. The false cry of "rape" has sent many an innocent Negro to an untimely death. Judge Horton has broadcast to the world that in the courts of the South the guilt or innocence of a Negro defendant charged with rape must be determined by the due process of law and not by falsehoods, race prejudice and emotionalism.

There is very little likelihood of the State of Alabama ever securing convictions against any of the nine defendants that would be confirmed by the Supreme Court at Washington. Judge Horton has held that the unsupported word of Victoria Price is insufficient on which to condemn a man to death. Victoria Price is branded as a liar by Ruby Bates. Victoria Price's testimony is doubted by the presiding judge, who frankly admits that the evidence at the Decatur trial "preponderated in favor of Haywood Patterson." The Morgan County jury did not believe Victoria Price's story, but was moved to bring in a verdict of guilty by the injection of sectional and racial prejudices.

Abraham Lincoln freed the slaves. Judge Horton has issued an emancipation proclamation telling the world that the South is being freed of shackles of intolerance and race hatred in the courts.

As the Patterson case will be retried in the Alabama courts, for the time being the U. S. Supreme Court will not be called on to determine the validity of the South's system of excluding Negroes from juries.

JUDGE HORTON VOIDS NEGRO'S CONVICTION IN SCOTTSBORO CASE

Waiving Defense Pleas, the Alabama Jurist Rules Verdict Is Against the Evidence.

WOMAN'S STORY REJECTED

He Bars Death Sentence on Her Unsupported Word—New Trial Demanded by State.

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ATHENS, Ala., June 22.—The verdict of guilty returned against Haywood Patterson, one of the Scottsboro Negroes, two months ago by a Morgan County jury of white farmers and tradesmen was set aside today by Circuit Judge James E. Horton, who ordered a new trial.

It was Judge Horton who on Palm Sunday last, at Decatur, sentenced Patterson to death in the electric chair at Kilby prison, in accordance with the mandate of the jury. Today he held that the jury's verdict was against the weight of evidence.

The unsupported word of Mrs. Victoria Price, alleged victim of the attack which is supposed to have taken place March 25, 1931, aboard a Southern Railway freight train, Judge Horton held was insufficient evidence on which to condemn a man to death.

Not only did the Price woman's story contain improbabilities within itself, Judge Horton said, but it was flatly contradicted by the testimony of Ruby Bates, the other alleged victim of the assault, who testified for the defense at Decatur that the whole case was "a frame-up."

The judge pointed out also that at the first trial in Scottsboro, Orville Gilley, a white hobo, who was an eye-witness on the freight train, was not called as a witness by the State although he was then in custody.

Second Reprieve From Death.

For Patterson, who is in jail in Birmingham with his eight co-defendants, the court's action constituted a second reprieve from a death sentence. Otherwise it did not change his status or that of the other defendants, who are still awaiting the new trials ordered for them by the higher courts.

Of the nine originally arrested by the posse that stopped the freight train at Paint Rock eight were convicted at Scottsboro within a fortnight of their arrest. In the case of the ninth, Roy Wright, a juvenile, the jury disagreed. The Supreme Court of Alabama later set aside the verdict of guilty against Eugene Williams on the ground that he, too, was a juvenile.

Appeals were taken in the cases of the other seven defendants to the United States Supreme Court, which last November ordered new trials for all on the ground that they had been inadequately represented by counsel at Scottsboro. Patterson is the only one of the nine who has been retried thus far.

Judge Horton's ruling today will prevent a review of Alabama's jury system by the higher courts as it removes the necessity for an appeal. Samuel Leibowitz, chief trial counsel for Patterson, spent days in an effort to prove that Negroes were deprived of their constitutional right to serve on juries in Alabama and was planning to make that charge the basis of a second appeal to the United States Supreme Court.

The reason that Judge Horton sat here to entertain the defense motion for a new trial was that the court room at Decatur was being used by another judge. He heard no argument, but as soon as the papers were before him, he began reading his opinion, a document covering 108 typewritten pages which took him an hour and five minutes to read.

Before he had turned the first page of his opinion, smiles of satisfaction appeared on the faces of George W. Chamlee and Osmond Fraenkel, the defense attorneys, who had come prepared to argue for something they did not expect to get.

Thomas E. Knight Jr., the young Attorney General listened tensely with mounting color. He made it clear that he intended to fight.

In a voice that trembled slightly, he declared that the State was ready to proceed at once with a new trial of Patterson and asked that it be set down on the calendar for the earliest possible date, which probably would be about Sept. 1.

Leibowitz Congratulates South.

Samuel S. Leibowitz, the New York lawyer who defended Patterson at Decatur, issued the following statement yesterday upon receiving word of Judge Horton's decision:

"The South is to be congratulated in having as one of its jurists that courageous, brilliant lawyer, James E. Horton. From the very start I felt that the courts of Alabama would never uphold the verdict of guilty rendered by the jury in the Decatur courtroom on Palm Sunday last. I was convinced of the innocence of these poor Negro boys even before I accepted the case.

"In view of the judge's pronouncement I cannot see how the other cases can be prosecuted further. I am glad for the sake of the poor parents of these boys, who have undoubtedly undergone as much, if not more, torture than the boys themselves."

Points of Opinion in Scottsboro Case

Special to The New York Times.

FLORENCE, Ala., June 22.—Following are excerpts from Judge Horton's opinion, sent to The New York Times by The Associated Press correspondent at Athens. Ala.: New York Times

"The testimony of the prosecutrix [Victoria Price] in this case is not only uncorroborated but it also bears on its face indications of improbability and is contradicted by other evidence and in addition thereto the evidence greatly preponderates in favor of the defendant."

6-23-33

Judge Horton said further:

"History, sacred and profane, and the common experience of mankind teaches that women of the character shown in this case are prone for selfish reasons to make false accusations both of rape and of insult upon the slightest provocation, or even without provocation for ulterior purposes.

"These women are shown, by the great weight of evidence, on this very day before leaving Chattanooga to have falsely accused two negroes of insulting them. * * * The tendency on the part of the women shows they are predisposed to make false accusations upon any occasion whereby their selfish ends may be gained."

No Fact in Corroboration.

Dealing further with Mrs. Price's testimony, Judge Horton said:

"With seven boys present at the beginning of this trouble, with one seeing the entire affair, with some fifty or sixty persons meeting them at Paint Rock and taking the women, the white boy, Gilley, and the nine Negroes in charge, with two physicians examining the women within one and one-half hours, according to the tendency of all the evidence, after the alleged occurrence of the alleged rape, and with the actions charged committed in broad daylight, we should expect from all this cloud of witnesses or from the mute but telling physical condition of the women or their clothes, some one fact in corroboration of this story."

Doctor's Testimony Stressed.

A considerable part of Judge Horton's opinion was devoted to a review of the testimony of Dr. R. R. Bridges, the Scottsboro physician who examined the girls after the alleged attack and who was was called as a witness by the State.

The doctor's testimony that he found the girls' nervous reactions normal and that he saw no wounds such as Victoria Price said had been inflicted in her scalp with a pistol butt should be taken into consideration, Judge Horton said.

The judge expressed the opinion that the condition in which the doctor found the girls could have resulted as easily from their conduct with white hoboes in Chattanooga as from any assaults by Negroes. Evidence had been offered by the defense, he pointed out, to show that the girls spent the night before the arrest of the negroes with men in "a hobo dive."

"Those few blue spots and the scratches," said the opinion, "would be the natural consequence of such living. Vastly greater physical signs would have been expected from an attack."

Results of Examinations.

Continuing, the opinion stated:

"Dr. Bridges said when these two women were brought into his office neither was hysterical or nervous about it at all. He noticed nothing unusual about their respiration and their pulse was normal.

"Such a normal physical condition is not the natural accompaniment or result of such a horrible experience, especially when the woman testified she fainted from the injuries she had received.

"The fact that the women were unchaste might tend to mitigate the marked effect upon their sensibilities, but such hardness would also lessen the probability of either of them fainting. If her faint was feigned then her credibility must suffer from such feigned actions.

"And this witness's anger and protest when the doctors insisted upon an examination of her person was not compatible with the depression of spirit likely to be caused by the treatment she said she had received."

Reviewing the evidence of Orey Dobbins, a farmer near Stevenson, who testified that he saw a fight aboard the train and a woman dragged back into a car, the judge said:

"It corroborates Victoria Price slightly, if at all, and her evidence is so contradictory to the evidence of the doctors who examined her that it has been impossible for the court to reconcile this evidence with hers."

Declaring the crime was usually one of secrecy, Judge Horton pointed out the Negroes were accused of having committed it in broad daylight in an open gondola car passing through half a dozen small towns.

"Orville Gilley, a white boy, pulled back on the train by the Negroes, and sitting off, according to Victoria Price, in one end of the gondola, is a witness to the whole scene," said Judge Horton. "Yet he stays on the train and he does not attempt to get off the car at any of the places where it slows down.

"He does not go back to the caboose to report to the conductor or to the engineer on the engine, although no compulsion is being exercised upon him, and instead of there being any threat of danger to him from the Negroes, they themselves have pulled him back on the train to prevent him from being injured from jumping off the train after it had increased its speed.

"And, in the end, by a fortuitous circumstance, just before the train pulls into Paint Rock, the attacks cease and just in the nick of time the clothing is restored and the women appear clothed as the posse sights them. The natural inclination of the mind is to doubt and to seek further."

Credibility of Witnesses.

Regarding the credibility of Mrs. Price, the judge said:

"Her manner of testifying and demeanor on the stand militate against her. Her testimony was contradictory, often evasive and time and again she refused to answer pertinent questions. The gravity of the offense and the importance of her testimony demand candor and sincerity.

"In considering any evidence for the defendant which would tend to show Mrs. Price swore falsely, the court will exclude the evidence of witnesses for the defendant, who themselves appear unworthy of credit, unless the facts and circumstances so strongly corroborate that evidence that it appears true."

Turning to Lester Carter, the hobo who testified that he and one Jack Tiller spent a night in the woods with Ruby Bates and Victoria Price before the Chattanooga journey, Judge Horton said:

"Whether or not he is entitled to entire credit is certainly a question of doubt, but where facts and circumstances corroborate him, and where the failure of the State to disprove his testimony, with witnesses at hand to disprove it, the court sees no reason to capriciously reject all he said."

Rebukes Race Prejudice

JUDGE James E. Horton has risen above the race prejudices of the people in some localities in the southern states and in a scathing decision rebuked the idea still prevalent that white supremacy must be maintained through the acceptance at all times of the testimony of a white person as true as against Negro evidence to the contrary.

Judge Horton has set aside the verdict of a jury convicting Heywood Patterson, one of the nine Negroes indicted at Scottsboro on the charge of having committed criminal assaults upon white women.

The decision of Judge Horton is that the testimony in the case did not warrant the conviction of the Negro. He points out that the law is that a defendant should not be convicted of the crime with which Patterson was charged on the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecuting witness where there is any indication that such testimony may be of an unreliable character. He unhesitatingly declares the testimony of Victoria Price, the prosecutrix in Patterson's case, on its face bore indications of improbability. He further says that the preponderance of the evidence was greatly in favor of the defendant.

It is to be hoped that the judgment of Judge Horton overturning the verdict in one of the Scottsboro cases will end this cause celebre. Seemingly, a decision of the supreme court of the United States overturning a previous conviction in a Scottsboro case and the present order of Judge Horton should be sufficient to stop further proceedings against the Negroes who have been placed in jeopardy because of unreliable white women's charges.

Race prejudice has gone to an unreasonable extreme in the Scottsboro incident. The people of that vicinity should learn from Judge Horton's opinion that the time has come when even the south must accord Negroes their rights before the law.

MOST AMERICANS, including many in the South, will rejoice in the action of Judge Horton of Alabama in setting aside the verdict of guilty found against Heywood Patterson in his second trial. Patterson, it will be recalled, is one of the nine Negro boys arrested in Scottsboro more than two years ago, charged with rape upon two white girls in a freight car. After seven of the boys had been sentenced to death, the United States Supreme Court ordered a new trial on the ground that they had not had proper representation by counsel. Patterson alone was then retried, and again convicted. In overthrowing this conviction and ordering a new trial, Judge Horton pointed out that the verdict rested solely on an improbable story by one of the alleged victims, flatly contradicted by the other. He also noted that the prosecution refused to call as a witness a white hobo on the train, when he refused to support the State's case. Judge Horton's action does not in itself free any of the boys, but we may hope for their release shortly, as the State's case appears to be completely destroyed by the decision and further trials would be obvious persecution. The praise bestowed upon Judge Horton is tempered in some quarters by the assertion that his action was taken in order to prevent the United States Supreme Court from passing upon the legitimacy of excluding Negroes from Southern juries. This point was one of three raised in the appeal to the federal bench, but only the question of inadequate counsel was passed on. It was the intention of the defense, though, to concentrate on the race issue if a second appeal should become necessary. Undoubtedly sentiment in the South was for preventing this, and Judge Horton, in his recent decision, may have been as much of a politician as a jurist. This, however, is a criticism which may be made of our wisest and most upright judges. It is scarcely more than saying that Judge Horton is human. The Nation gives him all credit for extricating his State from an ugly position. By unyielding stubbornness in similar circumstances the late Judge Thayer brought upon Massachusetts the shame and tragedy of the Sacco-Vanzetti execution.

Judge Horton Knows When He's Licked

Afro-American

7-1-33

Baltimore Md

Judge James E. Horton, white, sitting in Athens, Alabama, last week granted a new trial to Haywood Patterson, one of the Scottsboro boys.

Immediately there will be those to term Judge Horton "a second Lincoln," and to commend his "fair and judicial conduct" in the case.

To our mind, Judge Horton is a typical Southern judge who doesn't direct public opinion but merely follows it—blindly.

The judge's assigned reason for granting a new trial was that Victoria Price was a harlot and her testimony against Patterson was unsupported.

Where was Judge Horton all during the Scottsboro trial?

Didn't he know it then?

Didn't he know it after the state had finished its case?

Didn't he know it when he sentenced Patterson to death?

Of course he knew it, but he didn't have the courage of his convictions. He was afraid to affront the lynching element of his community.

The only thing that has happened since he sentenced Patterson to death for rape was announced unofficially in the AFRO last week, that is: that the International Labor Defense which got Ruby Bates to change her testimony has also gotten Victoria Price to do likewise.

With both girls denying they were raped, wouldn't Alabama courts be the world's laughing stock sure enough, trying nine boys for a crime of which no one accuses them?

Judge Horton saw that comic situation coming, and he ducked it,

Call him fair, impartial, upright, or anything else. To our minds he is a typical white Southerner, who has supported Southern Bourbonism as long as he could, and with defeat staring him in the face, now runs away.

Incidentally, by granting a new trial, Judge Horton puts off, temporarily, at least, a United States Supreme Court's review of Alabama's jury system.

Samuel Leibowitz, attorney for the boys, spent several days of the trial proving that no Negroes were called for jury service in Alabama now or during the past fifty years.

Judge Horton In New Role

Black Dispatch

Okla. City, Okla.

Granting of a new trial to Heywood Patterson by Judge James E. Horton last week, shows that the conscience of the South is being stirred as never before. The new trial was granted on the ground that the testimony of Victoria Price, prosecution witness, was uncorroborated and had been discredited by reliable witnesses.

7-1-33

If there ever was any flimsy ground of evidence upon which these nine black boys should have been held and prosecuted, that framed evidence has now taken flight and the boys should be speedily released. It would be a fine thing for the conscience of the South if an open confession were made that Victoria Price lied, and should herself be charged with perjury. This would in no wise atone for the great and irreparable harm which has been done, but to dismiss these charges would be to strike a death blow to the most hypocritical gesture of prejudice—the charge the South has hurled around the world that all Negroes are rapists.

Judge Horton quite evidently decided to make a good job of it when he rendered his opinion, and he has unquestionably made it extremely difficult for Attorney General Knight to develop a new case.

"History, sacred and profane," declared the jurist in a low pitched voice; "and the common experience of mankind teaches that women of the character shown in this case are prone for selfish reasons to make false accusations, both of rape or insult, upon the slightest provocation, or even without provocation, for ulterior purposes.

"These women are shown, by the great weight of evidence, on the very day before leaving Chattanooga, to have falsely accused two Negroes of insulting them . . . The tendency on the part of the women shows they are predisposed to make false accusations upon any occasion whereby their selfish ends may be gained."

"As heretofore stated," the Judge's ruling said, "the law declares that a defendant should not be convicted without corroboration where the testimony of the prosecutrix bears on its face indications of unreliability or improbability, and particularly when it is contradicted by other evidence.

"The testimony of the prosecutrix (Victoria Price) in this case is not only uncorroborated but it also bears on its face indications of improbability and is contradicted by other evidence and in addition thereto the evidence greatly preponderated in favor of the defendant."
